

NAZI CONSPIRACY AND AGGRESSION

SUPPLEMENT B

*Office of United States
Chief of Counsel For Prosecution of Axis Criminality*

PROPERTY OF U. S. ARMY
THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S SCHOOL LIBRARY

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

WASHINGTON • 1948

JUL 25 1972

4183

11,740

For Sale by the Superintendent of Documents
U. S. Government Printing Office
Washington 25, D. C.

11,740 25 JULY 1972
U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING

X
5437.5
.U75
1945
Suppl B
c. 1

A Collection of Documentary Evidence and Guide Materials Prepared by the American and British Prosecuting Staffs for Presentation before the International Military Tribunal at Nurnberg, Germany, in the case of

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, THE FRENCH RE-PUBLIC, THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND, and THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

— against —

HERMANN WILHELM GOERING, RUDOLF HESS,
JOACHIM von RIBBENTROP, ROBERT LEY, WILHELM
KEITEL, ERNST KALTENBRUNNER, ALFRED ROS-ENBERG, HANS FRANK, WILHELM FRICK, JULIUS
STREICHER, WALTER FUNK, HJALMAR SCHACHT,
GUSTAV KRUPP von BOHLEN und HALBACH, KARL DOENITZ, ERICH RAEDER, BALDUR von SCHIRACH, FRITZ SAUCKEL, ALFRED JODL, MARTIN BORMANN,
FRANZ von PAPEN, ARTUR SEYSS-INQUART, AL-BERT SPEER, CONSTANTIN von NEURATH, and HANS FRITZSCHE, Individually and as Members of Any of the Following Groups or Organizations to which They Respectively Belonged, Namely: DIE REICHSRIGIERUNG
(REICH CABINET); DAS KORPS DER POLITISCHEN
LEITER DER NATIONALSOZIALISTISCHEN DEUT-SCHEN ARBEITERPARTEI (LEADERSHIP CORPS OF THE NAZI PARTY); DIE SCHUTZSTAFFELN DER
NATIONALSOZIALISTISCHEN DEUTSCHEN ARBEIT-
ERPARTEI (commonly known as the "SS") and including DIE SICHERHEITSDIENST (commonly known as the
"SD"); DIE GEHEIME STAATSPOLIZEI (SECRET
STATE POLICE, commonly known as the "GESTAPO"); DIE STURMABTEILUNGEN DER N.S.D.A.P. (commonly known as the "SA") and the GENERAL STAFF and HIGH COMMAND of the GERMAN ARMED FORCES all as defined in Appendix B of the Indictment,

Defendants.

PREFACE

This Supplement B brings to completion the series of volumes on "Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression" in which the principal documents and other papers pertaining to the prosecution at Nurnberg of the major German war criminals have been made generally available to the American public.

Space limitations, made necessary by the limited funds available, have made impossible the full publication of all defense documents. The final arguments of defense counsel and defendants' final pleas summarize in considerable detail not only the defense contentions, but also the defense evidence. Both the arguments, as delivered before the Tribunal, and the pleas are contained in Part I of this volume, and they should furnish an adequate basis on which to evaluate prosecution documents and the final judgment of the Tribunal itself. Part I also includes a few defense documents which appear to have unique historical interest. The text of all defense documents, including those referred to in the final arguments of defense counsel, may of course be obtained from the official transcript of the Tribunal published by the Secretariat of the International Military Tribunal. The title of this publication is "Trial of the Major War Criminals, Nuremberg." The text of most of the prosecution documents referred to in the closing arguments will be found in prior volumes of this series.

Part II of this volume contains excerpts from interrogations conducted by the prosecution of most of the defendants and of many other witnesses. Space limitations have again made full publication impossible except in a few cases, since several hundred witnesses were interrogated in the course of almost a thousand separate interrogations, and the transcript total exceeds 17,000 typewritten pages. The passages here included have therefore been chosen as those which appear to be the most significant from the standpoint of their general historical interest, their bearing on the issues raised in the case, and in some instances, the light which they shed on the character or personality of certain defendants.

Practically all the interrogations were conducted by examiners on the American prosecution staff, headed by Col. John Harlan Amen. Almost all the interrogations of defendants were taken before trial. In the majority of cases defendants were not interrogated after they were served with the indictment on 18

October 1945. Interrogations of non-defendant witnesses, however, were taken at various times both before and during trial.

Although the testimony of most of the witnesses was given under oath, that of Goering and a few others was not. The reader may wish, in any event, to bear in mind that because of the circumstances, statements of many of the witnesses were obviously made with a view to self-vindication, and that veracity is more generally to be expected with regard to matters not touching the personal responsibility of the particular witness.

Grateful acknowledgment must be made of the assistance furnished in the selection and editing of these interrogations by former members of the American Prosecution and Tribunal staffs—Messrs. Ralph G. Albrecht, Lawrence A. Coleman, Adrian Fisher, Sam Harris, Seymour Krieger, Harold Leventhal, James Rowe, Melvin H. Siegel and Roy Steyer.

The funds which made possible the publication of this volume, as in the case of its predecessors, were made available by the Departments of State and of the Army.

28 May 1948

Charles A. Horsky
William E. Jackson
Alma F. Soller
Editors

Approved:

Robert H. Jackson
U. S. Chief of Counsel

CONTENTS

PART I—The Defense Case

		Page
Preface		iv
Chapter
I. Defense Motion Challenging Jurisdiction of Tribunal	1
II. The Breach of Peace Between States and its Culpability— Argument on the law of the case by Dr. Hermann Jahr- reiss on behalf of all Defense Counsel	3
III. Hermann Wilhelm Goering Final Argument by Dr. Otto Stahmer, Defense Counsel... Final Plea by Hermann Wilhelm Goering	43	88
IV. Rudolf Hess Final Argument by Dr. Alfred Seidl, Defense Counsel... Final Plea by Rudolf Hess	92	133
	Affidavit of Friedrich Gaus and Secret Additional Protocol	138
V. Joachim von Ribbentrop Final Argument by Dr. Martin Horn, Defense Counsel... Final Plea by Joachim von Ribbentrop	143	189
VI. Wilhelm Keitel Final Argument by Dr. Otto Nelte, Defense Counsel..... Final Plea by Wilhelm Keitel	191	272
VII. Ernst Kaltenbrunner Final Argument by Dr. Kurt Kauffmann, Defense Counsel Final Plea by Ernst Kaltenbrunner	275	299
VIII. Alfred Rosenberg Final Argument by Dr. Alfred Thoma, Defense Counsel... Final Plea by Alfred Rosenberg	302	363
IX. Hans Frank Final Argument by Dr. Alfred Seidl, Defense Counsel... Final Plea by Hans Frank	365	398
X. Wilhelm Frick Final Argument by Dr. Otto Pannenbecker, Defense Counsel	400
	Final Plea by Wilhelm Frick	428
XI. Julius Streicher Final Argument by Dr. Hans Marx, Defense Counsel	428
	Final Plea by Julius Streicher	459
XII. Walter Funk Final Argument by Dr. Fritz Sauter, Defense Counsel... Final Plea by Walter Funk	460	499
XIII. Hjalmar Schacht Final Argument by Dr. Rudolf Dix, Defense Counsel	501
	Final Plea by Hjalmar Schacht	541
XIV. Karl Doenitz Final Argument by Dr. Otto Kranzbuehler, Defense Counsel	543
	Final Plea by Karl Doenitz	602
XV. Erich Raeder Final Argument by Dr. Walter Siemers, Defense Counsel Final Plea by Dr. Erich Raeder	603	661
XVI. Baldur von Schirach Final Argument by Dr. Fritz Sauter, Defense Counsel... Final Plea by Baldur von Schirach	662	696
XVII. Fritz Sauckel Final Argument by Dr. Robert Servatius, Defense Counsel	699
	Final Plea by Fritz Sauckel	740

Chapter		Page
XVIII.	Alfred Jodl Final Argument by Dr. Franz Exner, Defense Counsel... Final Plea by Alfred Jodl	744 790
XIX.	Franz von Papen Final Argument by Dr. Egon Kubuschok, Defense Counsel Final Plea by Franz von Papen	791 842
XX.	Artur Seyss-Inquart Final Argument by Dr. Gustav Steinbauer, Defense Counsel	843
	Final Plea by Artur Seyss-Inquart	892
XXI.	Albert Speer Final Argument by Dr. Hans Flaechsner, Defense Counsel Final Plea by Albert Speer	895 934 937
XXII.	Constantin von Neurath Final Argument by Dr. Otto von Luedinghausen, Defense Counsel	958
	Final Plea by Constantin von Neurath	1032
XXIII.	Hans Fritzsche Final Argument by Dr. Heinz Fritz, Defense Counsel..... Final Plea by Hans Fritzsche	1032 1072
XXIV.	Martin Bormann Final Argument by Dr. Friedrich Bergold, Defense Counsel	1075

PART II—Pre-Trial Interrogations

I.	Hermann Wilhelm Goering Refusal to Take Oath Before Testifying	1087
	Hossbach's Records of Hitler's War Conferences	1088
	Hitler's 1937 Planning for Aggression	1091
	Goering's Part in the Obersalzberg Speech	1102
	Planning the Invasion of Poland	1103
	Plans for Occupation of Denmark and Norway	1106
	Invasion Plans for Russia and the Balkans	1107
	Responsibility for Armament Program	1111
	Hitler Discounts Possibility of America Entering War....	1114
	Hitler's Role as Strategist in the West	1115
	Schmundt's Minutes of Hitler's War Conferences	1117
	Use of POW's for Forced Labor in War Industries	1120
	Goering's Part in the Anschluss	1129
	Goering's Opinion of Hitler's and Bormann's Fate	1135
	Goering's Tip to Guido Schmidt on the Anschluss	1136
	Goering's Plan for Disposing of His Art Collection	1136
	How Goering Obtained His Art Collection	1138
	Goering's Estimate of His Income	1143
	Decree Re "Criminal Attacks on Party and State"	1144
	Goering's Opinion of Hess's Mental State	1145
	Early Nazi Operations in Austria	1145
	The Dollfuss Murder	1146
	Von Papen's Mission in Austria	1149
	Reasons Why Schacht Left Economics Ministry and Reichsbank	1151
	Goering's Relations with Schacht	1154
II.	Rudolf Hess Hess Claims Loss of Memory	1154
	Knowledge without Memory	1156
	"Thought Association" but Not Recollection	1158
	First Reunion with Old Friends and Associates	1160
	Advantage or Disadvantage of Loss of Memory Before Trial	1170
	Insignificance of Indictment	1172
	Continual Loss of Memory	1173

Chapter		Page
III.	Joachim von Ribbentrop
	Quisling's Slush Fund	1174
	Armaments and the League of Nations	1175
	Armaments and the Versailles Treaty	1176
	Ribbentrop's Role in Hitler's Accession to Power	1177
	Ribbentrop's Loyalty to the Fuehrer	1178
	Hitler's Views on Anglo-German Friendship	1178
	"My Foreign Office—The House of Difficulties"	1182
	"Military Necessity" for Invasions of Belgium and Holland	1183
	Norwegian, Balkan Invasions "Forced" upon Hitler	1183
	Negotiations with Stalin and Molotov, and Invasion of U.S.S.R.	1186
	The Nazi View of German-American Relations	1194
	Effect of U.S.-Japanese Relations on Germany	1200
	The Enemy "Forced" Hitler to Go Everywhere in Europe	1202
	Hitler's Refusal to Initiate Peace Discussions	1203
	Hitler's Hope for Victory Till the End	1204
	Excuse for Attacking Poland	1205
	General Karl Wolff—Intercessor with Himmler	1205
	Why Hitler Occupied Hungary	1206
	The Responsibility for Concentration Camp Deaths	1207
	Events Leading Up to German Occupation of Hungary....	1208
	Hitler's Distrust of the Foreign Office	1212
	Ribbentrop's Unsuccessful Ambassadorship in London	1214
	Negotiations with England Regarding German Colonies	1216
	Responsibility for Arrest of Prominent Frenchmen	1217
	Collaboration with Petain and Laval	1218
	Excuse for Occasional Memory Lapses	1220
	"The Fuehrer Is Dead"	1222
	Ribbentrop's Ignorance of German Foreign Policy	1223
	Ribbentrop's Differences with Hitler on "Weltanschaung"	1226
	Why Ribbentrop Did Not Resign	1227
	Ribbentrop's Ignorance of What Went on in Concentration Camps	1230
	Ribbentrop's "Opposition" to Policy toward Churches	1232
	Ribbentrop's Position on Extermination of Jews	1239
	Effect of Trial Verdict on German People	1240
	When The War Became "Terrible" for Germany	1241
	Explanation of Difference Between Communism and Nazism	1242
	Extent of Ribbentrop's Assumption of "Responsibility"	1244
	German Peace Overtures	1248
	The Hitler-Chamberlain Conference at Godesburg	1251
	The Decision to Invade Poland	1252
	German Ultimatum to Chamberlain at Berchtesgaden	1252
	The Meaning of "Weltauffassung"	1255
IV.	Wilhelm Keitel
	The Truth about Rommel's "Suicide"	1256
	Hitler's Reaction to Hess's Flight to England	1271
	Hitler's Return to Berlin in April 1945	1273
	Hitler's Last Days in Berlin	1275
	Keitel's Analysis of Hitler's Character and Traits	1284
	Hitler's Relations with Eva Braun	1294
V.	Ernst Kaltenbrunner
	Kaltenbrunner's Opinion of Ribbentrop and His Diplomacy	1295
	Hitler's "Inner Circle"	1297
	Responsibility for Concentration Camps	1298
	Responsibility for Mobile Gas Chamber	1299
	Kaltenbrunner's Stand on Concentration Camps	1300
	"The Gestapo Never Harmed Anyone"	1303
	Hitler's Antipathy to Lawyers and Educated Men	1305
	"I Will Be Hanged in any Case"	1306
	Was Hitler a Criminal?	1307

Chapter		Page
V.	Ernst Kaltenbrunner—Concluded
	Use of Prisoners for Broadcasts to Allied Troops	1308
	The Mass Execution at Lublin	1309
	Lynching of Enemy “Terror Aviators”	1311
	Skorzeny’s Use of American Equipment at Friedenthal	1314
	Kaltenbrunner Considers Himself “A Substitute Guilty Party”	1315
	Absorption of the Abwehr into the RSHA	1316
	Treatment of Commandos and Airborne Troops	1318
	Kaltenbrunner Denies Observing Gassings at Mauthausen	1320
	Shooting of Prisoners of War	1320
	Treatment of Commandos and Airborne Troops	1322
VI.	Alfred Rosenberg
	Nazi Dealings with Quisling	1326
	Origin and Activities of the Hohe Schule	1332
	Looting of Libraries and Art by Einsatzstab Rosenberg	1336
	Reasons for Harsh Treatment of Eastern Peoples	1347
	“The Final Solution of the Jewish Problem”	1352
VII.	Hans Frank
	Rise of the Nazi Party Lawyer	1356
	Frank Claims He Opposed the Fuehrer’s Lawlessness	1359
	The Aim of Nazi Law	1361
	Investigation of Conditions at Dachau in 1933	1361
	The Differences between Legality and Illegality	1363
	The German People—“Hitler’s Private Property”	1364
	Treatment of Jews in Government General of Poland	1367
	Frank’s View of “The Jewish Problem”	1373
	Persecution of the Jews in Poland	1374
	Administration and Exploitation of Poland	1379
	Frank Claims Ignorance of Concentration Camps	1385
	Frank’s “Safeguarding” of Polish Art Treasures	1386
	Deportation of Slave Labor in Poland	1387
	Pillage of Agricultural and Food Products	1388
	Reasons for Polish Hostility towards Germany	1389
	Misconceptions Regarding Frank’s Regime	1392
	Introduction of Compulsory Labor Service	1392
	Support of Anti-Jewish Congress in Cracow	1397
	Economic Spoliation of Poland	1397
VIII.	Wilhelm Frick
	Decrees for Persecution of the Jews	1400
	Frick’s Part in the Reichstag, and Views on Jewish Rights	1407
	Events Leading to Hitler’s Acquisition of Power	1410
	The Reichstag Fire	1413
	Law-Making in a One-Party State	1414
IX.	Julius Streicher
	Origin and Development of Streicher’s Anti-Semitism	1420
	Streicher Summarizes His Jewish Policy: Zionism	1424
	What Streicher Meant by “Extermination”	1426
	Streicher Disowns the Fruits of His Policy	1436
X.	Erich Raeder
	Reasons for Navy’s Defiance of Versailles Treaty	1437
	Competitive Rearmament of the German Navy	1438
XI.	Fritz Sauckel
	Hitler Legalizes the Slave Labor Program	1441
	Economics of the German Wage Problem	1443
	Sauckel’s Statement of Innocence After Reading Indictment	1447
XII.	Franz von Papen
	German Governmental Crises, 1932-1933	1449
	How Hitler Became Chancellor of the Reich	1457
	Papen’s Doubts Concerning Hitler	1459
	Papen’s Part in Hitler’s Rise to Power	1460
	Removal of Social Democrats from Power in Prussia	1461

Chapter		Page
XII.	Franz von Papen—Concluded
	Hitler's Conferences with von Hindenburg, 1932	1463
	Reasons for Papen's Resignation from Chancellorship...	1464
	Papen's Desire for Nazis in the Government	1465
	Undermining and Dismissal of Schleicher	1466
	Papen's Opposition to the Nazi Doctrine	1467
	Papen's Sponsoring of Seyss-Inquart in Austria	1467
	Reasons for Papen's Disappointment in Seyss-Inquart...	1468
	Religious Questions as Obstacle to Anschluss	1469
	Papen's Knowledge of the Rearmament Program	1470
	Hitler: "The Greatest Crook I Have Ever Seen"	1471
	Papen Soothes Distrust of Hitler	1471
	First Steps Toward Anschluss	1472
	The German-Austrian Accord of July 11, 1936	1474
	Papen's Version of His Position in Austria	1475
	Papen's Opinion of Keitel	1476
	Nazi Misuse of Hindenburg's Testament with Papen's Acquiescence	1476
	Papen's Justification of His Service under the Nazis	1483
	Papen's Opinion of Hess's Mental Condition	1484
	Papen's View of His Responsibility for the War	1484
XIII.	Artur Seyss-Inquart
	Seyss-Inquart's Views on von Papen and His Part in the Anschluss	1487
XIV.	Constantin von Neurath
	The Disarmament Question	1488
	The Organization "Auslandsdeutsche"	1490
	Rosenberg's "Confused" Ideas	1490
	Why Hitler Made Ribbentrop Foreign Minister	1491
	The "Bureau Ribbentrop"	1491
	Development of the German-Italian Alliance	1492
	The Decree for Registration of Germans Living Abroad	1493
	Relation of French-Soviet Pact to Rhineland Occupation	1494
	Dispute over Restoration of the Habsburgs	1499
	German Justification for Reoccupation of the Rhineland...	1500
	Promises to Uphold the Versailles Treaty	1500
	Pre-Anschluss Pressure on Schuschnigg	1501
	Germany's Reasons for Leaving Disarmament Conference and League of Nations	1503
	Nazi Agitation in Austria	1505
	The German Part in the Spanish Civil War	1505
	Purpose of German-Austrian Agreement of 11 July, 1936	1507
XV.	Hans Fritzsche
	Views on German Aggression and Hitler's Guilt	1509
	Fritzsche's Part in the Werewolf Movement	1512
XVI.	Robert Ley
	How the Nazis Took Over the Labor Unions	1514
	Ley's Statements After Reading the Indictment	1520
XVII.	Max Amann
	Nazi Acquisition and Suppression of the German Press....	1521
XVIII.	Gottlieb Berger
	The Fate of Red Cross Parcels for War Prisoners	1533
XIX.	Nikolaus von Falkenhorst
	Planning and Execution of the Attack on Norway	1534
XX.	Franz Halder
	Plots to Overthrow the Nazi Government, 1938-40	1547
	Reasons for Failure to Carry Out Plot Before Invasion of Poland	1560
	Factors Which Turned Generals Against Hitler	1564
	Difference Between Hitler and Generals in War Against West	1565
	Friction Between Schacht and Goerdeler	1570
	Why the Plot Finally Fizzled	1571

Chapter		Page
XXI.	Hans Richard Hemmen Occupation Costs Imposed on France by Germany	1575
XXII.	Oswald Pohl Diversion of Concentration Camp Labor to Armament Industries	1580
	The Extermination of Jews at Auschwitz	1581
	Transfer of Valuables from Concentration Camp Victims to Reichsbank	1582
	Deposit of Gold Fillings with the Reichsbank	1583
	Himmler Dresses SS Men in Clothes of Dead Jews	1587
	Funk's Implication in Looting of Concentration Camp Victims	1589
	Extermination of Mental Patients	1590
	Execution of Concentration Camp Inmates Needed for Labor	1590
	Use of Concentration Camp Labor in I. G. Farben Plants	1591
	German Firms Which Used Concentration Camp Labor....	1593
	Himmler's Desire to Save Jews from Bargaining in Peace Negotiations	1595
	Composition and Activities of "Himmler's Friends"	1596
	Disposition of Concentration Camp Inmates as Allied Armies Pushed into Germany	1599
	Who Was Responsible for the Concentration Camps?.....	1600
	Confiscation of Czech Property after Conquest of Czechoslovakia	1602
	Widespread Knowledge of Conditions in Concentration Camps	1603
	Number of Concentration Camp Inmates Available as Laborers	1605
XXIII.	Hermann Reinecke Branding and Other Inhumane Treatment of Russian Prisoners of War	1606
XXIV.	Walter Schellenberg Negotiations for Evacuation of Jews in Return for Asylum for High Nazis	1621
	Use of Russian P/W's Behind the Russian Lines	1623
	Failure of German Intelligence on U.S. Atom Bomb	1624
	German Intelligence on D-Day Invasion	1625
	German Activities in Argentina	1627
	Use of Astrology to Turn Himmler Against Hitler	1629
	Himmler's Efforts to Remove Hitler and Make Peace	1631
XXV.	Walter Warlimont German Aid to Franco During Spanish Civil War	1634
	Genesis of Hitler's Plan to Attack Russia	1635
	Mihailovich's Collaboration with the Germans	1637
	Balkan Collaboration with the Germans	1639
XXVI.	Adolf Westhoff The Murder of RAF Prisoners of War at Sagan	1641
	Efforts to Abide by Geneva Convention Thwarted by "Orders from Above"	1643
	The Geneva Convention—"A Piece of Paper"	1645
	The Shackling of Prisoners of War	1646
XXVII.	Siegfried Westphal OKW Orders for Brutal Treatment of Italian Partisans	1647
	Treatment of Allied Commandos in Africa	1650
	Massacre of Hostages at the Ardeatine Caves	1651
XXVIII.	Karl Wolff German Atrocities in Italy: Mussolini's Complaints Ignored	1652
	Stringent Measures Used Against Italian Partisans	1663
	Biographical Index of Principal Persons Referred to in Interrogations	1678

PART I

THE DEFENSE CASE

I. DEFENSE MOTION CHALLENGING JURISDICTION OF TRIBUNAL

[Translation from the German]

20 November 1945

To: The International Military Tribunal in Nurnberg
In re: GOERING et al.

Two fearful world wars and the violent clashes by which the peace among the states has been violated in this period between these big conflicts which have engulfed the earth have made mature this wisdom among the tormented nations; a real order among the states is impossible as long as every state has the sovereign right to wage war at any time and for any purpose. Within the last decade public opinion of the world became more and more opposed to the idea that the decision to wage war is beyond good and evil. Public opinion distinguishes between just and unjust wars. It demands that the community of nations calls to account a state which wages an unjust war and denies this state, in the event of victory, the fruits of its violation. Yes, it has been demanded that not only the guilty state is condemned and is made liable, but that beyond this, the men who are guilty of launching the unjust war should be punished by an international tribunal. In this point, one goes farther now than even the strictest legal minds since the early middle ages. This idea is the basis of the first of the three accusations of this indictment, the crimes against the peace. Humanity wishes that in the future this idea will be more than a postulate, that it will become valid international law.

But today it is not yet existing international law. Neither the statute of the League of Nations of this world organization against war, nor the Kellogg-Briand Pact, nor any other treaty which has been concluded after 1918 in that first wave of attempts to outlaw aggressive war has realized this idea. But above all, the practice of the League of Nations has been quite unequivocal in this point until the most recent time. Repeatedly the League had to decide upon the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the forceable action of one member of the League against another. But always international law has never even thought of incriminating statesmen, generals, and economic leaders of the state, using force, still less to bring these men before an international criminal court. And when, this summer, in San Francisco the new world peace organization was established, no rule of law was created under which in the future an international court will punish those persons who launch an unjust war.

DEFENSE

As far as crimes against the peace are concerned, the present trial has therefore no legal basis in international law but is a procedure based on new penal law; a penal law which has been created only after the act. This is in contradiction to a legal principle which is cherished in the world. It has been violated partially in Hitler-Germany. This violation has been emphatically disapproved within and without the Reich. This principle is the maxim: Punishment is only possible if a law has been violated, which was in existence at the time the act was committed and which provided punishment. This maxim is one of the great principles of the states, especially of the signatory powers of the charter of this tribunal, of England since the middle ages, of the United States of America since its birth, of France since the great revolution, and of the Soviet Union. When the Control Council for Germany promulgated a recent law the restitution of this principle was ordered: No punishment without a law which already existed when the act was committed.

This principle is not a matter of opportunism but is based on the knowledge that every defendant must feel treated unjustly if he is punished under law created ex post facto.

The defense attorneys of all defendants present in court would violate their duty if they would take silently the abandonment of existing international law and the repulsion of a generally recognized principle of modern criminal law. They are not able to suppress objections, which are today openly expressed even outside Germany. This applies the more as the defense counsellors are unanimously convinced that this trial could serve the progress of the world order even to a much higher degree if the trial would not withdraw from existing international law. Where acts for which no punishment was provided at the time they were committed are involved, the procedure would have to limit itself to a comprehensive investigation of what has happened. In such a case the defense, as a genuine helper of the court, would fully cooperate. Under the impact of such judicial statement the community of law-abiding nations should then create law in order to establish punishment for such individuals who start in future intentionally an unjust war.

Furthermore, the defense is of the opinion, that also other rules of the statute are inconsistent with the legal principles: Nulla poena sine lege.

The defense feels also obligated to point out right now another popularity which differs from generally recognized principle of modern criminal procedure:

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

The judges are only appointed by such states, which belong to the one side of this war.

This side is everything in one: creator of the Charter, of the penal law, prosecutor, and judge. That this ought not to be so, used to be general legal opinion. The United States of America have always emphasized when international arbitration and jurisdiction was established that the bench should be filled by neutrals or by neutrals together with representatives of all parties involved.

In the permanent international court in the Hague this idea has been realized in a manner which may serve as an example.

In view of the complexity and difficulty of these legal problems the defense now moves: The Tribunal may secure from internationally recognized experts on international law an expert opinion about the legal basis of this trial which is based on the rules of this tribunal.

On behalf of the attorneys for all defendants who are present.

Dr. STAHLER

[On November 21, 1945, in the morning session, the Tribunal made the following ruling in regard to the foregoing motion.
—Ed.]

A motion has been filed with the Tribunal and the Tribunal has given it consideration. Insofar as it may be a plea to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, it conflicts with Article 3 of the Charter and will not be entertained. Insofar as it may contain other arguments, which may be opened to the Defendants, they may be heard at a later stage.

II. THE BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES AND ITS CULPABILITY

by Dr. Hermann Jahrreiss

Mr. President:

May it please the Tribunal.

The main juridical and fundamental question of this trial concerns war, which is forbidden by international law, the breach of peace as treason to the world constitution.

It overshadows all other juridical questions.

The four chief prosecutors discussed this problem in their opening speeches, sometimes as the central problem of their presentation, sometimes as a fundamental problem and indeed not without looking at it from different perspectives.

Counsel for the defense has to examine it now. From among the defense counsel, I have been asked to conduct this examination. It is true that it remains for every counsel to decide if and to what extent he feels himself in a position, as a result of my arguments, to renounce his own presentation of the question of the breach of the peace. But I have reason to believe that this possibility will be used to such an extent that the intention of the counsel for the defense, considerably to simplify technically that part of the trial which is now beginning, will be realized by my speech.

DEFENSE

I have to deal here only with the juridical question and not with the evaluation of the hearing of evidence which has lasted for months. And I am also dealing only with the question of such law as is at present valid, not with the question of such law as could or should be demanded in the name of ethics or of human progress.

I have a purely scientific task to fulfill. Science wants nothing but the truth, knowing full well that its goal can never be completely attained and that its path is therefore without end.

I wish to thank the Secretary General of the Tribunal for having placed at my disposal the documents of a decisive nature and very important literature. Without this chivalrous assistance it would not have been possible, under the present conditions in Germany, to complete my work. The literature accessible to me was published predominantly in the United States. Knowing the vast French and English technical literature on this subject which I have studied during the last quarter of a century—I am unfortunately not conversant with the Russian language—I believe, however, that I can fairly say that no important idea is overlooked, because in no other country of the world has the discussion of our problem, which has become the great problem of humanity, been more comprehensive and more fundamental than in the United States.

It was this fact that enabled me to forego the use of the scientific literature published in the former German sphere of control. In this way even the semblance of a pro domo line of argumentation will be avoided.

Because of the short time at my disposal for this speech and, at the same time, owing to the abundance and difficulty of the problems with which I have to deal, it is not possible to read here the documents and quotations which I am using. I shall present only a few sentences. Any other procedure would interrupt the line of argumentation for the listener. I therefore submit to the Tribunal the documents and references to books in appendices to my juridical arguments. In this way, what I say can be quickly verified today, tomorrow, and thereafter.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

The Charter threatens individuals with punishments for breach of the peace between states. And it appears that the Tribunal accepts the Charter as the unquestionable basis for all juridical considerations. This means that the Tribunal does not examine the question whether the Charter is, as a whole or in parts, open to juridical objections, a question which nevertheless remains open.

If this is so, why then make any statements at all here on the great fundamental legal questions?

The British Chief Prosecutor even made it the central theme of his great address to examine the relationship of the Charter, where our question is concerned, to the international public law at present valid. He justified the necessity of his arguments as follows: It is the task of this Tribunal to serve humanity, and this task could only be fulfilled by the trial if the Charter was consistent with international law, that is, if the punishment of individuals for breach of the peace between states was founded in the international law at present valid.

It is, indeed, necessary to clarify whether certain stipulations of the Charter may have created new laws and consequently laws with retroactive force.

Such a clarification is not carried out here in order to serve historical research students work. They will examine this, just as they will all the other findings in this trial, according to the rules of free science, perhaps through many years of work and certainly without limiting the ground covered by the questions and, if possible, on the basis of an incomparably greater quantity of documents and evidence.

Such a clarification is indispensable, simply for the reason that the decision as to right and wrong depends, or may depend, upon it, particularly if the Charter is considered legally unassailable.

Let us assume that it were thus: The Charter does not formulate criminal law which is already valid, but creates new and therefore retroactive criminal law. What does this signify for the verdict? Must this not be important for the question of guilt?

Perhaps the retroactive law which, for instance, penalizes aggressive war was not already fixed in the conscience of humanity at the time when the act was committed, nor was the ground even simply prepared for it there. Then the defendant cannot be guilty in the sense that he was aware of the wrongfulness of his behavior, not before himself nor before others.

DEFENSE

Or the retroactive law was perhaps promulgated at a time when a new conscience was just beginning to take shape but was still not clear or not general. It is then in any case possible that the defendant is not guilty in the sense that he was aware of the wrongfulness of his commissions and omissions.

At any rate, from the point of view of continental European thought on penal law, the fact that a person was not aware of doing wrong is a point which the Tribunal must not overlook.

Now the question as to whether the penal law contained in the Charter is ex post facto penal law does not present any difficulties if the stipulations of the Charter are unequivocal and the prescriptions of international law to date are uncontested.

But what if we have regulations capable of several interpretations before us, or if the rules of international law are the subject of controversy?

Let us take the first: A stipulation of the Charter is ambiguous and therefore needs interpreting. According to one interpretation which can be justified, the stipulation appears to be an ex post facto law, according to another, which can be equally well justified, it does not.

Let us take the second: The regulation is clear or has been clarified by the interpretation of the court, but experts on international law are of different opinions on the legal position to date: It is not certain whether we have not got an ex post facto law before us.

In both cases it is relevant whether the defendant was conscious of the wrongfulness of his behavior.

I intend to elucidate how important these considerations are in this trial.

I shall now begin the examination. The starting points of the British and French Chief Prosecutors are fundamentally different. The British Chief Prosecutor argued as follows, if I understood him correctly:

(1) The unrestricted right of states to wage war was partly eliminated by the League of Nations Covenant and later fundamentally by the Briand-Kellogg Pact, which is the core of the world peace order which still continues to be equally valid today. War which it prohibits is a punishable violation of law within and towards the community of nations.

And the individual who has acted in a responsible position is punishable.

(2) The indictment of individuals for breach of the peace is, indeed, something new, but not only morally demanded, but also long overdue in the course of legal developments; in fact it is simply the logical consequence of the new legal position. The Charter only appears to create new law.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

And if I understood the British Chief Prosecutor correctly, he asserts:

Since the conclusion of the Pact of Paris, there is a clear legal situation, based on the whole world's uniform convictions as to what is right. Since 1927 the United States have negotiated, first with France, then with the remaining great powers, with the exception of the Soviet Union, and with some of the smaller powers, concerning the conclusion of a treaty intended to abolish war. Secretary of State Kellogg stated with memorable insistence what the government in Washington was striving for, namely:

The powers should renounce war as an instrument of national policy¹ and this without legal definitions² from a practical point of view³, with purity and simplicity⁴, unequivocally and without qualifications⁵ or reservations⁶. For otherwise the object desired could not be attained:⁷

To abolish war as an institution, i.e. as an institution of international law.⁸

After the negotiations had been concluded, Aristide Briand, the other of the two statesmen, from whose initiative the pact, which in Germany is often called the pact to outlaw war (Kriegsaechtungspakt), springs, declared when it was signed in Paris:⁹

"Formerly deemed a divine right and remaining in international law as a prerogative of sovereignty, such a war has now at last been legally stripped of that which constituted its greatest danger: its legality. Branded henceforth as illegal, it is truly outlawed by agreement. * * *"

According to the conception of both leading statesmen, the Paris Pact meant a change of the world-order at its very roots, if only all or almost all the nations of the world, and particularly all the great powers, signed the pact or adhered to it later on, as did actually happen.

¹ Note of Secretary of State Kellogg to the French ambassador 27 Feb 1928, App. I, Exhibit 1, page 3, passage (2).

² Ibid. App. I, Exhibit 1, p. 3, passage (4).

³ Ibid. App. I, Exhibit 1, p. 3, passage (1).

⁴ Ibid. App. I, Exhibit 1, p. 4, passage (5).

⁵ Ibid. App. I, Exhibit 1, p. 3, passage (2).

⁶ Ibid. App. I, Exhibit 1, p. 4, passage (6).

⁷ Ibid. App. I, Exhibit 1, p. 3, passage (4) and p. 4, passage (6).

⁸ Note of the United States Government to the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, Italy, and Japan of 13 April 1928, App. I, Exhibit 2, p. 5, passage (1).

⁹ The speech of the French Foreign Minister is printed in The Department of State, Treaty for the Renunciation of War, United States Government Printing Office. The quotation is to be found on page 309.

DEFENSE

The change is supposed to be the following:

Up to the time of the Briand-Kellogg Pact, war had been an institution of international law. Since the Briand-Kellogg Pact war was high treason against the order created by international law.

Many politicians and scholars all over the world shared this conception. It is the definite basic conception of the unique commentary on the League of Nations Covenant by which Jean Ray influenced far beyond the borders of France, the practical and theoretical proponents of the idea of preventing war.¹⁰

It is also the basic conception of the Indictment at Nurnberg.

Diplomacy and the science of international law found their way back into the old tracks after the first World War after a shock from which they recovered remarkably quickly. This to the horror of those who wanted to see the consequences—all the consequences—drawn from the catastrophe.

Mankind had a “grand vision of world peace” then, as Senator Bruce called it when the Pact of Paris was before the Senate for ratification.¹¹ I know how much the personality and the achievements of Woodrow Wilson are a subject of dispute.

But the more detachment we achieve, the clearer it becomes that he—by making happy use of his own preparatory work and that of others¹²—finally conceived and presented to the humanity of the time an entirely brilliant train of thought which is as right today as it was then and which can best be condensed as follows:

It is necessary to start afresh. The tragic chain of wars and mere armistices which are called peace must be broken.

For once humanity must have the insight and the will to pass from war to real peace—i.e. to peace which is good in its essence—on existing legal foundations, without regard to victory or defeat; and this peace which is good in its essence must be maintained—and maintained in good condition—by an organized union of States. These aims can only be achieved if the most frequent causes of war, namely excessive armaments, secret treaties and the consecration of the status quo as a result of the lack of insight of the current owner—a consecration which is harmful to vital needs—are eliminated.

¹⁰ Commentaire du Pacte de la Societe des Nations selon la politique et la jurisprudence des organes de la Societe. Paris 1930. (See especially p. 73 seq.) Further in the supplements for 1931-1935: 1er Suppl. au Commentaire du Pacte (1931) p. 13 seq.; 2e Suppl. (1932) p. 17 seq; 3e Suppl. (1933) p. 18, 39; 4e Suppl. (1935) p. 19, 99.

¹¹ Congress. Rec., Proceed. and Deb. of the 2nd Sess. of the 70th Congr. of the U.S. vol. LXX-Part. 2, p. 1833.

¹² See Baker, Ray Stannard, Woodrow Wilson and World Settlement. New York 1922 passim.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

Humanity did not follow this path. And it is not to be wondered at that amongst those who fought against the instruments of Versailles, St. Germain, Trianon, Neuilly, and Sevres, be it in the camp of the vanquished or in that of the victors, were the very ones who strove after real, lasting peace. When the governments of the South African Union and Canada, in their replies to Secretary of State Hull's principles of enduring peace of the 16th July 1937, indicated in unusually strong words that an alteration of unjust, imposed treaties was an indispensable precondition for real world peace, they followed one of the fundamental views of the great American president.¹³

Humanity did not follow Wilson.

For the members of the League of Nations, too, war remained a means for settling disputes prohibited only in individual cases, but normal on the whole. So said Jean Ray as late as 1930.¹⁴ The League of Nations did not prove to be a guide to the true order of Peace, indeed it did not even prove to be a sufficient brake on a complete backsliding into the old state. For, in fact, the world slid back entirely.

This is then the all-decisive fact in our problem of law.

Before the commencement of the second World War the whole system of collective security, even in the scanty beginnings it had made, had collapsed¹⁵, and this collapse was acknowledged and declared expressly, or shown by unambiguous actions, by three world powers—and, in fact, declared with full justification:

Great Britain expressly stated this at the beginning of the war to the League of Nations. I shall show this. The Soviet Union treated the German-Polish conflict simply according to the rules of classic international law concerning debellatio. I shall explain this. The United States declared their strict neutrality. I shall explain the import of this declaration.

The system of collective security has been much disputed over. In this question of the world's conscience, which is also of fundamental importance in this trial, it cannot be a matter of indifference that this system, rightly or wrongly, appeared in 1938 to ¹³ See KUHN, Arthur K., Observations of Foreign Governments upon Secretary Hull's Principles of Enduring Peace (A. J. vol. 32 (1938), p. 101-106/ App. II, Exhibit 51, p. 146 passages (5), (5a) (6). Also: WILSON, Woodrow, War and Peace. Presidential Messages, Addresses and Public Papers, 1917-1924 (ed by Ray Stannard Baker and William E. Dodd), New York 1927.

¹⁴ Commentaire, page 74.

¹⁵ Regarding the indisputable fact of the collapse and the responsibility of the Great Powers for this, see the bitter conclusions reached by FENWICK from the period shortly before the second World War (International Law and Lawless Nations. A. J., vol. 33 (1939), p. 743-745) App. II, Exhibit 55, page 157 seq., particularly p. 159, passage (6).

DEFENSE

such a prominent specialist on international law as the American, Edwin Borchard, as absolutely inimical to peace and as the child of the hysteria of our age;¹⁶ and the collapse may have had various causes; it is certain that the above-mentioned three world powers testified at the beginning of September 1939 to the collapse—the complete collapse—and that they did not in fact do this as a consequence of the German-Polish war.

1. On the 7 September 1939 the British Foreign Office told the Secretary-General of the League of Nations:¹⁷

The British Government had assumed the obligation on the 5 February 1930 to appear before the Permanent International Court of Justice at the Hague whenever an action is brought against Great Britain, i.e., also in the case of actions which other states might bring on account of conduct by which Great Britain had, in the opinion of the plaintiff, violated international law during a war. The British government had accepted this regulation because it had relied on the machinery of collective security created by the League of Nations Covenant and the Pact of Paris functioning: because, if it did function—and as England would of course not conduct any forbidden wars and her opponent would on the contrary be the aggressor—a collision between England and those states that were faithful to the security machinery could not possibly be caused by the actions of British seapower.¹⁸ However the British government had been disappointed in what it relied on: Ever since the League Assembly of 1938, it had no longer been possible to doubt that the security machinery would not function: on the contrary, it had in fact collapsed completely: a number of members of the League had already declared their strict neutrality before the outbreak of war:

“The entire machinery intended to maintain peace has broken down.”¹⁹

I shall still have to show how right the British government was in the conclusions it drew. It should not be forgotten that the British Premier, Neville Chamberlain, had already proclaimed on the 22 February 1938 in the House of Commons, i.e. before the ¹⁶ Neutralité et Unneutralité (A.J., vol. 32, (1938) p. 778, seq/App. II, Exhibit 53, p. 151, passages (2) (3) (1), and p. 154 passage (15).

¹⁷ See App. I, Exhibit 33, page 98, including the Memorandum on the Signature by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom of the Optional Clause of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice (Cmd.3452.) Miscellaneous No. 12 (1929), an extract of which is given here as Exhibit 34 of App. I (page 102).

¹⁸ App. I, Exhibit 33, page 98, passage (1) page 99, passages (2) and (3) and Exhibit 34, page 102 seq. It is the same train of thought developed by BRIERLY, Some Implications of the Pact of Paris (Br. YB 1929), App. II, Exhibit 44, page 126, passages (14), (15).

¹⁹ “Tout le mecanisme prevu pour le maintien de la paix s' est disloque. App. I, Exhibit 33, page 99, passages (4) and page 100, passages (3) and (6).

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

so called Austrian Anschluss, the complete inefficiency of the system of collective security²⁰:

"At the last election it was still possible to hope that the League might afford collective security. I believed it myself. I do not believe it now. I would say more: If I am right, as I am confident I am, in saying that the League as constituted today is unable to provide collective security for anybody, then I say we must not try to delude ourselves, and, still more, we must not try to delude small weak nations into thinking that they will be protected by the League against aggression and acting accordingly, when we know that nothing of the kind can be expected."

The Geneva League of Nations was "neutralized", as Noel Baker expressed it later in the House of Commons.²¹

2. In view of the correct conclusions drawn by the British government in their Note of 7 September 1939 to the League of Nations, it is no wonder if the Soviet Union treated the German-Polish conflict in accordance with the old rules of power politics. In the German-Russian Frontier and Friendship Pact of 28 September 1939²² and in the declaration made on the same day²³ in common with the Reich government, the government of Moscow starts from the conception of the debellatio of Poland, i.e. the abolition of Poland's government and armed forces. There is no mention made of the Pact of Paris or the League of Nations Covenant. The Soviet Union notes the abolition of the Polish state machinery by means of war, and draws from this fact the conclusions which seem right to her, agreeing with the Reich government that the new order of things is exclusively a matter for the two powers.

It was therefore only logical when, in the Finnish conflict of the winter of 1939-1940, the Soviet Union took up its stand on classic international law. It disregarded the reactions of the League of Nations, when, without even considering the application of the machinery of sanctions and only appearing to apply an article of the Covenant which was intended quite differently, it resolved that the Soviet Union had, as an aggressor, excluded itself from the League²⁴. The report of the Swiss Federal Council of the 30 January 1940 to the Federal Assembly²⁵ tries to save the face of the League which has been excluded from political realities.

²⁰ App. I, Exhibit 29, page 91, passage (3).

²¹ App. I, Exhibit 87, page 111, 21 Nov. 1939.

²² App. I, Exhibit 35, page 108.

²³ App. I, Exhibit 36, page 110.

²⁴ Resolutions of the Assembly and the Council of 14 December 1939/ App. I, Exhibit 38, pages 112, 113.

²⁵ App. I, Exhibit 39, page 114.

DEFENSE

3. The President of the United States stated on 5 September 1939 that there existed a state of war between several states with whom the United States lived in peace and friendship, namely Germany on the one hand and Great Britain, France, Poland, India and two of the British Dominions on the other hand. Everyone in the United States was bound to obey the neutrality regulations most strictly.

From the time of the preliminary negotiations, it was known in the United States that Europe, and particularly Great Britain and France, saw the main value of the pact outlawing war in the fact that the United States would take action in case of a breach of the pact. The British Foreign Minister stated this on 30 August 1928, i.e., four weeks previous to the signing of the pact. During the deliberations of the American Senate on the ratification of the pact, Senator Moses particularly drew attention to this²⁶. Senator Borah affirmed at the time that it was completely impossible to imagine that the United States would calmly stand by.²⁷ After the discredited failures of the policy of collective security in the case of Manchuria and Abyssinia the world had understood the now famous "quarantine" speech of President Franklin Roosevelt of 5 October 1937 and the "Stop Hitler!" warnings of the same President before and after "Munich" as an announcement that the United States would act on the next occasion. The declaration of neutrality of 5 September 1939 could therefore only mean: Like Great Britain and the Soviet Union, the United States accepts as a fact the collapse of the system of collective security.

This declaration of neutrality has often been looked upon as the death blow for the system. The Washington government could reject such a reproach as unjustified. For the system had already been dead for years, in so far as one believes at all that it was ever actually alive. But many did not see the fact that it was not alive at the moment; until the blinding light of the American declaration of neutrality fell upon it.

On the 1 September 1939 a decision had already been reached long before about the various experiments which had been tried since the first World War to replace the "anarchic world order" of classic international law by a better, a real, order of peace; i.e. to create in the community of states a general statute according to which there would be wars which are forbidden by law and others which are not forbidden by law. These experiments had, in the opinion of the major powers of the time, collapsed.

²⁶ App. I, Exhibit 13, page 53, passages (30) and (38). See also Ellery C. Shotwell, Responsibility of the United States in Regard to International Cooperation for the Prevention of Aggression (A.J. vol. 26, 1932, p. 113.)

²⁷ App. II, Exhibit 44, p. 127, passage (16). See also Brierly, J.L., Some Implications of the Pact of Paris (Br. YB 1929) He thinks that a violation of neutrality is impossible. (App. II, Exhibit 44, p. 127, passage (10) and (12). In 1936 the same thought was expressed by the Englishman McNair: Collective Security (Br.Y.B/App. II, Exhibit 49, page 143, passage (3).

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

The greatest military powers of the earth clashed in a struggle in which they used their full strength. For the proponents of the materialistic conception of history this was a second phase in a process developing according to inexorable laws, in which history ignored diplomatic and juridical formulas with supreme indifference.

For the majority of the international lawyers of the world did state: In the general international law at present valid there is no distinction between forbidden and not forbidden wars.

Hans Kelsen demonstrated this in 1942 in his paper "Law and Peace in International Relations" which he wrote after a careful research into the literature. In this he himself belongs to the minority who concede a legal distinction between justified and unjustified wars. His statement therefore carries all the more weight.

But now we must ask: Are we right in speaking of the collapse of the system of collective security at all? This presupposes that such a system at one time existed. Can this really be asserted? This is a question of the greatest importance for this trial, in which the existence of a world wide consciousness of right and wrong is taken as the basis for the indictment for breach of the peace.

There arises before us the tragedy of the Briand-Kellogg Pact, that tragedy from which we all suffered so much, we who rejoiced when the pact was concluded and later, after a first period of depression, greeted the Stimson Doctrine as a long overdue step absolutely essential for the achievement of real peace, and as an encouraging omen of fresh progress.

The United States had a great goal in view in 1927 and 1928, as I have already mentioned. In the League of Nations the problem had been tackled only half-heartedly and with half measures, and this had perhaps done more harm than good to the cause of real peace. The Geneva Protocol had gone on the rocks. Kellogg now wanted to get over all the difficulties which are actually essential parts of the problem, and jerk the world out of its deadlock by taking action without worrying much about theories. The published treaty with its two articles, the renunciation of war and the obligation of peaceful settlement, seemed to fulfill the longings of a humanity which wanted to see at last the act which would liberate it.

DEFENSE

But the difficulties which it was desired to get over are partially inherent in the problem, and no regulations made by any legislator can ever eliminate them completely. For even if one disposed of unambiguous criterions, who among us fallible human beings would have the authority to give a decision in case of dispute? But we do not even possess unambiguous criterions of aggression and defense.²⁸ This holds both for the so-called political concept, which is in a way the natural one, and for the legal concept or concepts of aggression and defense.

But these were not the only difficulties pointed out explicitly and implicitly by the French Government in the preliminary negotiations for the pact, and this with the full right of one²⁹ who knows Europe and its very old historical legacy in the way the United States Government knows America and its quite different history. Even if somebody were capable of jumping over his own shadow, the shadow cast by European history is so much longer.

When the world got to know the notes exchanged during the preliminary negotiations, with all the definitions, interpretations, qualifications and reservations, it became manifest to what an extent the opinions of the governments differed from one another despite one and the same wording. One saw the Soviet Governments open—even bitter—criticism of the refusal of the Western Powers to disarm and thus create the essential precondition for an effective policy of peace, further of the vagueness of the treaty³⁰ but especially of the famous English reservation of a free hand in certain regions of the world, the reservation which has often been called the British Monroe Doctrine or the Chamberlain Doctrine³¹, and one knew that in reality there existed only formal

²⁸ See e.g. EAGLETON, Clyde, An Attempt to define Aggression (International Conciliation No. 264, 1930), CUTEN, A. La notion de guerre permise. Paris 1931. WRIGHT, Quincy, The Concept of Aggression in International Law (A. J. vol. 29, 1935, p. 395, seq.)

²⁹ Note of the United States Government to the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, Italy and Japan of the 13 April 1928; draft treaty of the 20 April 1928 drawn up by the French Government; Note of the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the 19 May 1928 to the American ambassador; Note of the 23 June 1928 from the US Government to all nine participants in the negotiations; Note of the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the 18 July 1928; Note of the Soviet Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the 31 August 1928/ App. I Exhibit 2, p. 5, passage (2), Exhibit 3, p. 7-9 in toto; Exhibit 5, p. 12, passage (2) and p. 13, passage (3); Exhibit 7, p. 16-18 in toto; Exhibit 8, p. 19 in toto; Exhibit 9, p. 20 seq. in toto.

³⁰ Letter of the People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the 31 August 1928/ App. I, Exhibit 9, P. 23, passage (7)

³¹ Ibid p. 25, passage (10).

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

agreement behind the signatures and that no two powers understood exactly the same thing by the treaty. Only on one thing did complete agreement exist: War of self defense is permitted as an unalienable right of all states; without this right, sovereignty does not exist; and every state is alone judge of whether in a given case it is waging a war of self-defense.

No state in this world was ready to accept foreign jurisdiction concerning the question of whether its decisions on ultimate questions of existence were justified or not.

Kellogg had declared to all the nine states participating in the negotiations, in his Note of the 25 June 1928³²:

"* * * The right of self-defense * * * is inherent in every sovereign state and is implicit in every treaty. Every nation * * * is alone competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense."

The friends of peace were cruelly disappointed.

What was the use of such a treaty anyway?

They were only too right.

Very soon afterwards they heard with even greater grief of the course of the discussions in the American Senate. The ratification was, it is true, passed with 85 votes against one, with few abstentions, but, if behind the signatures of the contracting states there was no material agreement, there was even less behind the result of the vote in the Senate of the leading world power ideologically and as far as the initiative was concerned.

The discussions in the Senate, which remain memorable for all time because of their profound seriousness and loftiness showed—and several Senators expressly said so—that opinions of the Senators oscillated between two poles which were worlds apart.³³ For some the treaty really meant a turning-point³³; to others it appeared worthless³³, or, at best, a feeble or friendly gesture^{33 34}, a popular slogan³⁵, a sort of international kiss³⁶; to still others a fertile soil for all the wars of the future³⁷, a gigantic piece of hypocrisy³⁸, even the legalization of³⁹ or of British world con-

³² App. I, Exhibit 7, p. 16, passage (1) Add to this the opinions of the Senators at the debate on the ratification in the US Senate./ App. I, Exhibit 13, p. 46, passage (19), p. 47, pass. (22); p. 52, pass. (29); p. 57, pass. (45); and p. 59 pass. (50). See also KELLOGG, F. the War Prevention Policy of the United States (A.J. vol. 22, 1928, p. 261 seq.)

³³ App. I, Exhibit 13, p.39, passage (1) and p.47, passage (19a)

³⁴ ibid, p.42, passage (9).

³⁵ ibid, p.55, passage (36).

³⁶ ibid, p.41, passage (7).

³⁷ ibid, p.56, passage (39).

³⁸ ibid, p.59, passage (49).

³⁹ App. I, Exhibit 13, p.53, passages (31), (33).

DEFENSE

trol⁴⁰, or the guaranteeing of the unjust status quo of Versailles for France and Great Britain⁴¹. Some senators criticized the complete vagueness of the stipulations of the treaty⁴² even more sharply than the Russian Note. And if one took Kellogg's declaration about the right of self defense, which, according to the will of the signatory states, was an integral part of the treaty, literally: what kind of war was then forbidden at all?⁴³ Sarcastic and ironic words were used.

Nothing was gained by this Paris Pact if everything were to remain as it stood at its conclusion. In the opinion of the great American expert on international law, Philip Marshall Brown, the pact unwittingly engendered by its ineptness the horrible monster of "undeclared war".⁴⁴

Those who fought against Versailles, Germans and non-Germans, because progress was blocked, and those who criticized the League of Nations, Germans and non-Germans, because it did more harm than good to the will for progress, had all rejoiced for nothing at the end of August 1928. The decisive step had not been taken.

But above all the one thing that is not sufficient in itself but is indispensable if a guarantee of peace is really to be created, the one thing that—in the unanimous opinion of all who reckon with human beings as they really are—is necessary, was not tackled at all:

To create a procedure by which the community of states can, even against the will of the possessor, change conditions that have become intolerable, in order to provide life with the safety-valve it must have if it is to avoid an explosion.

Just as the state can, if at all, avoid revolutions only by good legislation and by adjusting the laws to the altered manner of life in good time, so it is with the community of states as well. Wilson also had this fundamental principle in mind as we saw. One of the great British experts on international law, one of the enthusiastic, unconditional and progressive adherents of the Paris Pact, McNair, took this into account too when, in 1936, he wanted to have placed beside collective force the collective and peaceful

⁴⁰ ibid, p.41, passage (8); p.48, passage (23); p.(50), passage (26); p.(52), passage (28); p.57, passage (41), (43), (44); p.(58), passage (46). In addition, Borchard-Lage, Neutrality for the United States, 1937,/App. II, Exhibit 50, p.144.

⁴¹ App. I, Exhibit 13, p.(44), passage (15) and p.57, passage (42).

⁴² ibid. p.46, passage (18) and p.54, passage (35).

⁴³ ibid. p.39/40, passages (2), (3), (4), (5).

⁴⁴ International Lawlessness, A.J. vol.32 (1938) p. 775/ App. II, exhibit 52, p.148, passages (3), (4).

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

revision of conditions which had become dangerous⁴⁵. This was taken into account by the American experts on international law, Borchard⁴⁶ and Fenwick,⁴⁷ in their warning explanations of the aspects of the situation connected with international law, shortly before the second World War. The Government of the German Reich had, by the way, pointed out this problem which overshadowed all others, in Stresemann's Note to the American Ambassador dated the 27 April 1928, when unconditionally agreeing to Kellogg's proposal⁴⁸.

The problem of "collective revision" was not seriously tackled later on either. This is not surprising, if only because the very character of such an institution presupposes renunciation of their sovereignty by the states. And can such a renunciation be considered in the times we live in? Philip Brown melancholically thinks that this is less possible than ever⁴⁹. And for this reason a real forward step in the question as to how war could literally be outlawed was not practicable.

The Government of the United States and the League of Nations did a great deal to satisfy the urgent demands of the nations in spite of these inextricable interdependences. They subsequently tried to give the pact a precise content and "teeth". The science of international law provided suggestions for this and checked it. We must also trace this process briefly even though it remained completely unsuccessful, because the seeds of the ideas contained in the Indictment are to be found here, insofar as its line of argument is not a political or ethical but a legal one.

First, in its ban on aggression, the Paris Pact unquestionably starts from the political concept of aggression; but in that it is quite indefinite. Shotwell and Brierly, among others, tried to help immediately by deducing a legal concept of aggression from the second Article of the Treaty, which Article establishes the obligation to follow a procedure of peaceful settlement.⁵⁰ We can leave open the question whether this interpretation may be applied to ⁴⁵ Collective Security (Br.YB,1936, p.150 seq).

App. II, exhibit 49, p.142, passage (2).

⁴⁶ Neutrality and Unneutrality (A.J.,vol.32,1938, p.778 seq.).
App. II, exhibit 53, p.151, seq., particularly p.152, passages (6), (7), (8), (9).

⁴⁷ International Law and Lawless Nations (A.J.,vol.33 1939, pp.743-745/ App. II, exhibit 55, p.159, passages (7) and (8).

⁴⁸ App. I, exhibit 4, p.10. See also Scelle, George Theorie juridique de la revision des traites. Paris, 1936; further: Kunz, Josef, The Problem of Revision in International Law ("peaceful change") A.J.,vol.33 1939, pp.33-35.

⁴⁹ International Lawlessness (A.J.,vol.32,1938,p.775) App. II, exhibit 52,p. 148, passage (1) and (2).

⁵⁰ Brierly, Some Implications of the Pact of Paris (Br.YB 1929, p.208 seq.) / App. I, exhibit 44, p.123, passage (3).

DEFENSE

the treaty. In practice nothing is actually gained by doing so; one kind of difficulty is simply put in the place of another. There are no fewer obscurities. The measures of peaceful settlement presuppose good will on both sides; what, then, if it is lacking on the other side? And what is still a measure of peaceful settlement and what is one no longer? The Russian Government was quite right in the above-mentioned note of 31 August 1928 to the Kellogg-Briand Pact when it expounded this question.⁵¹

Then other attempts to help tried to develop a completely new world constitution from the entirely indefinite pact by means of logic. They are connected with the name of the American Secretary of State Stimson and with the work of the Budapest Meeting of the International Law Association in 1934.⁵²

To understand this it is necessary to assume that the Kellogg Pact really brought about, in a legally definable manner, an unambiguous and unconditional renunciation of war. Then, of course, there no longer exists the right to wage wars as and when one likes. War waged against this prohibition is an offense against the constitution of the community of states. We are immediately faced by the question: Can the legal position of a State which attacks contrary to law be the same as that of a State which is attacked contrary to law?

If one answers: No, as does for instance the influential French commentator of the League of Nations Covenant, Juan Ray,⁵³ does this then not mean the elimination of the most important fundamental principles of classic international law?

1. Do the international laws of war—which after all assume the right to wage war freely and the duel-like character of war and, at any rate, the equality before the law of the belligerents—apply for the appreciation of the actions of the belligerent powers against one another?

2. Is it possible, or indeed permissible, that neutrality should still exist in such a war?

3. Can the result of the war, if the aggressor is victorious, be recognized by law, especially if it is put into the form of a treaty, or must not the community of States deprive the aggressor of the spoils of his victory by a policy of non-recognition? Should there be, or perhaps even must there be, common coercive action by the states against the aggressor?

It must be noted: Not even the theory of law has drawn all the conclusions. The practice of the states, after a few tentative be-⁵¹ App. I, exhibit 9, p.24, passage (8).

⁵² The well-known "Budapest Articles" in App. I, exhibit 23, pp.78/79.

⁵³ Commentaire, p.371.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

ginnings in isolated points, did not finally carry things to a conclusion in a single case.

With regard to the first point: The validity of the international laws of war during a war, whatever the latter's origin, has not as yet been seriously disputed by any state. Any doubts that arose were cleared up in a way which allowed of no misunderstandings. I draw attention to Resolution No. 3 of the League of Nations Assembly of the 4 October 1921 and to the report of the Committee of Eleven of the League of Nations for the adaptation of the Covenant to the Pact of Paris.⁵⁴ The aggressor state has the same rights and duties in a war as the attacked nation, i.e. those laid down by the traditional international laws of war. The French Chief Prosecutor appears to wish to deviate from this line, but not to wish to draw the full conclusions. But I do not see any tendency to deviate from the present path even in the most recent practice of states.

With regard to the second point: Attempts have been made to deny the obligations imposed by neutrality, and in fact finally to give the states not involved the right of non-neutrality and even the right to wage war against the aggressor. Some statesmen and scholars have devoted themselves just as passionately to undermining and even to denying the right to neutrality as other statesmen and scholars have spoken in favor of its undiminished continuance⁵⁵. The clearer it became that the whole system of ⁵⁴ Of the 8 March 1930. App.I exhibit 17, page 64. See also Rutgers in the "Recueil des Cours" (Academie de Droit International) vol.38,p.47. Also: "Budapest Articles" 7 (App.I, exhibit 23, page 79). Also: Josef Kunz, Plus de loi de la guerre? (Revue Generale de Droit International Public, 1934). Cohn, Neo-Neutrality (1939) App.II, exhibit 54.

⁵⁵ The Peruvian delegate, CORNEJO, in the Committee of the Assembly of the League of Nations in 1929 (Assemblee 1929, C III J.O.,p.201): Neutrality no longer exists! Stimson: The Pact of Paris. Address, 8 August 1932 / App. I, exhibit 20, page 76, passage (3). Hull. Declaration on the Neutrality Law of 17 January 1936 / App. I, exhibit 27, page 83.

Speech by the Swedish Foreign Minister Sandler of the 6 Dec. 1936/ App. I, exhibit 27, page 84 seq.

3 October 1939: Declaration of Panama; the exchange of Notes by the 21 American Republics with Great Britain, France and Germany (23.12.1939; 14.1., 23.1, 14.2.1940) is based completely on the classic Neutrality Law. The Budapest Articles.

Literature: See in the index of authors and works—Appendix III—The works and papers by:

D'Astony, B. (1938), Baty, Th. (1939), Bonn, M.J. (1936/37). Borchard, E.M. (1936; 1937; 1938; 1941), Brierly, J.L. (1929; 1932), Brown, Ph.M. (1936; 1939), Buell (1936), Cohn (1939), Descamps, de (1930), Eagleton, Clyde (1937), Fenwick, Charles G. (1934; 1935; 1939), Fischer Williams, Sir John (1935; 1936); Garner, James Wilford (1936; 1938), Hambro, Edvard (1938); Hide, C.C. (1937; 1941), Jessup, P. C. (1932; 1935; 1936), Lauterpacht (1935, 1940), Mandelstam (1934), Miller, David Hunter (1928), McNair (1936), Politis, N. (1929; 1935), Rappard, W.E. (1935-1937), Schindler, D. (1938), Stimson, H. (1932), Stowell, Ellery C. (1932), Tenekides, C.C. (1939), Whitton, J.B. (1927, 1932), Wright, Quincy (1940).

DEFENSE

collective security did not function in the particular cases which were of decisive importance, namely in those cases where steps would have had to be taken against a great power, the more the idea of neutrality asserted itself with new strength. The complete discrediting of the League of Nations and of the system of the Briand-Kellogg Pact in the Abyssinian conflict put classic international law back in its old position again here too.

In 1935 Switzerland declared her unrestricted neutrality⁵⁶; Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Luxemburg, Norway, Holland and Sweden followed with their Declaration at Copenhagen on 24 July 1938⁵⁷. The failure of the League of Nations was the reason, this fact also being mentioned openly.

With reference to the third point: The following is the idea of the policy of non-recognition. The states not involved in a conflict should conduct themselves as members of the community of states, i.e. they should protect the constitution of the community of states by refusing to recognize the fruits of the victor's victory, should he have been the aggressor. The situation he has created by force should not even seem to become a legal situation. He will thus be deprived of what he has gained, and one of the main inducements to wage war will thereby be eliminated. Such a policy of non-recognition is undoubtedly not enough to guarantee a system of collective security by itself, but it is an indispensable part of such an order. There can be no dispute about this. The Brazilian representative Braga gained merit by proposing, at the 2nd League Assembly in 1921 such a policy to be followed by the members of the League of Nations under the name of a "universal juridical blockade" (blocus juridique universel)⁵⁸. The Finnish representative Procope interpreted Article 10 of the Covenant in this sense in 1930 before the League Assembly.⁵⁹ The Notes of the American Secretary of State Stimson of 7 January 1932 to China and Japan made this idea echo throughout the world.⁶⁰ Their contents are commonly called the Stimson Doctrine. The League of Nations accepted the Doctrine as a resolution of the Assembly dated the 11 March 1932.⁶¹ The idea was later the central point of the Pact of Rio de Janeiro of 10 October 1933⁶² and of the Budapest Articles of 10 September 1934⁶³.

⁵⁶ Reservations of the Swiss delegation (M.Motta) of 10.10. 1935/App. I, exhibit 25, p.81/82, especially the passages (3), (4), (5).

⁵⁷ App. I, exhibit 30, p.93.

⁵⁸ App. I, exhibit 10, p.35.

⁵⁹ App. I, exhibit 16, p.63.

⁶⁰ App. I, exhibit 18, p.65.

⁶¹ App. I, exhibit 19, p.66.

⁶² App. I, exhibit 22, p.76.

⁶³ App. I, exhibit 23, p.78.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

The conflict between Italy and Abyssinia in 1935-1936 became the great test-case⁶⁴, which decided the fate of the system of collective security: The League of Nations declared a member which was a great power to be the aggressor and decreed economic sanctions, but then shrank from coercive military measures and finally, after Italy's victory, struggled painfully in debates on procedure, especially at the 18th Assembly of the League, to find an answer to the question as to how the League, without openly betraying its constitution, could cross the attacked member, the minor-power Abyssinia, off the list of existing states and recognize it as part of the Italian Empire. The United States also did not enforce the Stimson Doctrine, but remained strictly neutral^{65 66}.

It is necessary to know all this; and also to know that the British Government on 20 February 1935 politely but firmly refused, through the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Sankey⁶⁷, to accept the logical deductions, and paid tribute to the old truth; it is not logic but history that creates law.⁶⁸ On a later occasion, when Secretary of State Cordell Hull had explained the principles of American policy to all the powers on the 16 July 1937,⁶⁹ the Portuguese government issued a warning against "the abstract and generalizing tendency of jurists"; it warned against attempts to "find a single formula" and against not studying historic facts sufficiently⁷⁰.

⁶⁴ Jean Ray, 4th Supplement to the Commentary, 1935, p.10;

"A statesman said one day, speaking of article 16, that if it was applied, it would undoubtedly only be applied once. One can say the same thing about the whole machinery which is intended to be an obstacle against war." See also Fischer Williams, Sir John, Sanctions under the Covenant (Br.YB 1936) and McNair, Arnold D., Collective Security (*ibid.*App. II, exhibit 48 and 49, p.134, passage (1) and p.140, passage (1)).

⁶⁵ With reference to the Stimson Doctrine and the case of Abyssinia, see in the index of authors and works—Appendix III—the works and papers of Borchard (1933), Fischer Williams (1936), McNair (1933), Sharp (1934), Stimson (1932), Wild (1932), Wright (1932, 1933).

⁶⁶ With reference to the system of "collective security", see from the literature concerning the whole position in international law (App. III): Briefly (1932), Bourquin (1934), Brouckere (1934), Cuten (1931), Descamp (1930), Eagleton (1930, 1937, 1938), Elbe (1939), Fenwick (1932, 1934, 1935, 1939), Fischer Williams (1932, 1933, 1935, 1936), Giraud (1934), Garner (1936), Graham (1929, 1934), Hill (1932), Hyde (1941), Jessup (1935), Mandelstam (1934), Politis (1929), Ritgers 1931, Shotwell (1928), Wickersham (1928/1929), Whitton (1932), Wright (1942).

⁶⁷ Parl. Deb., H.L. 5th ser., vol.95, cols.1007, 1043, App. I, exhibit 24, page 80.

⁶⁸ Lauterpacht, The Pact of Paris and the Budapest Articles of Interpretation (Transactions of the Grotius Society, XX, 1935, p.178) draws the conclusion from the fact that States can accept or reject what was logically deducted to be legal in Budapest. Jessup asserts that the States did not accept the Budapest Articles (Neutrality, its History, Economics and Law, Vol.IV, Today and Tomorrow, 1936, App. II, exhibit 47, p.132, passages (1), (2).).

⁶⁹ See A.J. vol.31, 1937, p.680-693.

⁷⁰ See the concurring statements by Kuhn, Arthur K.: Observations of Foreign Governments upon Secretary Hull's Principles of Enduring Peace (A.J., vol.32, 1938, p.101, 106). App. III, exhibit 51, p.145, passages (3) and (4) and p.147, passage (8).

DEFENSE

We therefore come to the conclusion that: In the practice of the relations between states there existed—at least during several years prior to 1939—no effective general ruling of international law regarding prohibited war.

No such general ruling existed so far as the leading statesmen and the peoples were aware. This is, in fact, the ultimate reason why the path of special rulings on international law was followed to an ever increasing extent: two states would then conclude treaties, in full knowledge of their particular historical conditions and with a view to securing peace between themselves.

Now, during the second World War the United States Government decided to help Great Britain. Great Britain was able to acquire destroyers and it later received the assistance of Lend-Lease. The American public recognized this act of assistance as being essentially no longer neutral; it was regretted by some, welcomed by others, now attacked and now defended. The supporters of the measures before the American public, above all Stimson and Cordell Hull, quite rightly did not attempt to justify them as consistent with neutrality. On the contrary, they took up their stand on the Pact of Paris as interpreted by the Budapest Articles⁷¹. As we saw, this would, according to Viscount Sankey's indisputably correct conception of what are the sources of international law, have been wrong even in 1935.

After the developments which had taken place since Italy's victory over Abyssinia, such discussions were entirely outside the field of legal realities. Their purpose was to resolve internal dissensions in America and they could therefore be of no direct importance for international law. Even had these discussions taken place between states, they could at most have helped to create law. But is it actually necessary to assert or prove that such discussions could not have created, during the great struggle, a law to attain which so many efforts—efforts which proved to be Utopian—were made in vain in peacetime? In this court many ways of legal thinking meet—ways which are in part very different. This leads to certain insoluble differences of opinion. But no way of legal thinking anywhere on earth, from the most ancient times to the most recent, could or can make possible arguments which contradict the very nature of law as a social order of human life arising out of history. If several governments accept articles, about the contents of which they are of different opinions, and if these articles then find no real application in the practice of these

⁷¹ See Wright in A.J., vol.34,1940, p.680 seq.
Particularly Stimson's speech of the 6.1.1941 should be mentioned here.
(App. I, exhibit 41, p.115/116.)

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

governments—which is not to be wondered at considering the circumstances under which they arose—and if theorists then interpret these articles and the practice of Governments rejects these interpretations either expressly or tacitly, one must then resign oneself to this, in so far as one wants to keep to the task of legal appreciation, no matter how much the goal may be worth striving for politically or morally.

But let us forget for a moment the bitter realities of those years following the Italo-Abyssinian conflict. Let us suppose for a moment that a general and unambiguous pact had existed, accepted and applied by the Contracting Parties in fundamental and factual agreement. Would the liability of individuals to punishment for the breach of such a treaty be laid down in international law? No, not even the liability of the State to punishment, let alone that of individuals.

The breach of such a treaty would not differ under the international law at present valid from any other violation of international law. The state which violates a treaty would commit an offense against international law, but not a punishable act⁷². Attempts were occasionally made to deduce from the word “delit” (offense), “crime international” (international crime) and “condamnation de la guerre” (condemnation of war) the existence of an International Criminal Law dealing with our case. Such conclusions are based on wrong premises⁷³. Every lawyer knows that any unlawful behavior can be called a “delit” (delictum), not only punishable behavior. And the word “crime” is used even entirely outside the legal sphere. And this is precisely the case here! When, in 1927, on Poland’s application, the League of Nations Assembly declared war to be an international crime, the Polish representative expressly stated that the declaration was not actually a legal instrument, but an act of moral and educational importance.⁷⁴

The attempt to organize a universal world system of collective security on a legal basis failed. But this does not mean that the numerous bilateral treaties, whose purpose it is to preclude wars of aggression between the two partners, became inapplicable. One will actually have to examine whether the parties to the treaty

⁷² Fischer Williams also stresses this in his “Sanctions under the Covenant” (Br.YB, 1936, p.130 seq. App. II, exhibit 48, particularly p.136). Also Kelsen: Collective and Individual Responsibility * * * (1943), p.531 App. II, exhibit 57, page 166, passage (5).

⁷³ Fischer Williams gives an only too justifiable warning against false ideas about the words “international crime” in his “Sanctions under the Covenant” (Br.YB, 1936, p.130 seq. App. II, exhibit 48, p.136, passage (3)).

⁷⁴ Actes de l’Assemblée, 1927, P., p.153. Also Jean RAY, Commentaire, p.74-75.

DEFENSE

may have made the existence or continued existence of a general machinery of collective security the prerequisite for the validity of the treaty.

The same applies to unilateral assurances of non-aggression as to the bilateral treaties.

Many bilateral non-aggression pacts were concluded, and several unilateral assurances were given. In some cases the political and in some a legal concept of aggression, and even a number of such legal concepts side by side, determine right and wrong. The German Reich also concluded a series of such pacts. They have been drawn upon by the prosecution as an argument. One must examine whether all these treaties were still in force at the critical moment. This examination must be left to the individual defense counsel. But if the German Reich did attack in an individual case in breach of a non-aggression pact which was still valid, it committed an offense in international law and is responsible therefor according to the rules of international law regarding offenses in international law. But only the Reich. Not the individual, even if he were the head of the state. This is beyond all doubt according to the international law at present valid.

It is unnecessary even to speak about this. For up to the most recent times not even the possibility has been mentioned, either in the Manchurian, or in the Italo-Abyssinian or in the Russo-Finnish conflict, of instituting criminal proceedings against those people who were responsible, on the Japanese, Italian or Russian side, for planning, preparing, launching and prosecuting the war, or who simply participated in these acts in any way. And it was certainly not because matters had, paradoxically enough, not been thought out to the end, that they were not prosecuted. But they were not prosecuted because this cannot happen as long as the sovereignty of states is the organizational basic principle of the whole inter-state order. One can have one or the other, but not both.⁷⁵

Should things reach the point where, according to general world law, the men who participated in the planning, preparation, launching and prosecution of a war forbidden by international law could be brought before an international criminal court, the decisions regarding the state's ultimate problems of existence would be subject to super-state control. One could of course still call such states sovereign, but they would no longer be sovereign. In his paper of late 1943 which I have already mentioned several times and which he wrote after the Moscow conference of the 1

⁷⁵ Fischer Williams, Sanctions under the Covenant (Br.YB, 1936) / App. II, exhibit 48, P.135 passage (2), is right.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

November 1943, Kelsen again and again repeats the phrase that, in questions of breach of the peace, the liability of individuals to punishment does not exist according to the general international law at present valid and can not exist on account of sovereignty.⁷⁶

For Europeans, at any rate, the state has for the last four centuries, above all since the ever more rapid advances made by the idea of the national state, gained the dignity of a superperson. Of course acts of state are acts of men. But they are in fact acts of state, i.e. acts of the state carried out by its organs and not the private acts of Mr. Smith or Mr. Robinson.

What the Indictment is doing when, in the name of the world community as a legal entity, it wants to have individuals legally sentenced for their decisions regarding war and peace, is, when one looks at it from the angle of European history, to look upon the state as one would look upon a private individual, indeed, more than that, what it is doing is to destroy the state mentally. Such a charge, the moral justification of which is not my concern, such a charge is—as we have already shown—incompatible with the very nature of sovereignty and with the feeling of the majority of Europeans. It seems, indeed, as though not only Europeans feel that way. In 1919, in Paris, it was the American delegates at the War Guilt Investigation Committee who opposed most strongly any legal sentence on the Kaiser for the very reason of the incompatibility of such a procedure with the sovereignty of the State.⁷⁷ And it is impossible to recognize the idea of sovereignty more strongly than Kellogg did eight years later during the negotiations in connection with the Pact of Paris, when he declared: Every state is the sole judge of its behavior with regard to questions affecting its existence.

There are epochs which idolize the sovereignty of the State, others anathematize it. Some idolize and anathematize it simultaneously. Our epoch does so. Perhaps we are living in a period of transition. Perhaps a transformation of values is taking place. Perhaps world community will become the supreme political

⁷⁶ Collective and Individual Responsibility * * *, pp.534, 538, 539, 540, 542/ App.II, exhibit 57, p.167, passage (6); p. 168, passages (8) and (9); p.169, passages (10) and (11); p.170, passage (13) and p.173, passage (18).

⁷⁷ Scott, James Brown, emphasizes the great services which the American delegates did at that time to law (in House-Seymour: What Really Happened at Paris—New York 1921—App. II, exhibit 43, whole of page 122). Williams E.T., The conflict between Autocracy and Democracy (A.J., vol.32, 1938, page 663 seq.p.664).

Kelsen, Hans, Collective and Individual Responsibility * * * p.541/ App. II, exhibit 57, p.171, passage (15) and p.172, passage (17), See also Borchard, Edwin: Neutrality and Unneutrality (A.J., vol.32, 1938, p.778 seq.) App. II, exhibit 53, p.155, passage (17).

DEFENSE

treasure for the peoples, in place of their own particular States, which have at any rate held this position hitherto. Perhaps we shall reach a point where the unleashing of a war deserving moral and also legal condemnation will, for the general legal conscience, constitute high treason against the world community. Perhaps, we shall reach a point where it will be permissible, or even compulsory, to betray a government which starts such a war to foreign countries without a legal justification for calling this high treason towards one's country. At the moment in no nation is there a majority—let alone unanimity—in support of this opinion.

The punishment of individuals by the legal family of nations for breach of the peace between states can thus be ordered only if the fundamental principles of the international law currently valid and the scale of values which has for centuries been firmly rooted in the feeling of the European nations, are abandoned—that scale of values according to which the state, one's own sovereign state, forms the indispensable foundation for free personality.

The Indictment mentally wipes out the German state for the time when it stood upright in its full strength and acted through its organs. It must do so if it desires to prosecute individual persons for a breach of the peace between states. It must turn the defendants into private individuals. But it then combines them—so to speak on the private plane—with the help of the criminal law concept of a conspiracy which is taken from Anglo-Saxon law and is strange to us, gives them the many millions strong sub-structure of organization and groups which are designated as criminal, and thereby again places a superperson before us.

In as far as the Charter supports all this by its regulations, it lays down fundamentally new law, if—with the British chief prosecutor—one measures them against existing international law. That which, originating in Europe, has finally spread to the whole world and is called international law, is, in essence, a law of the coordination of sovereign states. If one measures the regulations of the Charter against this law, one must say: The regulations of the Charter negate the basis of this law, they anticipate the law of a world state. They are revolutionary. Perhaps in the hopes and longings of the nations the future is theirs. The lawyer, and only as such may I speak here, has only to establish that they are new—revolutionarily new. The laws regarding war and peace between states had no place for them—could not have any place for them. Thus they are criminal laws with retroactive force.

Now the French chief prosecutor—if I understand right—recognized the sovereignty of states in his humanly very moving speech and quite rightly saw that an unbridgeable gulf exists between the Charter and the international law at present valid, when it wants to see individuals punished as criminals for breach of international peace. He therefore shifts the trial from the plane of international law to that of constitutional law. It might possibly have happened that a German state power would have settled accounts after the war with those people who were responsible for launching the war. As the whole life of the German people is crippled today, those foreign powers who, in cooperation with each other on the basis of treaties, have territorial power in Germany, are undertaking this settlement of accounts.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

The Charter has laid down the rules which are to guide the Court in its investigation and verdict. One can here leave unexamined whether this opinion is legally right or not. Even if it is right, our question is not altered thereby: When looking at the problem from this point of view, no less than from that of international law, we must know how far the Charter creates penal law with retroactive force. But we must now measure the regulations of the Charter not only against the international law which was valid for Germany and was transformed into national law—as people are wont to say—but also against the national criminal law which was binding on the defendants at the time of the deed. It is, after all, possible for a state, a member of the community of states, to be more cosmopolitan in its criminal law than the current international law. The rule of the Charter which is new with regard to existing international law may correspond to an already existing national law, and then it would not be a criminal law with retroactive force. So how was the breach of peace between states—particularly the breach of non-aggression pacts—treated in the national criminal law to which the defendants were subject at the time of the preparation and launching of the war?

It is possible that, in a state, those people are threatened with punishment who have prepared or launched or waged a war in breach of the international obligations of that state.⁷⁸ That would actually be completely unpractical. For the result of a war also decides the internal settling of accounts. No criminal court threatens a victorious government. But, in case of defeat, the defeat itself gives the measures of the settlement of account. In any case the regulations of the Charter regarding punishment for breach of the peace between states are new for the national criminal law which the defendants were subject to at the time of the deed. But if one does not understand the phrase "nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege" as it is understood on the European continent, i.e., as meaning that law in the sense of "lex" is a rule laid down by the state, a state law, but is of the opinion which—as far as I can see—is peculiar to English legal thinkers, that law in the sense of "lex" can also be a deeply rooted rule of ethics, of morality, we have one question left: As things happened to be, did the defendants—former ministers, military leaders, directors of economy, heads of higher authorities—feel at the time of the deed, or could they have felt — that a behavior which is now made punishable by a retroactive law was against their duty?

⁷⁸ KELSEN seems to think that no such state exists, (Collective and Individual Responsibility * * *, p.543/App.II, exhibit 57, p.178, passage (20).).

DEFENSE

The answer to this question cannot be given unless one has an insight into the nature of the constitution of the German Reich at the moment of the deed.

The German Reich was incorporated into the community of states in that form, with that constitution, which it happened to have at any given moment. Such is the case with every member of the community of states. The United States and the British Empire, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the French Republic, Brazil and Switzerland stand in the framework of the family of nations with that constitution which they happen to have at the time.

The prosecution has, with full justification, tried to give a picture of this concrete legal structure of the Reich. For, without trying to do this, no one in this trial will be able to arrive at a decision regarding right and wrong. In addition it seems to me that many ethical questions which have been raised here require such an attempt to be made. But I am afraid that, with the picture presented by the prosecution, it is not possible to arrive as close to the truth as is possible in spite of the complex nature of the subject.

The prosecution starts with the conception of a conspiracy to conquer the world on the part of a few dozen criminals. The German State, if one looks upon things in this way, becomes a mere shadow or tool. But this State had long been in existence; no one could set aside the enormous weight of its history. It was only various things in this history, at home and especially abroad, that made Hitler's rise to power at all possible or which made it easier for him, and it was many things in this history that guided, urged on, limited or put a brake on Hitler in his choice of aims and means, and helped to decide the success or failure of his measures and undertakings.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

The prosecution was certainly right in laying great stress on the so-called Fuehrer principle. This so-called Fuehrer principle was, in fact, for the eyes and even more for the ears of the German people and of the world in general, the organizational guiding principle in the development of the Reich constitution after 1933.

It was certainly never unambiguous and it considerably changed its character during the course of the years. In the life of men, leading and commanding present inherent contradictions.

There exists one—may I say—soulless, mechanical way of governing mankind, which is to rule by issuing commands. And there is another one, which is to lead the way by setting an example and to be followed voluntarily, which is to lead or whatever one wishes to call it. This differentiation between two fundamentally different methods of governing men is often already made difficult by the words used; in the German languages for instance, this is so because leading is sometimes called unconscious ruling, and ruling is sometimes called leading. Furthermore, the differentiation is rendered more difficult by the fact that it is at one time leading and at another commanding that governs the relations between the same persons or by the fact that methods which are actually applicable to leading are used for ruling, and vice versa. Every State has been, is, and will be faced by the question of how it is to link up both these methods so that they complement, advance and keep a check on each other. Both methods appear continually and everywhere. There has never yet been a really great ruler who was not also a leader. But minor rulers are also subject to this law. And the Hitler regime brought about—at least to begin with—a synthesis of both methods which had at least the appearance of being tremendously efficient. To this synthesis has been attributed—perhaps not unjustly—much of what the world saw with wonder, sometimes approvingly but more often disapprovingly, as the result of an unheard of mobilization, concentration and increase in the energies of a nation.

This particular synthesis of leading and commanding found its strongest expression in the person of Hitler himself, in his actions of leading, for instance in his speeches, and in his commands. Hitler's acts of leading and commanding became the motive power of the German political life of that time. Justice must be done above all to this phenomenon. It is of absolutely decisive importance for judging the enormous mass of facts which has been produced here. With all the caution which is natural to men who think along scientific lines and which imposes on them an almost unconquerable mistrust of any attempt to comprehend and eval-ate events which have happened so recently, one can perhaps risk this assertion: In the course of the years, Hitler gave commanding an increasingly favored place to the detriment of acts of leading, and finally brought it so much to the fore that commands and not the act of leading became the all decisive factor. Hitler the man of the people became more and more the dictator. The speeches in which he repeated himself ad nauseam even for his most willing followers and overshouted to the irritation even of members of his entourage who had faith in him, became rarer, but the legislative machine worked faster and faster. A later age will perhaps realize how far the great change in the attitude of the German people to Hitler, which was beginning even before the war, was the cause or effect of this change.

DEFENSE

While, on the question of something superficial, i.e. the question as to how he wished to be designated, he pressed not to be called "Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor" any longer but only "Fuehrer", the way in which the state was being governed was following exactly the opposite path; leading disappeared more and more and there remained naked domination. The Fuehrer's orders became the central element of the German state edifice.

In the public hierarchy, this development brought with it rather an increase than a decrease in Hitler's power. The great majority of German officials and officers had seen nothing behind the organized leadership but a machinery of domination with a new label and, if possible, of an even more bureaucratic nature, side by side with the inherited state machinery. When Hitler's orders became the Alpha and Omega, they felt themselves, so to speak, back in the old familiar path. The queer and puzzling part had gone. They were back in their world of subordination. But anyway this development had given the Fuehrer's orders a special aura of sanctity for them too; there was no contradicting the Fuehrer's orders. One could perhaps raise objections but if the Fuehrer stuck to his order, the matter was decided. His orders were something quite different from the orders of any official of the hierarchy under him.

Here we have come to the fundamental question in this trial: What position did Hitler's orders occupy in the German constitution? Did they belong to the type of orders which were set aside by the Charter of this Court as grounds for the exclusion of punishment?

It was perhaps harder for a lawyer who grew up in the habits of the so-called constitutional state ("Rechtsstaat") than for other people to witness the slow and then ever more rapid disintegration of the guarantees of liberty provided by the constitutional state; for he never came to feel at home in the new order and always stood half outside it. But, for this very reason, he probably knows more than anyone else about the peculiarities of this new order. An attempt must be made to make it comprehensible. State orders, whether they lay down rules or decide individual cases, can always be measured against the existing written and unwritten law, but also against the rules of international law, morals and religion. Someone, even if only the conscience of the person giving the orders, always asks: Has the person giving the orders ordered something which he had no right to order? Or: has he formed and published his order by an inadmissible procedure? But an unavoidable problem for all domination lies only in this: Should or can it grant the members of its hierarchy, its officials and officers, the right—or even impose on them the duty—to examine at any time any order which demands obedience from them, to determine whether it is lawful, and to decide accordingly whether to obey or refuse?

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

No domination which has appeared in history to date has given an affirmative answer to this question. Only certain members of the hierarchy were ever granted this right; and they were not granted it without limits. This was also the case, for instance, under the extremely democratic constitution of the German Reich during the Weimar Republic and is so today under the occupation rule of the four great powers over Germany.

In as far as such a right of examination is not granted to members of the hierarchy, the order has legal force for them.

All constitutional law, that of modern states as well, knows acts of state which must be respected by the authorities even when they are defective. Certain acts of laying down rules, certain decisions on individual cases which have received legal force, are valid even when the person giving the order has exceeded his competence or has made a mistake in form.

If only because the process of going back to a still higher order must finally come to an end, orders must exist under every government that are binding on the members of the hierarchy under all circumstances and are therefore law where the officials are concerned, even if outsiders may see that they are defective as regards content or form, if measured against the previous laws of the state concerned or against rules imposed from outside the state.

For instance, in direct democracies, an order given as the result of a plebiscite of the nation is a fully valid rule or an absolutely binding decree. Rousseau knew how much the "volonte de tous" can be in contradiction to what is right, but he did not fail to appreciate that the orders of this "volonte de tous" are binding.

DEFENSE

In indirect democracies the resolutions of a congress, of a national assembly or of a parliament may have the same force.

In the partly direct, partly indirect democracy of the Weimar Constitution of the German Reich, the laws resolved by a majority of the Reichstag large enough to alter the constitution and proclaimed by the president were under all circumstances law for all functionaries, including the independent courts of law, even if the legislator—knowingly or unknowingly—might have violated rules not imposed by the state but by churches or by the community of states. In the latter case the Reich would have been guilty of an international offense. For it would not have seen to it that its legislation was in accordance with international law.

It would, therefore, have been responsible in accordance with the international regulations regarding reparation for international offenses. But until the law concerned had been eliminated in accordance with the rules of German constitutional law, all officials of the hierarchy would have had to obey it.

No functionary would have had the right, let alone the duty, to examine its legal binding force with the aim of obeying or refusing to obey it, depending on the result of this examination. This is not different in any other state in the world. It never was and never can be different. Every single state has had the experience of its ultimate orders, its highest orders, which must be binding on the hierarchy if the authority of the state is to exist at all, being on occasion in conflict with rules not imposed by the state to divine law, to natural law and to the laws of reason. Good governments take trouble to avoid such conflicts. To the great sorrow—indeed to the despair—of many Germans, Hitler frequently brought about such conflicts—and serious conflicts too. And, if only for this reason, his way of governing was not a good one, even though it was for some years successful in some spheres. Only it must here be asserted straight away: These conflicts never affected the entire nation or the entire hierarchy—at least not immediately—but always merely groups of the nation or individual offices of the hierarchy; and it was only some of the people concerned who were fundamentally affected, many being only superficially involved; not to mention those conflicts that remained unknown to the overwhelming majority of the people and of the hierarchy, nor, therefore, those orders by which Hitler not only showed himself to be inhuman in individual cases, but simply outside the pale of what is human. It is a purely academic question: Would Hitler's power have taken such deep root, or would it have maintained itself if these inhumanities had become known to larger sections of the people and of the hierarchy? They just did not.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

Now in a state in which the entire power to make final decisions is concentrated in the hands of a single individual, the orders of this one man are absolutely binding on the members of the hierarchy. This individual is their sovereign, their legibus solutus, as was first formulated—as far as I can see—by French political science with as much logic as eloquence. After all, the world is not faced by such a phenomenon for the first time. In former times it may even have seemed to be normal. In the modern world, a world of constitutions based on the separation of powers under the supervision of the people, absolute monocracy does not seem to be right in principle. And even if this is not yet the case today, one day the world will know that the vast majority of thinking Germans did not think any differently on this matter from the majority of thinking people of other nations of Europe and outside it.

Such absolutely monocratic constitutions can nevertheless come about as the result of events which no individual can grasp in their entirety and even less control at will. This is what happened in Germany from the beginning of 1933 onwards. This is what happened gradually, stage by stage to the parliamentary Weimar Republic, which under Hindenburg was changed into a presidential republic, in a process which partly furthered the development by acts of state which stressed legal forms and which can be read in state documents, but partly simply formed the rules by accepted custom. The Reich law of the 24 March 1933, by which the institution of Reich government laws was created and thus the separation of powers in the sense in which it had been customary was, in practice, eliminated, was, according to the transcript of the Reichstag session, brought about with a majority sufficient for altering the constitution. Doubts about the legality of the law have nevertheless been raised on the grounds that a section of the elected deputies had been kept away from the session by the police and another section of the deputies who were present had been intimidated so that only an apparent majority sufficient for altering the constitution had passed the law. It has even been said that no Reichstag, not even if everybody had been present and all of them had voted, could have abolished the fundamental constitutional principle of the separation of powers, as no constitution could legalize its own suicide. We need not go into this: the institution of government laws became so firmly rooted as a result of undisputed practice that only a formal jurisprudence that is entirely cut off from realities could attempt to play articles of law off against the realities of life and to ignore the constitutional change which had taken place. And for the same reason one's arguments are misguided if one ignores how the institution of government laws, i.e., of cabinet laws, was later changed by custom into one of several forms in which the Fuehrer legislated. At the base of every state order, as of any order whatsoever, there lie habit and custom. From the time when Hitler became head of the state, practice quickly led to Hitler standing both before the hierarchy and before the whole people as the undisputed and undisputable possessor of all competence. The result of the development was at any rate that Hitler became the supreme legislator as well as the supreme author of individual orders. It was not least of all under the impression of the surprising successes, or what were considered successes in Germany and abroad, above all during the course of this war, that he became this. Perhaps the German people is—even though with great differences between North and South, West and East—particularly easily subjected to actual power, particularly easily led by orders, particularly used to the idea of a superior. Thus the whole process may have been made easier. Finally the only thing that was not quite clear was Hitler's relationship to the judiciary. for, even in Hitler-Germany, it was not possible to kill the idea that it was essential to allow justice to be exercised by independent courts, at least in matters which concern the wide masses in their everyday life. Up to the highest group of party officials—this has been shown by some of the speeches by the then Reich Justice Leader, the defendant Dr. Frank, presented here—there was resistance, which was actually not very successful, when justice in civil and ordinary criminal cases was also to be forced into the "sic volo sic jubeo" of the one man. But: apart from the judiciary, which was actually also tottering, absolute monocracy was complete. The Reichstag's pompous declaration about Hitler's legal position, dated the 26 April 1942⁷⁰ was actually only the statement of what had become practice long before.

DEFENSE

The Fuehrer's orders were law already a considerable time before this second World War.

In this state order of his, the German Reich was treated as a partner by the other states, and this in the whole field of politics. In this connection I do not wish to stress the way (so impressive to the German people and so fatal to all opposition) in which this took place in 1936 at the Olympic Games, a show which Hitler could not order the delegations of foreign nations to attend, as he ordered Germans to the Nurnberg party rally in the case of his state shows. I should like rather only to point out that the governments of the greatest nations in the world considered the word of this "almighty" man the final decision, incontestably valid for every German and based their decisions on major questions on the fact that Hitler's order was incontestably valid. To mention only the most striking cases, this fact was relied upon when the British Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, after the Munich conference, displayed the famous peace paper when he landed at Croydon. This fact was adhered to when people went to war against the Reich as the barbarous despotism of this one man.

⁷⁰ Cf. Text in App. I under C (Exhibit 42).

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

No political system has yet pleased all people who live under it or who feel its effects abroad. The German political system in the Hitler era displeased a particularly large and ever increasing number of people at home and abroad. But that does not in any way alter the fact that it existed, not lastly because of the recognition from abroad and because of its effectiveness, which caused a British Prime Minister to make the now world-famous statement at a critical period, that democracies need two years longer than the totalitarian governments to attain a certain goal. Only one who has lived as if expelled from among his own people, amid blindly believing masses who idolized this man as infallible, knows how firmly Hitler's power was anchored in the anonymous and innumerable following who believed him capable only of doing what was good and right. They did not know him personally, he was for them what propaganda made of him, but this he was so uncompromisingly that everybody who saw him from close to and saw otherwise, knew clearly that resistance was absolutely useless and, in the eyes of other people, was not even martyrdom.

Would it therefore not be a self-contradictory proceeding if both the following assertions were to be realized at the same time in the rules of this trial?

1. The Reich was the despotism of this one man, and for this very reason a danger to the world.

2. Every functionary had the right—in fact the duty—to examine the orders of this man and to obey or not obey them according to the result of this examination.

The functionaries had neither the right nor the duty to examine the orders of the monarch to determine their legality. For them these orders could not be illegal at all, with one exception which will be discussed later—an exception which, if carefully examined, is seen to be only an apparent one—namely with the exception of those cases in which the monarch placed himself—according to the indisputable values of our times—outside every human order, and in which a real question of right or wrong was not put at all and thus a real examination was not demanded.

DEFENSE

Hitler's will was the ultimate authority for their considerations on what to do and what not to do. The Fuehrer's order cut off every discussion. Therefore: A person who, as a functionary of the hierarchy refers to an order of the Fuehrer's, is not trying to provide a ground for being exempted from punishment for an illegal action, but he denies the assertion that his conduct is illegal; for the order which he complied with was legally unsatisfiable.

Only a person who has understood this can have a conception of the difficult inner struggles which so many German officials had to fight out in these years in face of many a decree or resolution of Hitler's. For them such cases were not a question of a conflict between right and wrong: disputes about legality sank into insignificance. For them the problem was one of legitimacy. As time went on, human and divine law opposed each other ever more strongly and more frequently.

Therefore, whatever the Charter understands by the orders which it sets aside as a ground for exemption from punishment, can the Fuehrer's order be meant by this? Can it come within the meaning of this rule? Must one not accept this order for what it was according to the interior German constitution as it had developed, a constitution which had been explicitly or implicitly recognized by the community of states? Many Germans did not like Hitler's position of power from the very beginning, and to many Germans who welcomed it at first because they yearned for clear and quick decisions, it later became a horror. But that does not in any way alter the following fact: must not those people who did their duty in this hierarchy; willingly or unwillingly, in accordance with this constitution, feel that an injustice was being done to them if they were sentenced because of a deed or an omission which was ordered by the Fuehrer?

A community of states could refuse to accept or tolerate as members such states as have a despotic constitution. But up to now this has not been the case. If it is to be different in the future, the non-despotic powers must take the necessary steps to prevent any member of the family of states turning into a despotic power and to prevent any despotic power entering the family circle from outside. Today people are realizing more and more clearly that this is the crux of our question. The circumstances must be very special if a modern people lets itself be governed despotically, even if it is as well disciplined as the German people. But as soon as such circumstances do exist, there are no internal counter-measures left. Then only the outside world can help. But if, instead of this, the outside world recognizes this constitution, it is impossible to see where successful internal resistance can come from. In pointing to these special circumstances and to the recognition by the outside world, we draw attention to facts, for the existence of which no German was, in our case, responsible, but which cannot be ignored when one asks how all this was possible.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

But certain further facts must also be drawn attention to, without a knowledge of which one cannot fully grasp the fact that Hitler's absolute monocracy was able to get such a terribly firm hold. Hitler combined in his person all the powers of issuing legislative and administrative orders on the highest level, orders which could not be questioned and were absolutely valid; but immediately below him the power of the state was divided up into a vast mass of spheres of competence. But the dividing lines between these spheres were not always sharply drawn. In the modern state, particularly in the major states of a technical era, this cannot be avoided. But the tendency to exaggerate questions of competence is certainly no less marked in Germany than in any other country. This facilitated the erection of dividing lines between the departments. Every department watched jealously to see that no other one trespassed into its field. It everywhere suspected tendencies of other departments to expand; considering the great mass of tasks which the so-called "totalitarian" state had heaped upon itself, cases where two or three departments were competent for the same matter could not be avoided. Conflicts between departments were inevitable. If a conspiracy existed, as the Indictment assumes, the conspirators were remarkably incompetent organizers. Instead of cooperating and going through thick and thin together, they fought each other. Instead of a conspiracy we rather have a discordance.

The history of the jealousy and mistrust between the powerful persons under Hitler has still to be written. And let us now remember that in the relations between all departments, and within each department, people surrounded themselves with ever increasing secrecy; between departments and within the departments, between ranks and within the various ranks, more and more matters were classed as "secret". Never before has there been so much "public life", i.e., non-private life, in Germany as under Hitler; but also never before was public life so screened from the people, above all from the individual members of the hierarchy themselves, as under Hitler.

The one supreme will became, quite simply, technically indispensable. It became the mechanical connecting link for the whole. A functionary who met with objections or even resistance to one of his orders from other functionaries only needed to refer to an order of the Fuehrer's to get his way. For this reason many, very many, among those Germans who felt Hitler's regime to be intolerable, who indeed hated him like the devil, looked ahead only with the greatest anxiety to the time when this man would disappear from the scene: for what would happen when this connecting link disappeared? It was a vicious circle.

DEFENSE

I repeat: An order of the Fuehrer's was binding—and indeed legally binding—on the person to whom it was given, even if the directive was contrary to international law or to other traditional values. But was there really no dividing line? During the first period at any rate—i.e. just as the time when the foundations of power were being laid, at the time when the monocratic constitution was being developed step by step—Hitler's followers amongst the people saw in their Fuehrer a man close to the people, a selfless, almost superhumanly intuitive and clear thinking pilot, believed only the best of him and only had one worry; whether he was also choosing the right men as his assistant and whether he was always aware of what they were doing. The tremendous power, the unlimited authority, were given to this Hitler. As in every state it also included harsh orders. But it was never intended as authority to be inhuman. Here lies the dividing line. But this line has at no time and nowhere been quite clearly drawn. Today the German people are completely disrupted in their opinions, feelings and intentions; but they are probably in agreement on one thing, with very few exceptions: they would not wish to draw this line with less severity as accusers than other peoples do towards their leaders. Beyond that line, Hitler's order constituted no legal justification. But it must not be forgotten that this line is not only vague by nature, but follows a different course in peace to what it does in wartime, when so many values are changed, and when men of all nations, especially in our days, take pride in deeds which would horrify them at any other time. And the decision to wage war does not in itself overstep that line, in spite of its tremendous consequences. Not in any nation in the world.

Hitler himself, at any rate, did not recognize this dividing line of inhumanity, of non-humanity, as a limit of obedience in his relations with his subordinates, and here also opposition would have been considered a crime punishable by death in the eyes and for the decisions of this man with limitless power who controlled an irresistible machine. What should a man who received an order overstepping this line, have done? A terrible situation! The reply of Greek tragedy, the reply of Antigone in such a conflict, cannot be imposed. It would be Utopian to expect it, or even demand it, as a mass phenomenon.

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

Before we come to the special question of who in the Reich possessed the power of deciding about war and peace, a further word remains to be said about the forms which Hitler's orders assumed.

Hitler's orders are solely the decisions of this one man, whether they were given orally or in writing, and in the latter case, whether they were clothed in more or less ceremony.

There are some orders by Hitler which can be recognized as such immediately. They are called "Erlass" (Decree) like the Decree concerning the setting up of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia of 16 March 1939, or "Verordnung" (order), like the order for the execution of the Four-Year Plan of 19 October 1936, or "Weisung" (Directive), like the strategic decisions, so often cited during this trial, or simply "Deschluss" (Decision) or "Anordnung" (Instruction); often they are signed in Hitler's name only; sometimes we find the signatures of one or more of the high or highest civil or military functionaries as well. But it would be fundamentally wrong to assume that this was a case of counter-signatures as they are understood in the modern democratic constitutional law of nations ruled constitutionally or by a parliament—of a counter-signature which makes the signatory responsible to a parliament or to a State Court of Law. Hitler's orders were his own orders and only his own orders. He was much too fanatical a champion of the one-doctrine, i.e. of the principle that every decision must be made by one-and-only-one-man, to consider anything else even possible, above all things in the case of his own decisions. We will leave his high opinion of himself entirely aside in this connection. Whatever the more or less decorative significance of such counter-signing may have been, there was never any doubt that the Fuehrer's orders represented only his own decision and no one else's.

Special attention must here be drawn to those laws which appeared as Reich Cabinet laws or Reichstag laws. Hitler's signing of a law of the Reich Cabinet represented the formal certification of a Cabinet decision. In actual fact, however, a stage was reached where the Reich Cabinet laws were also solely decisions by Hitler who had previously given some of his ministers the opportunity to state the opinion of their departments. And when Hitler signed a law which, according to its preamble, had been decreed by the Reichstag, this was again only a case of a formal certification. In reality, however, it was a decision by Hitler.

DEFENSE

From November 1933 onwards at the latest, the German Reichstag was not a parliament but an assembly for the acclamation of Hitler's declarations or decisions. These scenes of legislation appeared to many people at home and abroad almost to be an attempt to make democratic forms of legislation ridiculous by caricaturing them; nobody—either at home or abroad—regarded them as proceedings during which an assembly of several hundred men arrived at a decision after consideration, speeches and counter-speeches.

There are, however, also orders by Hitler which are not signed by him, but which can immediately be recognized as his orders. They are drawn up by a Reich Minister or some other high functionary, who states in the introduction "The Fuehrer has ordered", "The Fuehrer has decreed". We have before us not an order by the signatory, but a report by the signatory on an order given orally by Hitler. The orders by Hitler as Supreme Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces were thus often clothed in the form of such a report.

Finally, there are orders by Hitler which can only be recognized as such by a member of the public if he possesses knowledge of the constitutional position. When the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces (the OKW) issues an order, it is always an order by Hitler. Hitler himself, together with his working staff, was the OKW. The power to issue OKW orders rested solely with Hitler.

By my explanations regarding the constitution of the Hitler Reich, I have already—so to speak by implication—dealt with the question as to who was responsible for the ultimate decisions—for this state's decisions regarding questions of existence, especially for the decision about war and peace * * *.

Kelsen said—in his great treatise of the year 1943, which I have already mentioned above⁸⁰,—"probably the Fuehrer alone". We must say: Quite definitely alone.

Under the Weimar Constitution, the sole body responsible was the Reich legislature. Article 45 demands a Reich law for a declaration of war and for the conclusion of peace. And a Reich law could be passed only by the Reichstag or by a vote of the German people. Neither the Reich President, i.e., the Head of the State, nor the Reich Cabinet had the power. They might, at most, have created such circumstances by acts lying within their jurisdiction—possibly the Reich President as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces—as to give the Reich legislature no option in its decision; a problem which, as is well known, has become a real one in the United States with regard to the relationship of the President to Congress and has, therefore, been seriously discussed, while it was not a real one for the Germany of the Weimar Constitution. If, however, the Reich legislature had, by means of a law, taken the decision to wage war, the Reich President and the whole State hierarchy, particularly the Armed Forces, would have been bound by this decision with no right of examination, let alone of objection, even if all the experts on international law in the world had regarded the law as contrary to international law. The Weimar Democracy could have tolerated as little as any other nation a state of affairs in which military leaders as such could examine the decision to wage war taken by the political leaders, in the sense that they could refuse obedience if they thought fit. The military means of power must be at the disposal of the political leaders of a state. Otherwise they are not means of power at all. This has always been so. And it will have to be so all the more if the duty to give assistance against aggression is really to apply amongst the nations.

⁸⁰ Kelsen, Collective and Individual Responsibility, p. 546, App. III, exhibit 57, passage (24) and (25).

BREACH OF PEACE BETWEEN STATES

I have already shown how, in the course of a step by step transformation which laid particular emphasis on legal forms, Hitler replaced all the highest authorities of the Weimar period, and combined all the highest competences in his own person. His orders were law.

The circumstances in a state may be such that the man who is legally solely competent for the decision about war and peace, has, in practice, no—or not the sole—authority. If, however, both the sole legal competence and the sole authority in actual practice have ever been coincidental in any state, such was the case in Hitler Germany. And if, in any question, Hitler ever even accepted the advice of a third party such was not the case in the question of war or peace. He was the arbiter of war and peace between the Reich and other nations.

He alone.

In conclusion: Sentences against individuals for breach of the peace between States would be something completely new legally—something revolutionarily new. It makes no difference whether we view the matter from the point of view of the British or the French Chief Prosecutors.

Sentences against individuals for breach of the peace between states presupposes other laws than those in force when the actions laid before this Tribunal took place.

DEFENSE

The Legal QUESTION OF GUILT—and I am here only concerned with that—IS THUS POSED IN ITS FULL COMPLEXITY. For not one of the defendants could have held even one of the two views of the legal world constitution on which the Chief Prosecutors base their arguments.

III. HERMANN WILHELM GOERING

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Otto Stahmer, Defense Counsel

May it please the Tribunal!

This Trial—which is of a historical and political importance, and a significance in shaping new laws, and which is of dimensions such as have not been known hitherto in the history of law—these proceedings which concern not only the defendants present in the court, but which are of the greatest importance to the German people are now passing into a new phase.

As is stated in Article 24*h* of the Charter, the defense has the floor.

The position of the defense in these proceedings is especially difficult; for there is an all too unequal distribution of strength between the prosecution and the defense.

Months before the start of the trial the prosecution with the aid of a huge staff of experienced coworkers was able to explore all the offices and archives in and outside Germany and to examine witnesses in all territories, so it was in a position to submit to the Tribunal a tremendous amount of documentary material.

The difficult position of the defense is further aggravated by the fact that in the Anglo-American procedure on which this trial is based there is a clause missing which is contained in the German criminal procedure according to which the prosecution is also bound to procure and submit evidence exonerating the accused.

[The President of the Tribunal, at this point, refuted the preceding statement and reminded Dr. Stahmer that almost all documents presented by the defense in this case had been procured by the prosecution.—Ed]

After reading of the Indictment, Reichmarshal Goering in reply to the question of the presiding judge as to whether he pleaded guilty or not guilty, declared: "Not guilty in the sense of the indictment."

This statement of the accused necessitates an examination of all the charges made by the prosecution.

The accused has of course already dealt with many questions, which are of considerable importance for his defense, during his personal examination. He expressed his opinion in detail with regard to political and military happenings and exhaustively described the motives for his actions, and the origin and course of events.

I am thankful to the high Tribunal for permitting the accused to portray matters in all their breadth, as he saw, felt, and experienced them for this, and only this direct personal portrayal can afford good insight into the personal attitude of the accused and make it possible to give a reliable opinion of his personality. This knowledge is absolutely necessary if the Tribunal is to come to a decision, which is not only in harmony with objective law but which also renders the maximum of justice to the individuality of the perpetrator.

DEFENSE

I do not consider it necessary, after the accused was heard so exhaustively on all particulars, to deal with every question to which he has already given the requisite explanation. In view of this I shall limit the defense to the following statements:

Preliminary History

We are in a transitory period of history of the greatest significance. An age is coming to an end which has been less known for its concept of order than for its concept of liberty. This striving for liberty released tremendous forces—so gigantic that in the end it was impossible to master them. The tremendous progress this era has unquestionably brought about in scientific and technical spheres we have dearly paid for with the shattering of all human order and the loss of peace in the entire world. So far the profound reasons for such a disastrous development have hardly been discussed in this court. But in order to rightly understand the grave crimes and confusion which are indicted here it is imperative to throw some light on the historical background.

The French chief prosecutor has already pointed out that the roots of National Socialism are to be found in a period far removed from us. He goes back even right to the beginning of the last century. He sees the first step to a leading astray of the German character in Fichtes "Reden an die deutsche Nation".

"Fichte preached the doctrine of Pan-Germanism" he says, insofar as he wanted to see the world planned and organized by others, just as he himself saw it and would have liked it to be shaped. I cannot understand how this should express more than the universal human desire to take part in the shaping of a common destiny. Only the methods of such attempts to participate may at times be justly criticized. A Swiss assertion, which also perceives in Fichte the cause of Germany's going astray, seems to me to be clarifying in this respect. It does not, however, accuse him of Pan-Germanism, that is, of the will to subjugate foreign peoples, but rather reproaches him for having attempted at all to unite the Germans into one nation. It contends that this was an inadmissible attempt to imitate the French and British, whereas it would have been more suited to the German character to remain a nation made up of different peoples. For only as such could it have continued its historical mission to remain the nucleus of a European federation.

Judging by Fichte alone the development is therefore not so easily interpreted.

If one wishes to think historically, one cannot look back and consider Fichte alone. For his "Reden an die deutsche Nation" was only an answer to the "Ruf an Alle" which the French revolution had sent out into the world, and they were directly provoked by the appearance of Napoleon. One must go back over the chain of causes and effects to their very beginning. This, the beginning of a national and personal striving for liberty which has characterized the whole of modern times, we find in the Middle Ages.

The colorful play of national and imperial tendencies and struggles which have typified ancient times was overcome by the conception of one eternal omnipotent Christian church. With this a state order superseded the dynamic forces of the time, an order which according to the doctrine of the church was created by the Lord himself and was therefore "full of God's grace" (von Gottes Gnaden). It strove to enfold universally all of humanity and to lead to peace and rest in God. It was the teachers of the church in the Middle Ages who first ventured to subject war to the principles of law. Prior to that it was taken as a matter of course or a natural phenomenon like sickness or bad weather and was often looked upon as a judgment of God. Men like St. Augustine and Thomas Aquinas opposed this conception and declared that one must differentiate between a just and an unjust war. They did this upon the basis and within the framework of a Christian belief, by which God had entrusted mankind with the fulfillment of a moral world order to bind one and all and which would provide the answer to the question of the righteousness or unrighteousness of a war.

When with the Renaissance and the Reformation the spiritual basis of the medieval order was shaken, this development into a universal world peace took on the opposite character. Life, formerly inclined towards an orderly peace based upon the state, now turned into a torrent which, as it swept ever faster through the centuries gradually grew to the present catastrophe. The individual thirsting for freedom dispensed with the shackles of church and class distinction. The State declaring itself sovereign violated the universal order of God, as represented by the church. Not recognizing any superior power, it began to conquer as much living space (Lebensraum) as it could on this earth, as long as the stronger will of another nation did not impose any natural barriers on it. Peace hence existed only in the naturally rather unstable equilibrium—of powers obeying only their own laws.

So came into existence world empires such as the British Empire, Russia, and the United States, the tremendous French colonial empire which as living space today comprise more than one half of the surface of the entire world.

DEFENSE

The theory of war as a crime created by Grotius, the teacher of international law, quoted by the prosecution failed because it was incompatible with the dynamic power of this time. It embodies as we know only an attempt to keep alive through secular arguments the aforementioned concept of Christian warfare. One cannot, however, derive justice from nature alone. It knows no other measure than brute force. It actually always decides in favor of the stronger. Considered from a metaphysical standpoint, justice can be defined as an independent force, set above natural impulse. Therefore the theory of Grotius necessarily petered out in the 18th century as thinking in a purely worldly sense it could not find a criterion for a just war.

From this time on the search for true justice stirs the world. All socialist theories are only attempts of solving this problem. After having been disappointed by the doctrines of too much liberty, mankind once again seeks security and order. Some wish to return to the Christian truth of God while others want to go forward in order to solve the problem through human intellect eventually. The National Socialists, whose most revolutionary leaders wanted to go further backwards and at the same time forward to a self-deification of life in a biological political sense, have been conquered and eliminated. Yet a solution of the problems of world order has hitherto not been found. The victorious powers intend to come close to it, however, by drawing a line between themselves and the vanquished through a common indictment and punishment of the same as criminals.

Fundamentals of Law

From whence will they take the standard by which to decide about justice and injustice in a legal sense? Insofar as such standards exist by international law, valid up to now, further statements are not required. That a special court for the trial was created by the Charter of this tribunal I also do not object to. I must, however, vigorously protest against its use, insofar as it is meant to create a new material law, by threatening punishment for crimes which, at the time of their perpetration, at least as far as individuals are concerned, did not carry any punishment.

Can one expect, that hereafter punishment will be recognized as just, if the culprit was never aware of it, because at the time he was not threatened with such punishment, and he believed to be able to derive the authorization for his way of acting solely from the political aims pursued? What does a reference to the ethical laws help, if such must be first found again? According to Justice

Jackson's opinion, however, the Nazi Government never from the start was the representative of a legitimate state which had pursued the legitimate aims of a member of the international community. Only from such an attitude can the indictment for conspiracy be understood which is to be discussed later. In fact this (indictment) is far ahead of its time as is the whole way of argumentation by Justice Jackson. Because internationally recognized standards—outside the positive international law—by which the legitimacy of states and of their aims could have been judged did not exist, just as little as an international community as such. Slogans about the legitimacy of one's own and of the illegitimacy of foreign aspirations served only the formation of political fronts just as the efforts to brand political adversaries as disturbers of the peace. In any case they did, indeed, not create law.

Justice Jackson declared justly, that it would have been possible for the conquerors to deal with the conquered as they saw fit. But, said he, non-discriminatory executions or without a final establishment of guilt would be a breach of promise given repeatedly. For this reason he himself proposed judicial proceedings which would have to differ from the ordinary criminal proceeding by not admitting the usual tactics of obstruction and delay by the defendants. But an establishment of guilt should be made, based on a just and fair trial. If the defendants were the first leaders of a conquered nation which had to answer before the law they were also the first ones to whom the opportunity was given to defend their lives "in the name of justice".

If this sentence is to have a meaning then it must be of signification for interpretation of the Charter. Because it would not be reasonable that the court were obliged to stand exclusively by the Charter without taking into consideration international law recognized hitherto and convictions of others with regard to law. In that case the judgment would rather become a pure dictate of force to appeal against which "in the name of justice" would make no sense.

The Charter may therefore be applied by the court only insofar as its decrees are justifiable before the conscience not only formally but also materially. The Charter itself says that nobody may be excused for a violation of its decrees by hiding behind an order of his government or of a superior. In that case it must apply this, its own logic also to itself by allowing the judge to examine the congruence of its prescripts with the general principles of just ways of thought. For a judge, after all, is far more free and independent from the law maker than a subaltern from his superior or a subject from his dictator.

DEFENSE

Nulla poena sine lege praevia

Then there is another question, whether really decrees of the Charter are so much in opposition to the previous and ordinary state of law especially to the fundamental ideas of all rules of law that the court cannot acknowledge them as right or apply them. Practically the most serious problem consists thereby in the decision what should have precedence in the case of conflict, the Charter or the legal maxim "Nulla poena sine lege praevia".

One has tried to justify the exceptional case of disregarding this rule in this given instant with the highly political character of the trial. Such a justification, however, cannot possibly be recognized. The political significance of this trial shows itself otherwise by its consequences near and far, but not yet in the very procedure by influencing the legal norms to be applied. A judge should administer law but not deal in politics. He is called upon still less, to rectify mistakes made by the politicians. Punishment, the establishment of which in due time was neglected, may only be decreed by him on the strength of a subsequent law, if he would do this also in other cases, but not only as an exception to please the politicians.

Because, as a principle the maxim of the division of power is supposed to be maintained. By this principle Montesquieu divided the originally united power of the absolute King into legislative, administrative and judiciary. The three different forms of expression of state domination were, having equal rank, to be in equilibrium and so to aid in controlling one another. This system of division of powers characterizes the modern constitutional state. In a slightly strained way one may define the field of activities and competency of the three different forms of expression of sovereign authority in stating that the legislature has to deal with the future, administration with the present, and judiciary with the past.

The legislature sets the standards to which life is to conform. From time to time these must be changed and put in accord with the changed way of living. But till then they remain valid.

Insofar as a mere establishment of norms of life is not sufficient it will be formed, case by case, by the administration. The administration itself is bound by certain norms, but on principle has free play within the lawful bounds of its good judgment so as to be able to respond to the daily changing needs. For it, just as for the law-making politician, the idea of serving a purpose is decisive.

The judge on the other hand may not decide according to the usefulness but shall decide according to the law. In general it is not his task to create, but to judge. He has to judge the actions after they were committed and the conditions after they have arisen, whether and in how much they corresponded to the standards respectively, what juridical consequences they have brought about. Therefore, as a matter of principle, his view is directed towards the past. In the life of the state, which is continuously inspired by politicians looking to the future, he is the steadfast counterpole serving as a brake.

Though he is bound by the laws decreed by the politician, he is not merely an executive organ. On the contrary he should control the lawmaker by reexamining the laws with regard to their conforming to the constitution. Therein, in any case, according to reason, would belong the examination whether the principle of the division of powers was maintained. Because just as the judge may judge but, "de lege latea" and must leave the decisions "de lege ferenda" to the lawmaker, the latter is obliged in reverse not to meddle with the former's competency by giving laws with retroactive power.

The criticism of the administration of justice of the National Socialist state is mainly based on its having abandoned the division of power. By putting at the top the political leadership idea (Fuehrerprinzip) it meddled despotically with the competency of the judges. By means of the police, i.e., the administration, it arrested and imprisoned people without judicial warrant of arrest only for reason of political prevention, and even arrested others that had been acquitted by the judge and set free. On the other hand for political reasons, convicted criminals were withdrawn from the hands of justice. Thereby quite naturally, safety and clarity of the law were seriously endangered.

Thereby a certain degree of protection against arbitrary judgments and the splitting up of law, lay in the fact that the National Socialist State was based on a specific ideology by which the judge was bound.

Concerning the close connection between finding of justice and ideology, the Swiss Professor of law Hans Fehr Bern already in 1927 wrote in his book, "Law and Reality; insight into the growth and decay of the forms of law" ("Einblick in Werden und Vergehen der Rechtsformen"). He says literally:

"Ohne Weltanschauung schwiebt das Recht in luftleeren Raum
 * * * Wer keine Weltanschauung besitzt, kann auch keine Rechtsanschauung haben * * *."

Translation: "Without ideology law floats in a vacuum * * * Anyone who has no ideology, can not have a sense of right or wrong either * * *."

In contrast to this a decisive ideological base as a foundation of the Charter is not recognizable. As its signatories stand on very different ideological ground we will have to start out in it, as in the international law valid hitherto, from the liberal idea of freedom of ideology. Therefore the legal thesis "Nulla poena sine lege" should be especially sacred for it. This is also proven by the fact that the Control Council for Germany, by abolishing the criminal analogy of article 2a of the criminal code, brought the above maxim back again to all Germans most emphatically.

DEFENSE

Nor does an examination of the political aims connected with the Charter help out. Justice Jackson has called the Charter and the Trials a step in the direction : "To create a juridical guarantee that, who starts a war, will pay for it in person". The American commentator Walter Lippmann stated elsewhere, that the system of collective security for the prevention of wars had broken down, because nobody was prepared to declare war on the breaker of peace in order to help prevent a war which did not directly affect him.

The means for combating the disease of war would have been just as bad as the disease itself. In consequence of the fiasco of the collective methods, the thought to base security in the future upon holding responsible those individual persons accountable for breaking the peace crystallized with the enemies of Germany in the last war. And so it led to the Nurnberg trial. Taking one's starting point from this fact today one could say: During this second world war revolutionary developments have taken place. It has driven humanity beyond the sphere of what has been the modern age until a short time ago. The first but essential steps to create a world state have been made.

The way to peace, as shown here by Lippmann, will be welcomed on principle although one still will doubt its absolute reliability. Justice Jackson himself has expressed doubts whether punishment will be a warning and help prevent breaking the peace in the future. Only one who is certain of victory will decide to wage a war and so will not seriously consider punishment which will reach him only in the case of defeat. Therefore the educational issue of this trial, to strengthen the sense of justice, seems more important than the effect of deterring which can also be achieved by warning for the future. The politician will have to learn that the principle of division of power will also have to be observed by him and that he will not find a judge willing to mend his mistakes afterwards by punishing on the basis of future laws. The confidence in international jurisdiction, which today still suffers from the suspicion of being easily misused for political purposes, would be raised considerably through such a decree. And so even under the viewpoint of political usefulness the violation of the sentence "Nulla poena sine lege praevia" could not be justified. On the other hand, however, one must realize that the strengthening in the belief of the inflexibility of justice as the basic pillar of the tremendous dynamic of political forces, serves peace best.

This result can also not be questioned on the basis of the individual considerations presented by the representatives for the defendants.

The French prosecutors have pointed out that an active international law could not be imagined without international morals and that a moral code has to precede all claims for freedom by the individual as well as by the nations. These certainly are facts well worth considering. Correctly considered, however, they speak only for my viewpoint that the strengthening of the sense of justice must not begin by violating it.

When the French chief prosecutor declared that in the future there could be no belief in justice by not punishing the chief culprits of Nazi Germany, then obviously he went too far in the enthusiasm of the speech. Justice does not grow out of obtaining at any price satisfaction for the violated sense of justice. Otherwise we should quickly arrive again at the endless chain of horrors, at vendetta. No, justice demands moderation and consideration of motives and counter-motives. And there the one-sided action itself against members of the Axis powers violates the idea of justice. It is impossible to justify by it a direct violation against it, that is, against the otherwise commonly prevailing rule: "Nulla poena sine lege praevia".

The British Chief prosecutor himself declared the possibility of subsequent legislation for one of the most offensive doctrines of the National Socialistic legal terminology. With this he meant that the possibility of punishing an act already marked as a crime does not mean a change of the legal situation but only its logic development, and therefore is permissible. But I do not at all want to contest the institution of the Tribunal thereby justified by him. Rather the question arises whether this tribunal is obliged to punish even though no penal law can be found which threatened the offense with punishment already at the time of their commitment. The affirmation of this question would go much further than the National Socialistic judicial procedure rejected so vehemently by the British chief prosecutor. He did not present the slightest reason for it and therefore he himself seems to disavow it.

Moreover he should be prepared to admit that the Charter would have stated clearly and unambiguously, if it did not only presume but possibly also establish the basis for the punishability of acts referred to by it. The passage involved in Para. 6 of the Charter completely lacks such distinctness. It reads:

DEFENSE

"The following acts, or any of them, are crimes coming within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal * * *" and may be interpreted in the sense of a mere regulation of competence as well as, even though with difficulty, a regulation which first establishes punishableness. Therefore, this passage must in any case be interpreted in favor of the defendant according to the established legal principle "in dubio pro reo". The following sentence:

"for which there shall be individual responsibility" and the material regulations for punishment quoted in the following paragraphs, present, according to their wording, no reason for doubt as to their interpretation. However, they contain only modifications for an established punishableness. The Tribunal may decide whether or not they are compatible with the principle "Nulla poena sine lege praevia".

Most difficult to understand for me is the viewpoint of the American prosecutor. On one hand he passionately disavows all legal arbitrariness of the Nazis. On the other hand he is not prepared to acquiesce in the punishment of the defendants only for those crimes which were not only considered punishable at the time of being committed but also actually threatened with punishment. On one hand he does not want executions or punishment without first having accomplished the determination of guilt in a fair manner. On the other hand he demands a strict application of the Charter even though it contains new law surprising the defendants. On one hand he wants the trial to appear to future generations as the fulfilment of the human yearning for justice. On the other hand, in the face of objections to the Charter, he bluntly presumes upon the power of the victorious who really could have made short work with the defendants.

As far as the political side of this process is concerned I already stated why it must not exert an influence on the outcome of this trial. I wish to point out here that a policy which is tested out by the victors on the vanquished and therefore may be characterized as one of "the weakest resistance", has once before proven to be a failure.

Conspiracy

Of the crimes of which the defendants are accused conspiracy is most extensive as regards time and object. Professor Exner, in his capacity as a University teacher of criminal law, occupied himself in particular with the importance of the legal conception for our process. In order to save time by avoiding a duplicate report Professor Exner has placed the result of his research at my disposal.

In conformity with him I have to present the following regarding this question :

The conception "conspiracy" belongs to the Anglo-American law sphere. There, however, it is not at all uncontested, rather the opinion is noteworthy as being represented in England that this conception is long since obsolete: "It has been said that in England this law has become entirely disused." (Report of a judge in Regina v. Parnell and others—Kenney, Selection of Cases illustrative of English Criminal law, Oxford 1935, p. 145). In these proceedings it is a different point that matters. The concept of "Conspiracy", as used by the prosecution, is entirely unknown to German law. I would like, therefore, to begin my short legal argument with two questions which give rise to doubts.

1. May a criminal procedure, which is bent on realizing justice, use legal concepts which are and always have been utterly alien to the defendants and to the legal trend of thought of their people?

2. How would this be consistent with the rule, Nullum crimen sine lege praevia, a principle which the British chief prosecutor has acknowledged as a fundamental principle of civilized criminal law jurisdiction? Can it be honestly stated that already before 1939 not only the initiating of an illegal war was held to be an act punishable individually, but moreover a "conspiracy" for initiating such wars? The affirmative answer to this question given by the prosecution has surprised not Germany only. May I clear up, in this connection, a misunderstanding. It has been said that the National Socialist state itself had issued criminal laws ignoring the rule: "Nullum crimen sine lege", so that the defendants had no right to invoke this rule. It is by no means my purpose to defend National Socialist criminal law, but honesty compels me to say that this is an error. The Third Reich has—as mentioned before—issued three laws increasing the penalty for an action with retrospective effect by applying the death penalty to acts which carried when committed, prison sentences only. But in no case has—till now—a lawful act been declared punishable, nor an act considered not to be a crime, retrospectively converted into one. And this is the case here. But the Charter, which I follow now, has enjoined the use of the concept of "Conspiracy". I do not, therefore, go any further into these questions. At any rate, it would appear that if such a concept is to be applied to Germans, this could only be done with all restrictions imposed by equity.

Anglo-American law defines conspiracy as an agreement between a number of persons for accomplishing crimes. BLACK, Law dictionary 1933: "a combination or agreement between two or more persons for accomplishing an unlawful end or a lawful end by unlawful means." Similar definitions always keep occurring. Two points are characteristic : "Agreement" and "Common plan." Agreement means an explicit or tacit understanding. If some persons pursue the same end independently of one another, then there is no conspiracy. It is accordingly not enough that the plan is common to all of them, they must have knowledge of this community and every one must voluntarily accept the plan as his own. The very expression "to conspire" involves that everyone contributes knowingly and willingly. A person under duress is no conspirator, duress does not produce agreement, at the utmost in purely external assistance. For instance, if somebody imposes his will on another, then there is no conspiracy. A conspiracy with a dictator at its head is a contradiction in itself. A dictator does not enter into a conspiracy with his followers, he does not make any agreement with them, he just dictates.

DEFENSE

Knowledge and will of the conspirators are aimed at a common project. The contents of such a plan can be very different. In English law, for instance, conspiracies are known for committing murder, fraud, blackmail, false accusation, certain economic delicts (Stephen, Digest of criminal law, 6th vol., p. 39, 70, 113, 124, 137, 192, 305, 390). In all these cases conspiracy is treated as a crime by itself (sui generis) and, therefore, the conspirators are punishable for conspiracy regardless of the fact whether a murder, a fraud or even a mere attempt at such crimes has been committed. According to German terminology we would say: conspiracy is one of the cases, where even preparation of a crime is punishable. Such cases are known to German criminal law. The partner in an agreement for committing a crime against life is punishable. According to Art. 49b he is punishable for a "crime of preparing any killing" even if the intended action has not taken place. In a certain sense par. 129 can also be applied here. Partnership in an association pursuing certain aims hostile to the state is punishable, again independently of the fact, whether a crime has actually been committed. But if it comes to an action, everybody is charged with his own culpability in this action. If it happens that the individual conspirator is guilty neither as the perpetrator nor as an abettor nor as an accessory of the actual crime, then he can be charged with partnership in an association hostile to the state but not with such a crime.

The prosecutors in this trial are going further. They want to punish, under certain circumstances, the conspirators for individual actions they do not participate in. To take the most significant example, they want to charge a conspirator even with those crimes which were committed prior to his entering the conspiracy.

With the scant material at my disposal I was not able to find any evidence as to whether this has any foundation in English or American law. One thing is certain, however, that such a conclusion is utterly contrary to German criminal law. For the latter is based on the self-evident and unanimously accepted principle that one is only responsible for an action when one has been the author, or at least the part author of it.

Let us look now at the Charter. The Charter quotes two cases which are declared as punishable and which fall within the competence of the Court:

1. Paragraph 6a, partnership in a common plan or conspiracy for the perpetration of a crime against peace. As such are listed the planning, preparation, launching and conducting of a war of aggression or of a war involving a violation of international treaties or assurances. It is remarkable that a concept which belongs to the internal criminal and civil law of England and America is applied here, without more ado, to international facts. The Charter does this by treating individuals who plan or conduct illegal wars as gangsters participating in a highway robbery. This is legal audacity, because in this case the sovereign state stands between the individuals and the result of their actions, and this removes any foundation from the comparison with facts in international daily life. Up to now the concept of conspiracy has been unknown to international law. According to article 6, last paragraph, of the Charter the partners in a conspiracy or in a common plan to commit crimes against peace, the law of war or humanity are responsible for all actions committed by any partner while executing such a plan. This is, as a matter of principle, quite another thing from the case mentioned in 1. It does not mean punishment of the crime of conspiracy, but responsibility for the individual action of another conspirator. In other words, conspiracy, as taken here, is not a crime sui generis, but a form of complicity in the actions of the conspirators. Mr. Justice Jackson has given us an example: If three robbers conspire and one of them kills the victim, then all of them through their complicity are responsible for the killing.

2. Case 2 is of the greatest importance in this trial. The individual conspirator is to be punished for crimes committed not by himself, but by another conspirator. A defendant who had nothing to do with the annihilation of the Jews is to be punished for this crime against humanity only because he was a partner in a conspiracy.

The question at issue is: In this trial are principles of responsibility to be applied which go beyond our German ones?

DEFENSE

Article 6 of the Charter says that all conspirators are co-responsible for any action committed by any one of the co-conspirators "in execution of such a plan". These are the decisive words for the interpretation.

In my opinion, the meaning of these words is as follows: The other conspirators are co-responsible for any actions of their comrades which form part of the common plan, or which they therefore have helped think out or have willed or have at least accepted. A few examples:

a. A, B, C, D commit a concerted house-breaking in a villa. They happen to find a girl in the house, and A rapes her. B, C, D cannot be charged for this rape. The reason is that A did not do so, when committing the crime, "in execution of the plan" but if anything, at the "occasion of execution of the plan". The point at issue is not the execution, but merely the occasion arising while executing the plan. This opinion, which should not be disputed, is of importance, as it makes it clear that there cannot be any question of responsibility for all the actions of the partners to the conspiracy.

b. While exploring the villa, B and C come to fight about some piece of plunder, and B knocks down C. This action too was not committed "in execution of the plan", but was foreign to it. A and D are not responsible for this "excess".

c. While exploring the villa, the burglars are detected by the owner. D shoots him. Now the issue depends on the special circumstances of the case. Let us, for instance, go back to the example, quoted by Mr. Justice Jackson, of the three robbers, one of which kills the victim. Considering the nature of American gangsterism, it would appear quite normal that the individual gangsters concerned bore in mind the possibility of such an occurrence, and were quite prepared to approve of it. If this is the case, they are responsible for the killing, as accessories or assistants, also according to our opinion. In such a case, there would be no objection to Mr. Justice Jackson's solution. But if the case is different, if the fatal issue had not been foreseen by the others, could not even perhaps be foreseen—e.g., if they took it for granted that the inhabitants of the house were away from home—then there is no responsibility of the co-conspirators. They are responsible only for acts belonging to the "execution of the plan", and such a common plan includes only what has been foreseen, from the beginning, and approved. Other ways of execution are alien to the plan. Mr. Justice Jackson's argumentation is fallacious in so far as he derives a common principle from a decision which clearly and obviously happens to apply to the "normal case" of his paradigm of the robbers, and can hardly be applied to any other case. As the case stands, co-responsibility of any single act could be made to apply to those conspirators only who have foreseen and approved of their comrades' act.

A legal principle extending the fellow-conspirator's responsibility to such cases as are not included in their common responsibility, is alien to German law. Whether it belongs or not to Anglo-American law, the application of such a principle in the present trial would indeed make punishable acts which heretofore could not be punished. This would clearly contradict the rule: Nullum crimen sine lege praevia, a principle acknowledged explicitly by the British prosecutor too. In view of the fact that Article 6 can be interpreted in various ways, we should select out of two possible interpretations, as corresponding to the author's will, the one which does not contradict the said rule.

There exists a withdrawal from a conspiracy, and also a subsequent entrance into it. The question is: What about responsibility for acts committed during non-membership? The prosecution appears to be of the opinion that a person entering into the conspiracy hereby approves anything previously done by any conspirator, in pursuance of the common plan. Such an assertion seems to arise out of the civil law theory of a subsequent ratification of a business transaction. This theory cannot apply to criminal law. The Charter does not mention anything of the sort as the common plan, the execution whereof involved the act, was common to those who were members at that time. Even if one takes the act of joining the conspiracy to be an approval of its acts so far committed, the approval of a committed crime does not involve partnership in this crime.

The person joining later has nothing whatever to do with these crimes. The same applies to the withdrawal from the conspiracy, the person withdrawing can be made responsible only for what happened during his partnership, even if a result has occurred after his withdrawal. Again any other opinion would lead to the result, that a law "ex post facto" is being applied in a conspiracy within the meaning of the indictment, viz. a conspiracy to commit crimes against Peace, Usages of war and Humanity?

If such a conspiracy had existed, then Hitler would have been—nobody doubts it—the leader of these conspirators. It has been already emphasized that a conspiracy headed by a Dictator is a contradiction in itself. Hitler would have laughed if he had been told to have made an agreement with his ministers, party leaders and generals, to wage this or that war or to conduct the war by these or other means. He was an autocrat. He did not care for the approval of those men, but was merely concerned about having his decisions executed, whether they agree to these decisions or not.

DEFENSE

Quite besides this legal consideration, Hitler's environment did, in fact, by no means appear as a community of conspirators, as considered by the prosecution, and that before the hearing of evidence. Apart from a small party clan, he was surrounded by an atmosphere of distrust. He trusted neither the "defeatist club" of his ministers nor his "generals". Such was already the case before the war, and what his surroundings looked like during the war has been shown by witnesses with great impressiveness. A cunning system of secrecy ensured that plans and aims of the Fuehrer's remained unknown to his collaborators as long as at all possible, so that his most intimate assistants time and again were taken by surprise by the events, and, in fact, were shocked to learn some of them at the present trial only. This system of secrecy also ensured an isolation of his individual collaborators, as one hand was not allowed to know what the other did. Does this look like a conspiracy? In fact, Hitler complained at times that the generals were "conspiring" against him, and used, strangely, this very word while speaking of those who to-day are charged with having conspired with him. The evidence repeatedly mentions conspirations, but conspirations against Hitler.

From a purely psychological point of view, it is, to say the least, highly improbable that the score of survivors of the Third Reich picked out and put into the dock by the prosecution have ever formed a gang of conspirators in the sense of the indictment. Any homogeneity is lacking in this group of people as to outlook, background, education, social position and function, and part of the defendants only met in the dock.

The prosecution considers the party with its organizations as the nucleus, around which the conspiracy formed. We should, however, in this connection too, consider the different individual attitude. Some of the defendants have not been party members at all, or, at any rate, not for a long time, and but few of them have played an important part in the party. Some held top positions in the party and its organizations and devoted their entire activity to the aims of these organizations, while others did everything in their power to eliminate from their sphere of activity any influence of party and SS.

The foundation of the NSDAP took place in a period of utter powerlessness of the state and of general war-weariness of the people at a time when, truly, no intelligent person thought of a second war or, even less, about a war of aggression.

But were any of the defendants aims unattainable without war?

Surely, the wishful dream of every true German was the union of all adjoining German territory with the Reich. This applied to the Saar territory, Austria, Memel, Danzig, and, as a hope lingering in the far future, also to the Sudeten territory. They all had been in the past parts of the German Reich, they all would have already returned to the German Reich in 1919 if the right of self-determination solemnly promised to all peoples had been realized. But these objectives of German longing could be reached by peaceful means. And, in fact, they have been reached without a shot or a stroke with the one exception of Danzig, which would have been done in the same peaceful way if the Fuehrer had had a spark of patience and the Poles a spark of goodwill. But they neither wanted nor believed in a war. Hitler was believed capable of a large scale bluff, but not launching the catastrophe of a war. I cannot, therefore, believe in a conspiracy to commit crimes against peace and usages of war. May I add two points of general importance:

1. The first point refers to Goering's attitude previous immediately to the outbreak of war. He was at that time Hitler's confident friend, the country's second man, and is now the chief figure among the defendants. If there had been, in truth, a conspiracy to launch wars of aggression at that time, then he would have been the second in importance in such a conspiracy, but it was actually he who tried everything within his power, in the last days of August, 1939, to prevent the attack on Poland, and who tried behind Hitler's back to uphold peace. How would this be consistent with a conspiracy for initiating wars of aggression? Nor did he agree with a war against Russia, and he strongly dissuaded the Fuehrer of such a war.

2. -If there had been a conspiracy to commit war crimes, then the war would have been waged, from the beginning, with utter ruthlessness and disregard of rules of war. Just the contrary actually happened. In fact, in the first years of the war, international law was on the whole, respected. Especially in the beginning one endeavored to wage war with decorum and chivalry. If any evidence is needed, a look into the orders of the German High Command regulating the behavior of the soldiers in Norway, Belgium, Holland is sufficient proof. Moreover a leaflet with "10 commandments for the conduct of the German soldier in wartime" was issued to the soldiers. Fieldmarshal Milch has read them out from his pay-book, during this trial. They all obliged the soldier to act loyally and according to international law. A gang of conspirators at the head of the state which plans to wage a war without any consideration of right and morals would really not send their soldiers into the field with a detailed written order saying just the opposite.

I think, if the prosecution believes that these 22 men are conspirators and conspirators against peace, the laws of war and humanity, it is seeing ghosts.

DEFENSE

It remains for the defense counsels of the individual defendants to show what relationship their client could have had with the alleged conspiracy.

I just mentioned that Reichsmarshal Goering was the second man in the state. During the trial the prosecution also referred repeatedly to this elevated position of Goering's and tried to make it responsible for the defendant's special guilt, pointing out that Goering, by virtue of this special position knew about everything, even the most secret matters, and had the possibility to intervene in a practical way on his own in the course of government business.

This opinion is wrong and is based on ignorance of the meaning of his position. It meant, according to rank Goering was the second man in the state.

This rank was a consequence of the fact that Hitler, in the fall of 1934, had made a will and by a secret Fuehrer order had appointed Goering as his successor in the government. In 1935 or 1936 this succession was fixed in an unpublished Reichlaw which was signed by all the ministers.

On 1 September 1939 Hitler announced this law in the Reichstag. In this way the successorship of Goering became known to the German people.

Goering's task of deputizing for the Fuehrer in the government now followed but only in the event of Hitler being prevented by illness or absence from Germany—thus this occurred when in March 1938 Hitler spent a few days in Austria.

During Hitler's presence, that is as long as Hitler exercised his office himself, Goering derived no special powers from the deputyship.

During this time his authority was limited to the offices directly under him and he was not entitled to issue any official directives to other offices.

The consequence was, as second man in the state, Goering could neither rescind, nor change, nor supplement Hitler's orders. He could give no orders whatsoever to offices of which he was not directly in charge. He did not have the possibility of giving any binding orders to any other office whether it were an office of the party, the police, the army, or navy, nor could he interfere in the authority of these offices which were not his own.

This position as second man in the state can not therefore be used as especially incriminating for Goering; it is furthermore not fit to serve as a basis for the assumption of a conspiracy.

The defendant Goering never participated in the drafting or execution of a common plan or conspiracy which was concerned with the crimes slated in the indictment.

As already emphasized before, the participation in such a conspiracy presupposes in the first place that such a common plan existed at all and that accordingly the participants had the intention and agreed to carry out the crimes of which they are accused. These presuppositions are not in evidence in the case of Goering. One has to assume the contrary. It is true that Goering wanted to do away with the Treaty of Versailles and to secure again a position of power for Germany. But he believed he could obtain this goal, if not with the legal means of the League of Nations, at least with political means. The purpose of the rearmament was only to give more weight to the voice of Germany. The Weimar Governments, which could not even express the self determination of the Germans after 1918 in the surely very modest form of a German-Austrian customs union, though they advocated this determination themselves, owed the lack of success of their foreign policy for Goering, just as for Hitler, mainly to the lack of respect for the German means of imposing power. Goering hoped, strengthened in his belief by Hitler's surprising initial successes, that a strong German army already by its mere existence would make it possible to secure German aims peacefully, as long as these aims kept within reasonable limits. In politics a state can only have its say and make its voice heard if it has a strong army to back it up, which demands the respect of other states. Only recently the American Chief of Staff Marshall said in his second annual report: "The world does not seriously consider the wishes of the weak. Weakness is too big a temptation for the strong." There was no arming for an aggressive war; not even the Four Years Plan, the purpose and aim of which has been clearly explained by the defendant himself and the witness Koerner was not aimed at the preparation of an aggressive war.

The General Field Marshals Milch and Kesselring have both testified in perfect agreement that the air force created by the armament program was only a defensive air force, which was not fit for an aggressive war and which was therefore called by them a dangerous air force ("Risiko Luftwaffe"). Such a modest rearmament does not allow for any conclusions of aggressive intentions.

After all this it is clear, Goering did not want a war.

In his character he was an opponent of war. Outwardly also in his conferences with foreign diplomats and in his public speeches at every opportunity he has expressed with all possible clearness his opposition against war.

The testimony of General Bodenschatz explains most positively the attitude of Goering to war. He knew him especially from the first world war and he has exact knowledge of the attitude of Goering to war from frequent conversations he has held with him. Bodenschatz states that Goering repeatedly told him that he knew the horrors of war very well from the first world war. His aim was a peaceful solution of all conflicts to spare the German people as far as possible the horrors of a war. A war would always be an uncertain and risky business. It would not be possible to burden with a second war a generation which had already experienced the horrors of one great world war and its bitter consequences.

DEFENSE

General Field Marshal Milch also knows from conversations with the defendant Goering that the latter opposed a war, that he already had not agreed with the occupation of the Rhineland and that he advised Hitler in vain against a war with Russia.

In public the defendant Goering in his many speeches since 1933 frequently emphasized how much he had his heart set on maintaining the peace and that the rearmament had only served to make Germany strong outwardly and to enable her to play a political role again.

His serious and honest will for peace can be seen best from the speech which he aimed in the beginning of July 1938 in Karinhall before all the Gauleiters of the German Reich. He emphasized in this speech energetically that the foreign policy of Germany had to be directed in such a way that under no circumstances it would lead into war. The present generation had still to get over the last world war, another war would shock the German people. Goering had not the slightest reason to hide his true opinion before this gathering which consisted exclusively of the highest party leaders. For that reason this speech is a valuable and reliable proof for the fact that Goering really and truly wanted peace.

How deeply the defendant Goering was interested in maintaining the good relations with England is shown by his conduct at the conference with Lord Halifax in November 1937 at Karinhall, in which Goering, with full candor, put before Lord Halifax the aims of German foreign policy:

a. Incorporation of Austria and the Sudetenland into Germany.

b. Return of Danzig to Germany with a reasonable solution of the corridor problem.

He pointed out at the same time that he does not want war for these aims and that England could contribute to a peaceful solution.

The meeting in Munich in the fall of 1938 was arranged at his suggestion. The conclusion of the Munich Pact is essentially due to his influence.

Due to the occupation of the remainder of Czechoslovakia in March 1939, the relations with England had deteriorated considerably. As England was very angry about this step of Hitler's, which was a violation of the Munich Pact, Goering made serious efforts for the restoration of normal relations.

In order to achieve this goal he arranged the meeting, described by the witness Dahlerus, with English industrialists at the beginning of August 1939 in the Soenke-Nissen-Koog near Husum. In an address he pointed out that under no circumstances must it come to a war with England and he asked those present to contribute to the best of their ability to the restoration of the good relations with England.

When, after the often quoted speech of Hitler's to the commanders in chief of the armed forces on the Obersalzberg on 22 August 1939, the danger of a war became imminent, Goering summoned immediately, that is already on the following day, the witness Dahlerus from Sweden and attempted, bypassing the Foreign Office, to reach an agreement with England for the prevention of the war on his own responsibility.

The objection was raised here that Goering had left Dahlerus in the dark as to his true intentions. His efforts were not aimed at the maintaining of peace but only at persuading England to deny to the Poles the support guaranteed to them and to separate England from Poland, which would enable Germany after this separation to exert pressure on Poland to submit to the German demands or to be able to attack Poland and to realize her plans towards Poland without any risk.

The doubts about the honest will for peace are unjustified; the imputed intention was far from Goering's thoughts.

If this objection is based on the fact that Goering did not inform the witness Dahlerus either of the content of the Fuehrer speech of 23 May 1939 or of the 22 August 1939, this objection is not relevant and nothing is gained by it.

Under no circumstances could Goering inform a third person and especially a foreigner of these strictly confidential speeches without exposing himself to the accusation of high treason or treason against his country. These speeches were all immaterial for the commission given to the witness, since here was the peculiar situation that Goering—after the efforts of the diplomats had reached a deadlock—knew as ultimo ratio of no other way out than to use his personal relations, all of his personal influence, and his personal prestige.

What alone mattered for the activity of Dahlerus was that the political situation had become dangerously critical through the quarrel between Germany and Poland, of which also the witness knew and which had to be straightened out by an appropriate attitude on the part of England.

DEFENSE

That Goering's aim was not to separate England from Poland has been clearly proven by the fact that Goering, to begin with, had transmitted to the British Ambassador in Berlin, Henderson, the text of the note which contained the proposition made by Germany to Poland—propositions which were called moderate by Henderson—and that, hereby, he tried to come to direct negotiations with Poland. Poland, however, obviously did not want an agreement with Germany. Several circumstances point to that.

a. The conflict with Poland existed for almost one year. Why did Poland not ask for a decision by a court of arbitration on the basis of the concluded arbitration agreement? Why did Poland not appeal to the League of Nations? Obviously Poland did not want any arbitration regarding Danzig and the corridor.

b. The utterance of the Polish Ambassador Lipski to the Counsellor to the Legation Forbes, which was stated by the witness Dahlerus is even more proof for the unwillingness of Poland to come to an understanding. Lipski said he was not interested in any note or proposition by Germany; he was convinced that, in the event of a war, there would soon be a revolt in Germany and the Polish Army would march in triumph to Berlin.

This intransigent and incomprehensible attitude of Poland obviously finds its explanation in the fact that she felt too strong and secure by England's assurance.

The reference to the imminent revolt makes one believe that Poland was informed of the plans of the Canaris group to bring about a revolt. There can therefore be no question of an ambiguous attitude or false play on the part of Goering.

The serious will of the defendant Goering to maintain peace and to restore good relations with England is expressly recognized by Ambassador Henderson, who due to his thorough knowledge of the German conditions and his connections with the leading men of Germany had the right opinion also of Goering. I refer here to his book "Failure of a Mission", in which on page 83 it says verbally: "I would like to express here my belief that the Field Marshal, if it had depended on him, would not have gambled on war as Hitler did in 1939. As will be related in due course, he came down decisively on the side of peace in September 1938."

Lord Halifax also, according to the information he gave, had no doubts that Goering's efforts for the prevention of war were sincere.

That after the outbreak of the war, which he had wanted to prevent with all the means at his disposal, but had been unable to prevent, Goering, as Commander in Chief of the air force exerted all his strength to win the victory for Germany is not contrary to the sincerity of his will to avoid the war. From that moment on he knew only his duty as a soldier to his fatherland.

At different times Hitler made addresses to the Commander in Chiefs of the armed forces, for instance in November 1937, on 3 May 1939, and on 22 August 1939. The defendant Goering, at his personal interrogation has already given extensive explanations as to the importance and the purpose of these addresses. It is important for the question, whether the fact that he was present at these addresses might constitute perhaps a complicity in a conspiracy in the sense of the indictment, that on these occasions Hitler solely and one-sidedly made known his opinion about military and political questions. The participants were only informed what possible political developments Hitler expected. The participants were never asked for their opinion. They also had no possibility to express their criticism to Hitler's opinion. Hitler did not ask his generals to understand his orders. All he asked of them was to carry them out. His autocratic leadership of the state was exclusively directed by the principle: Sic voleo, sic iubeo, stat pro ratione voluntas, which he carried through to the last consequence.

How rigidly Hitler followed this principle can be seen from the fact that, after the address of 23 May 1939, as Milch stated in his testimony, he forbade expressly all discussions of those present, even among themselves.

That Hitler was irrevocably resolved to an aggressive war could not be deduced by the participants from the said speeches and they did not deduce it. This has been confirmed unanimously by all witnesses who were present when those addresses were given.

At that time Hitler had actually not yet planned a war. In that respect the testimony of General Field Marshal Milch is very informative. Then this witness, in the months following the speech of 23 May 1939, repeatedly pointed out to Hitler in personal reports that the air force was not ready for action with their bombing squadrons and that the air force had hardly any stocks of bombs, Hitler refused to give an order for the production of bombs and remarked that this manufacturing was not necessary and superfluous. Hitler persisted in this refusal although Milch pointed out that the production would take several months. Such an order was given by Hitler on 12 October 1939.

Hitler's exposition before the Commander in Chiefs can be easily explained by the peculiarity of Hitler to develop frequently political ideas without bothering how to carry them out. In each case, his practical policy resulted from the requirements of the living development.

DEFENSE

Economic Warfare

The defendant is accused of having ruthlessly plundered the territories occupied by Germany and thus to have violated the Hague convention concerning land warfare. This accusation is not justified.

During his examination, the defendant Goering has explained in detail with absolutely noteworthy reasons that the Hague conventions on land warfare from the years 1899 and 1907 respectively cannot be made to apply to a modern war since they had become obsolete and insufficient in some respects at the beginning of World War II. At the time when they were worked out, aerial warfare, economic warfare, and psychological warfare were still unknown. Total war, which put the entire people and the entire national economy without exception at the service of the war, was also not known. Especially, economic warfare was not considered at all. Because of this gap, there is no international law which has been generally recognized for economic warfare. Therefore, the old statement of Hugo Grotius applies to economic warfare that everything is permitted in war "quod ad finem belli necessarium est".

Naturally, this principle only applies so far as it has not been affected specifically by a differing settlement through treaties.

The following is to be said for the legal situation as it stands: Until the beginning of World War I, it was generally acknowledged in international law—in any case as far as land warfare is concerned—that the war does not affect any private legal relations between the citizens of the belligerent states, that private property on principle was inviolable, that the war would only be pursued with arms, and that the enemy civilian population would not be affected by it. This method of warfare suffered a basic change at the outbreak of World War I, when England, in the field of naval warfare, applied her interpretation of war of people against people. At that time, the enemy powers went over to the course to paralyze the entire German national strength, disregarding all established rules of the law of naval warfare and of neutrality law, by cutting off the necessary raw materials and import of food. This new type of warfare corresponded to the Anglo-Saxon interpretation which was joined by France at the beginning of World War I, that war is not only fought against the fighting troops, but against the entire population of the enemy. The citizen of the enemy state is the enemy of England, his property is enemy property which is subject to seizure by the British Government.

With this, naval warfare was not only directed against the combat forces, but also against the peaceful subjects of the belligerent enemy.

This goal was achieved by the total blockade carried out by England. The Hague convention did not contemplate a total blockade in the form in which it was carried out by England. This blockade made any supplying of Germany through neutral countries impossible.

This economic warfare which has also been applied to Germany during World War II in the same manner by the enemy states is not a legal method of warfare; it involves a violation of established international law.

Under these circumstances, Germany cannot be blamed for applying the method used by England with means of her naval power for the warfare on land accordingly.

This fact leads to the following consideration: The rules of land warfare (LKO) applies according to its sense to land warfare. There the principle of protection of private property dominates. In naval warfare, however, private property is unprotected. It is therefore possible that the rules of land warfare (LKO) with their restrictions apply also to a combined sea and land war? Would it be just that goods are taken away from one at sea while he would not be allowed to touch the same goods from the one taking the goods on land?

According to established international law, the principle exists now as before that private property is actually inviolable during war. This principle only suffers exceptions insofar as the Hague convention of land warfare permits certain encroachments on private property—I point out here articles 23g, 52 and 53, paragraph 2—and insofar as encroachments may also have been caused by a state of emergency in which the state may find itself which then would be justified to the extent in which they appear necessary in the interest of self-preservation of the state. In this scope therefore, actions are also permitted during war which would otherwise not comply with the laws of war, and would thus be contrary to international law.

By the fact that enemy warfare disregarded the established rules of naval warfare, Germany was driven into a state of economic emergency.

If the enemy powers would have observed this established law of naval warfare, then Germany could have supplied herself through neutral countries. Therefore the state of economic emergency during the war would not have occurred if the blockade of Germany would not have been carried out by means contrary to international law. As the enemy powers did not however observe the established blockade regulations, they cannot expect then for Germany to observe the regulations on requisitioning which form part of the rules of land warfare (LKO).

DEFENSE

Thus, wherever the life interests of a state are threatened in this manner, there prevails a national state of emergency which has the legal effect that the state does not act illegally when committing a violation of international law which is necessary for the repelling of imminent danger.

The economic situation of Germany was extremely threatening during the course of World War II by the action of the enemy powers. Any connection with neutral countries was made impossible for Germany by the total blockade, since a sufficient supply of raw materials necessary for the conduct of the war, and of food for the feeding of the civilian population, was made impossible. Germany also had to take care of the food supply of the enemy civilian population in the occupied territories. Germany was therefore forced for the sake of supporting her own economy, which would otherwise have collapsed, to use the stocks of raw materials and food available in the occupied territories, and all other items necessary for the continuation of the war for herself, whereby the interests of the population in the occupied territories were given due consideration. In this, the principles, established in the preamble to the convention concerning the rules and customs of land warfare, dated 18 October 1907, as they result from the customs existing among civilized nations, from the laws of humanity, and from the demands of public conscience, were strictly observed. A resignation of the right to use these sources of assistance in the occupied territories would have meant the abandonment of the independence and existence of the state, it would have meant unconditional submission. An emergency which necessarily leads to submission during war is the highest and most genuine emergency in the life of a nation.

By referring to the state of emergency, however, only such actions are covered which are necessary for the alleviation of danger which could not be repelled otherwise. The limitations naturally fluctuate, and the establishment, whether a genuine emergency act is concerned, cannot be easily made in individual cases. Here the Tribunal will have to consider in favor of the defendants the special circumstances and the conditions which were partly hard to view during the time of war.

It has not been proven that the limitations have remained unobserved by the defendant intentionally or carelessly.

It must be left to the examination of the Tribunal whether the defendant personally can be responsible for a violation, possibly committed intentionally or carelessly, a violation which has been committed exclusively by him in his capacity as plenipotentiary of the Fuehrer, or whether in such a case there is only a liability of the state. This side is of the opinion that also in this case there is only a violation of international law which does not call for a personal liability. Conditions are peculiar in the Eastern theater of war because there was no private economy in Russia but only a national economy strictly regulated by a central office. The juridical situation here was that property of the enemy state could generally be claimed as war loot. For the rest, a particularly careful regulation was made, which was defined in the so-called "Green folder." The regulations contained in the "Green folder" did not suggest any looting or annihilation of the population, as asserted by the prosecution. Its tenor was rather the mobilization of economy and the rules for keeping it going, the seizure and the orderly utilization of stocks and traffic installations in the zones to be occupied in the course of fighting, whereby account had to be taken of the Russian behavior and the far-reaching destruction to be expected in consequence. The folder does not contain any order or suggestion which might convict certain groups of the population of activities beyond the needs conditioned by war. This decree, for which the defendant Goering has taken full responsibility, does not furnish any reason for an indictment.

In all this, one must not disregard one thing, this war was of such gravity, such proportions, such duration and totality as the creators of the Hague convention certainly never had or could have had the remotest idea. It was a war in which the nations fought for their existence or destruction. It was a war in which all values have changed. Thus the defendant had the right feeling when he declared: "After all there is no legality in the fight for life or death."

From the standpoint of necessity a justification can also be found for the deportation of workers from occupied territory to Germany. In his testimony the defendant stated in detail all the reasons which in his opinion made this measure necessary.

For the rest the defense counsel for defendant Sauckel, Herr Dr. Servatius, will review these matters in detail.

Looting of Art Treasures

As to the reproach of art treasure looting the defendant has made an inclusive statement of facts, which will be referred to in order to justify his conduct. In addition it will be observed that Reichmarshal Goering was not directly engaged in the safeguarding of art treasures in Poland.

DEFENSE

Not one of these art treasures did he take for his own collection. In this respect the defendant cannot be incriminated in any way. By order of the Fuehrer works of art in France which were owned by Jews were temporarily confiscated for the benefit of the Reich. They were considered as unclaimed property because their owners had left the country.

Of these confiscated objects, with the express approval of the Fuehrer, Goering received but a small part, and not for himself personally, but for the gallery he had planned, and in which he also intended to incorporate the works of art already in his possession.

He wished to acquire these objects at a price established by French art experts, and the proceeds were to be distributed among the dependents of French war victims.

The juridical situation was therefore as follows: The objects were confiscated by decree of the Fuehrer for the benefit of the German Reich. By this confiscation the former owners lost their right to possession and it was transferred to the Reich. The objects which were left him Goering acquired from the Reich, which was their present owner.

The Reich obviously saw in this a step which, though it was proved premature by the course of events, was to forestall the peace treaty to be concluded at the end of the hostilities when the final accounts would be made. This is similar to the confiscations and seizures of property carried out at present in Germany in view of the ultimate peace treaty.

Therefore the question remains open whether the Reich Government was juridically entitled to confiscate the goods and to become their owner.

A solution to the question is no longer necessary, because Goering acted in good faith in the matter of this acquisition; in his testimony he emphasized his belief that he was entitled to acquire these things as they had been previously confiscated by the Fuehrer.

In consideration of these facts there cannot be any question of looting.

Certainly there could be no objection to the purchasing of articles which occurred during normal business transaction, and which the defendant had been offered spontaneously and the sellers were only too eager to dispose of in view of the good price they received for them.

It is the same case with objects which the defendant had acquired through a voluntary exchange in which the second party to the contract enjoyed the same rights as himself.

Airmen

I will now consider the accusation of the shooting of 50 officers of the British Air Force after their escape from the prisoner of war camp Sagan.

The act of prosecution (page 33 of the German translation) reads as follows:

In March 1944, 50 officers of the RAF, who had escaped from Stalag-Luft III in Sagan, were murdered after their recapture. According to a later declaration of the prosecution the circumstances were as follows:

During the night of 24-25 March 1944, 76 officers of the RAF escaped from the prisoner of war camp Stalag-Luft III in Sagan. Fifty of these officers were shot by the Security Service after they had been recaptured.

An investigation must be made on the following points: Who gave the order for the shooting? Did Reichmarshal Goering play any part in this occurrence? Did he actually take part in the drafting of the order to shoot these 50 airmen? Did he agree to the measure although it was a grave offense against paragraph 50 of the Geneva Protocol dealing with the treatment of Prisoners of War?

The prosecution states that the defendant Goering collaborated in the drafting of this order. It refers among other things to the reports which Major General Westhoff and criminal counsellor Wielen drew up while they were in British custody. But the interrogation of these witnesses in court, as requested by the defense counsel, as well as the bringing forward of further evidence which has been so carefully accomplished before the Tribunal has shown in the meantime that the previous statements of Westhoff and Wielen were incorrect and only in respect of Goering's presence at the camp conference and his knowledge of the shooting order were only based on suppositions, which had their roots in the fact that it was a question of a Prisoner of War camp for airmen. The result of the evidence was as follows:

At this camp conference of 25 March 1944 Himmler reported the escape of the 76 officers to the Fuehrer. For this Hitler severely reprimanded General Field Marshal Keitel; he considered the event to be of great danger to public security, since the escaped officers might assist the 6 million foreigners in Germany in the organization of an armed revolt. Then Hitler gave the order: "The prisoners remain with Himmler".

Keitel definitely refused the retransfer to Himmler of the 15 officers who had already been recaptured by the armed forces and returned to the camp, and these officers remained unharmed.

DEFENSE

At this camp conference in the presence of Keitel, Hitler did not order the shooting of the prisoners who were to remain in Himmler's hands. Neither Keitel nor Jodl expected such measures. Jodl expected the escaped prisoners to be sent to a concentration camp for some time. As Keitel and Jodl agree in their testimonies Reichmarshal Goering did not attend this meeting. Therefore it cannot possibly be correct that General Field Marshal Keitel declared in a conference with General Westhoff he had been reprimanded by Goering at the camp meeting on account of the prisoners escape.

General Koller has testified that General Korten assured him over the telephone round about the end of March or beginning of April 1944, that the Luftwaffe, namely the Reichmarshal and Korten himself, were not involved in the order and had only been informed of it later. Furthermore Koller certified that the Reichmarshal was extremely angry about the shooting.

These statements are completely in accordance with the declarations of Reichmarshal Goering who was on a vacation at the time of the conference with Hitler. The fact of the escape reached him only through a telephone report of his adjutant. It was only after his return from vacation some time around Easter 1944 that he learned, through his chief of general staff, Korten, about the fact that shootings of prisoners had taken place. Reichmarshal Goering was much upset about this last report because he had only condemned the deed in itself but moreover feared reprisals for his own airmen.

Upon inquiry, Himmler then confirmed the executions to Reichmarshal Goering with the justification that an order to that effect had been issued to him by Hitler.

It is made clear by this conversation how the execution was possible and how its perpetration could remain concealed from the Wehrmacht. In the absence of Keitel and Jodl, Hitler issued the order to Himmler to carry out the execution and Himmler then, unknown to the Wehrmacht, immediately passed on the order to the Reich Security Headquarters, i.e., according to Kaltenbrunner's statement, to Mueller or, as the case may be, to Nebe.

Not only did Reichmarshal Goering severely upbraid Himmler because the latter had executed the order without informing Goering but he raised the most vigorous protest against this measure in a subsequent interview with Hitler. This resulted in a violent argument between Goering and Hitler.

Because Goering strongly condemned such proceedings, he requested shortly afterwards that the prisoner camps be taken in charge by the OKW. On being questioned, Field Marshal Keitel confirmed, as witness, that a few weeks after the occurrence, he received a letter from the general quartermaster of the Luftwaffe, in which the Luftwaffe requested the taking over of its camps by the OKW.

This result of the examination of evidence, which, as already emphasized, straightens out the initial statements of the witnesses Westhoff and Wielen, which are contradictory in many respects, as well as Keitel's earlier declaration of the 10 November 1945, also, vindicates the conclusion that Reichmarshal Goering was in no way involved in this affair, that he condemned it most severely when he was informed of it and that he therefore cannot be called upon to answer for this extremely regrettable and reprehensible order which it was not within his power to prevent.

Lynch Justice

The prosecution has gone on to the question of "lynch justice" which was practiced by the German population in individual cases in 1944 when enemy airmen had been shot down. For these occurrences, the defendants, especially Reichmarshal Goering, are held responsible. The charge that defendant Goering or the Wehrmacht are in any way involved in this action, that they issued orders or instructions to this effect or even merely approved the action is seen to be entirely unjustifiable. The examination of evidence here has thoroughly cleared up the matter in favor of the defendant.

Witness Colonel Bernd v. Brauchitsch pointed out during his interrogation on the 12 March 1946 (page 5680 of the German minutes) that in Spring 1944 there was a sudden increase in the losses among the civilian population through machine-gun attacks by enemy airmen.

To support their charges against Reichmarshal Goering, the prosecution invokes first of all a protocol of 19 May 1944 (L-166) concerning the so-called "Hunting Conference" which was held on the 15 and 16 May under the presidency of the defendant.

Numbered as item 20 of this script is a statement of the defendant saying he would suggest to the Fuehrer that terrorist enemy airmen be immediately shot on the place of their offense. The defendant most definitely denies having made any pronouncement to this effect and justly points to the following circumstances which belie any such statement:

The session stretched over two days. Numerous technical and organizational questions were discussed. The question touched upon in item 20 had nothing whatever to do with the agenda for the rest of the session, least of all with the purpose of the session.

DEFENSE

The remark has its place among themes which deal with matters of an entirely different kind and has no point in this conjuncture.

Besides, Goering, had he approved and wished it, could himself have immediately issued such an order without further ado, as everyone knew the Fuehrer was well disposed to him.

The decisive fact is that the statement is in the sharpest contradiction with the fundamental attitude of the defendant. He always stood for the view that the enemy airman who is shot down is his comrade and must be treated as a comrade, a fact which I have already remarked upon in another connection. Moreover, in the question as to how terror airmen are to be treated, he has defended his position with all frankness against the conception upheld by Hitler and has made no secret to Hitler of his entirely different opinion.

In view of this unwavering attitude and its resulting policy, it is utterly out of the question that he should suddenly have urged Hitler to issue the above-mentioned order against the terror airmen—an order which he opposed with all his might and the execution of which he sought to prevent by every means as soon as it came to his knowledge. And he did succeed in fact in preventing the execution of this order.

If the terror airmen were actually discussed at the session, this discussion could only have occurred with the implication that the Fuehrer suggested such a measure.

With reference to the minutes, the following fundamental remarks must be added:

We have here the combined notes of a young officer, stretching over a two-day session during which there has been a great deal of talking and cross-talking. Experience made in many other cases has shown that such recordings are often very unreliable and have even at times reproduced the subject of the discussion in an utterly perverted form, precisely because the author of the script, especially when several participants were present and were talking at random, could not follow the course of the discussion and consequently did not reproduce the substance of it accurately, especially when, in addition to this, he was relayed by other people. This explains many factual errors as well as the inadequacy and unreliability of such records.

The minutes were never submitted to the defendant. He has not therefore been able to verify their contents nor to correct their errors.

Records of this sort, which are built up in the way described above and which are not submitted to the perusal and approval of the parties concerned are worthless in the production of evidence.

They cannot in themselves alone serve as an adequate means of proof either to charge or convict the defendant. They can therefore only be made use of to the detriment of the parties implicated when the contended facts are confirmed by other material brought for evidence from sources external to these minutes. In the present case, there is no confirmation from other evidence that Goering actually made the statement contained in item 20 or made a request to Hitler to that effect.

The note dated 21 May (731-PS) fails to provide support for the claim. The note "General Korten teilt nach Vortrag des Reichsmarschalls mit" cannot, in view of the defendant's undisproved statement, possibly mean that the Reichsmarshal delivered an address on this matter in Hitler's quarters, but solely that Korten reported on this subject to the Reichsmarshal and that Korten informed the Reichsmarshal of Hitler's order.

The rest of the examination of evidence has made it clear beyond doubt that Goering was against a special treatment of enemy terror airmen who had been shot down, and that he opposed Hitler's order.

These attacks by enemy airmen were directed, within Germany, against civilians working in the fields, minor railway lines without any military importance, and against pedestrians and cyclists.

This constituted a gross violation of the Hague Rules of Land Warfare, according to which any combat act against the non-combatant population of the country is prohibited, and any attack or shelling of open cities, villages, residences, or buildings is forbidden.

According to the opinion of the witness v. Brauchitsch this behavior which quite evidently violated international law caused Hitler to order measures against these aviators themselves, besides defensive measures. Relative to this Hitler advocated—as far as it is known to the witness—the most severe measures; lynching justice was to be given the right of way.

This stand of Hitler toward the violations of international law by enemy aviators, however, did not meet with the approval of the Armed Forces, especially not with that of Reichsmarshal Goering and that of his Chief of Staff (Generalstabschef), General Korten. Both of them did condemn to the utmost the attacks of enemy aviators which were exclusively directed against the defenseless civilian population. However, they nevertheless opposed the handing over of defenseless shot down aviators to the aroused mob for the carrying out of lynching justice, and they did not think these measures an appropriate means of combating this conduct which was in violation of international law.

The witness General Koller expressed himself to the same effect.

DEFENSE

Early in June 1944 General Korten informed this witness of the fact that the Fuehrer intended to decree an order to the effect that terror aviators were to be surrendered to public fury.

In the course of repeated conversations the witness Koller and General Korten arrived at the opinion that the conception of the Fuehrer was to be rejected. They did consider the direct attacks of enemy low-flying planes on individual civilian persons, women and children, concentration of civilian persons, school-classes and kindergartens out on walks, farmers at work in the fields, as well as attacks on public passenger trains and hospitals, as ruthless; however, neither did the two see a passable road or a solution of the difficult problem in the Fuehrer's order. They were of the opinion that such an order was contrary to basic military conceptions, the articles of war, and to international law, and that it would give cause to numerous evils through which also other enemy as well as our own crews would have to come to harm. And finally such an order could exercise also in its effects, a harmful influence on the morale of our own crews.

All these reasons caused the Armed Forces to reject Hitler's demand, and the attempts of the Armed Forces were now directed toward preventing the disapproved conception of Hitler. The witness v. Brauchitsch therefore credibly states that the Armed Forces now looked for a way out, which way was seen in the fact that the higher command levels were deceived by measures which were not actually carried out.

The witness Brauchitsch was ordered by Reichmarshal Goering to define in discussions with the OKW the concept of terror aviators. In the subsequent discussions and exchange of correspondence those cases were mentioned which represented violations of international law and which were to be considered criminal acts. By this definition of the concept a lynching justice was to be prevented. The exchange of correspondence which lasted for a longer period of time showed the tendency of the agency to prolong the matter as much as possible.

The witness Koller is justified in emphasizing that this exchange of correspondence shows all signs of a "delaying action to gain time," i.e., those concerned either did not want any decision, or they wanted to postpone it as long as only possible. In particular the margin note on document D-785 (Exhibit GB 318) entitled "No answer received from Commander in Chief of the Air Force", allows for the conclusion that the Reichmarshal purposely wanted to prolong the matter. Furthermore Reichmarshal Goering, as can be seen from the letter of 19 June 1944 (D-779) maintained the opinion, that in every instance he considered legal procedures also against terror aviators as definitely necessary. If it is stated in a subsequent document of 26 June 1944 "The Reichmarshal agrees with the announced formulation defining the concept of terror aviators and with the suggested procedure", then the agreement with the procedure refers exclusively to the suggested procedure of publication suggested in the final paragraph of the letter of 15 June 1944, for which Reichmarshal Goering's approval had been requested. That the Reichmarshal until the end of the war maintained the old aviator standpoint, according to which enemy aviators as soon as they have been shot down are to be considered and treated as comrades, was not only expressly deposed by the witness General Field Marshal Milch, but is also emphasized by General Koller with the following words: "Undamaged by occasional expressions of displeasure the attitude of the Reichmarshal always remained correct and valiant in accordance with his frequently emphasized flying tradition which he had retained from the First World War. In understandable anger about great difficulties in the air defense, pressed by the Fuehrer, he perhaps for once used harsher words, which were quickly forgotten", and the witness does not know of any case "in which such a spontaneous displeasure caused the Reichmarshal to take incorrect or harsh measures against members of the enemy air forces".

The behavior of the air force as a whole was also correct and humane at all times. To fight chivalrously was a matter of honor with the German aviators. The Air Force as well as the defendant Goering retained this point of view, although as Koller expressly mentioned, the flying personnel felt extremely bitter over the strafing attacks on German crews suspended on parachutes, and individual hotheads spoke of equal measures as reprisals.

The best testimonial for the exemplary comradely behavior of the Air Force even toward an enemy, who did not observe the rules of warfare, can be clearly seen from the description of the witness Koller about the establishment of a sea emergency service of the Air Force, which brought aid to Germans as well as the enemy in an equal measure and which carried on despite enemy attacks in violation of international law, with its attempt to provide aid for both friend and enemy in need. Accordingly it must be determined:

The Armed Forces and the defendant Goering have rejected the lynching justice as well as all procedure against the terror aviators not in accordance with legal regulations and have not issued any orders to troops under his command; in no case have enemy aviators been shot by the Air Force or by the Army, or handed over to the Security Service (SD).

DEFENSE

Gestapo—KZ

The prosecution accuses the defendant Goering of having established a reign of terror in Prussia immediately after 30 January 1933 in his capacity as Prussian Minister of the Interior and soon afterwards as Prussian Minister President in order to suppress all opposition against the Nazi program.

In order to carry out his plans he had used the Prussia police, which he had ordered as early as in February 1933 to protect the new government by proceeding ruthlessly against all political opponents without consideration of the consequences.

In order to safeguard the power, he had created the feared Secret State Police and established concentration camps as early as spring of 1933.

To these accusations the following is to be said:

It was natural and cannot serve as an accusation against the defendant, and it would rather have been a severe violation of the duties intrusted to the defendant, if he had not devoted himself with all his strength to the safeguarding of the new government and taken every imaginable precaution in order to make any attack on this new government impossible from the very beginning. In order to achieve this goal first of all the police institutions had to be considered.

It only remains to be examined, if the means, whose application the defendant considered necessary, were objectionable.

The question is to be answered in the negative because of the following considerations:

In every state the police is the inner-political instrument of power; in every state it has the task to support the government, to protect it in all directions and to render the disturber of the peace and the violator of the law harmless by force of arms, if necessary. The defendant transferred the same tasks to the police under his direction, whom he ordered in the speech mentioned by the Prosecution to act energetically and to fulfill their duties conscientiously. To what extent such an appeal for the performance of duty should not be permissible remains incomprehensible.

In his interrogation the defendant Goering described expressly for what reasons and along which lines he considered a reorganization of the police as necessary and carried it out. Against these directives no objections whatever can be raised.

I should like to point out in this connection that according to the recognized rules of international law a sovereign state has the right to regulate its internal affairs as it deems fit to do.

The reform of the police is an exclusively internal affair. The violation of rules, generally recognized by international law is, therefore, out of question in this respect.

A political police was in existence before the assumption of power as well. Before the 30th of January 1933, it was called Department Ia, which among other things had to watch and to fight political adversaries, National Socialists and Communists in particular. Such a police dealing with the same tasks was also needed after the assumption of power in order to protect the new state against attacks, which threatened it in particular from the very strong Communist Party.

In order to make clear that this department of the police was charged exclusively with safeguarding the state against enemies of the state it was named Secret State Police.

As long as the defendant Goering was head of the police this was, in fact, only the case until 1934 as then Himmler was put in charge. He strictly confined himself to the tasks prescribed to him, did not transgress his authority, and no misuse of power occurred. The evidence produced has shown nothing against the defendant Goering for this period of time. Should, at a later date, the Secret State Police have transgressed their authority and should have committed illegal acts the defendant had no knowledge of them and did not approve of it. For mistakes and crimes committed by his successors which remained unknown to him, he cannot be held responsible.

There appeared in court a witness whose testimony was very incriminating for the defendant: Dr. Gisevius.

The defendant refuses on principle to deal with the statement of this witness. He only wants to point out that this statement is untrue in all points incriminating the defendant.

The demonstrative force of this statement depends on whether this witness is considered to be trustworthy or not.

My fellow defense counsel, Dr. Nelte, has agreed to deal with this question extensively, so that in order to avoid repetitious statements I shall refrain from further declarations.

Of course, the assumption of power by the National Socialist party met with resistance, and particularly the leftist parties were anything but satisfied with the situation thus created. The opponents were by no means weak, neither numerically nor in the means at their disposal. The new rulers were, therefore, afraid of serious dangers to their power, if they let the opposition parties continue their activity without hindrance; they had accordingly to take preventive measures against such dangers in good time. In order to stabilize their own power and to nip in the bud any possible source of unrest, the defendant Goering considered it necessary for reasons of state to settle at one blow both leaders and officials of the communist party and its organizations. The defendant has spoken at length about his reasons for such acts. For the removal of danger and to insure the safety of the state, the measures taken by the defendant were, for the government, a necessity caused by the unsettled nature of the times. As it was a preventive measure, it was not necessary for a provisional arrest that a criminal act against the government had already been committed or was, obviously, on the verge of being committed. The fact of membership in itself and previous activity in the said party was enough for arrest, as it was a political act of self-protection on the part of the government.

DEFENSE

Such considerations led, very soon after the assumption of power, to the establishment of concentration camps, of which there were 2 at the time when defendant Goering was at the head of the police. The aim of such camps was to hold provisionally politically unreliable persons, who might be of danger to the new state, until they either had adapted themselves to the new political conditions or until the power of the state had become so great that such persons could no longer endanger it.

No different were the considerations which influenced the defendant Goering when he created concentration camps in 1933 and issued laws concerning the Secret State Police (Geheime Staatspolizei). These were intended to be as he conceived them, a means of cleansing and strengthening the young community of the people. He did not aim at a definite annihilation of political enemies but after a certain period of education interceded generously for liberations, and discharged at Christmas 1933, about 5,000, and in September 1934, 2,000 prisoners.

He vigorously counteracted inevitable abuses and errors which he openly admitted in the book he published in 1934, intended for the British public: "The Building of a Nation." He let, for example, the Communist leader Thaelmann personally report to him about his complaints in the concentration camp and took care to remove their cause. He dissolved the so-called "wild-camps" of Stettin and Breslau, punished the Gauleiter of Pomerania who had organized this camp without his knowledge and against his will, and had those responsible for these wild concentration camps brought up on trial for their infringements of the regulations.

This attitude of the defendant Goering denotes that he never intended the actual physical annihilation of the prisoners. If the prosecution establishes that this was all in execution of a conspiracy which aimed at committing crimes against humanity, such an interpretation has no bearing on the reality of political life in the years in question. Such a conspiracy did not exist, nor was it the intention of the defendant to commit crimes against the principles of humanity nor has he committed any such crimes. As one of the political trustees of the German government, he felt himself bound to safeguard it against dangerous disturbers of the peace and to contribute accordingly to the permanence of the National Socialist way of life. Far from looking upon such measures as criminal, he considered them, on the contrary, to be the inevitable means of consolidating the political order as a basis of all law.

In 1936, the leadership of the police and, therefore, the management of the concentration camps, passed from the defendant to the Reichsfuehrer S.S. Heinrich Himmler. The defendant cannot be held responsible for the subsequent evolution of the concentration camps; for the fact that they became, especially after the outbreak of the war, more and more gruesome places of torture and death, and led—partly intentionally, partly through the chaotic war conditions—to the death of countless people, so that finally, in the last days before the breakdown of Germany, and through errors in organization they turned into one vast graveyard.

Certainly he knew that there still were concentration camps, also that the number of inmates had risen because of war tensions, and that they also contained foreigners because of the expansion of the war machine over all of Europe, but the horrible occurrences as they have been disclosed in this trial were unknown to him. He knew nothing of the irresponsible experiments which were being carried out on inmates because of misinterpretation of true scientific spirit. The testimony of witness Field Marshal Milch has shown that the Luftwaffe was not interested in these experiments, and that the defendant personally did not learn anything specific at all about this matter.

By no means did the establishment of concentration camps as such have anything to do with the later extermination of Jews which apparently originated in Heydrich's and Himmler's brains and was kept secret in a masterly manner, and was disclosed after the collapse as the horror of Auschwitz and Maidanek.

This brings me to the Jewish question. The defendant Goering has explained in detail his views on the Jewish question during his interrogation as witness; furthermore, he has shown in all their details the reasons which influenced the National Socialist party and after the seizure of power, the state to take a hostile attitude toward Jews.

The defendant is reproached for having promulgated the Nuremberg laws in the year 1935 which were intended to keep the race pure, and that in his capacity as Commissioner for the Four Year Plan he issued decrees during the years 1938 and 1939 which had as their aim the exclusion of Jews from economic life.

DEFENSE

Furthermore, he is blamed for a number of other laws which meant a one-sided and serious intervention into the legal sphere of Jews. The legal reason for this reproach which is devoid of any foundation is obscure.

For here it is a question of a purely domestic problem—namely the regulation of the legal position of one's own subjects; according to internationally recognized legal opinion at that time, the German Reich as a sovereign state could freely settle such a problem.

Even if these encroachments were harsh and the limitations of citizenship rights were extremely severe, they nevertheless in no way comprise an offense against humanity.

Such legal provisions which limit a certain race or a certain circle of citizens in their legal position have also been made by other states without offense being taken at such measure or without other states considering themselves induced to intervene. Reich-marshall Goering always refused any illegal or violent action against Jews. This is clearly shown by his attitude toward the action against Jews during the night of 9 to 10 November 1938, instigated by Goebbels, of which he was informed only after the deed had been done, and which he condemned most severely. In this respect, he raised serious objections with Goebbels and Hitler. On this matter, the precise statements of witnesses Bodenschatz and Koerner are available. The testimony of Dr. Uiberreither shows how greatly Goering disapproved of this action. According to the former, the defendant summoned all Gauleiters to Berlin several weeks after this incident and in an address censured the violent action with the sharp words that this action did not correspond to the dignity of the state and that it had caused serious damage to German prestige abroad. That the defendant was no race fanatic became generally known by his expression: "I decide who is a Jew." It has been established sufficiently that he aided many Jews.

He was informed only at the end of the war about biological extermination of the Jews. He never approved such a measure and opposed it with all his might for he had too much political insight not to recognize the tremendous and at the same time senseless dangers which would perforce result for the German people from such a brutal and detestable extermination drive.

Goering had already proved by the above mentioned speech to the Gauleiters that he did not wish to ruin himself in the eyes of the world public and world opinion because of the treatment of Jews.

It is therefore out of the question for Goering to have agreed to such an undertaking or for him to have participated in it in any manner. It is understandable if it is held against the defendant that he should have been informed about such horrible measures as the second man in the state.

Furthermore, it is no wonder if such statements of the defendant that he knew nothing of these atrocities are met with a certain amount of mistrust. Despite such doubts, however, the defendant insists that no information about such acts ever reached him. This ignorance of the defendant, which can be completely understood only by one familiar with German conditions, may be explained from the fact, and this is the sole solution of the riddle, that Himmler, as was also emphasized by General Jodl during his interrogation, knew most masterfully how to keep his actions secret, to obliterate all traces of his atrocities, and to deceive the surrounding world and even his and Hitler's closer entourage.

In this connection, I also refer to the testimony of witness Hoess who confirms Himmler's instruction concerning absolute secrecy toward everyone.

The question may come up here: Did not the legal obligation exist for the defendant to instigate investigations about this matter and to get reliable information as to the true whereabouts of supposedly evacuated Jews, and as to their fate? And what legal consequence results if he carelessly refrained from such investigations and thus carelessly violated his legal obligation to act incumbent on him by virtue of his position? The decision of this extremely complicated question of law and fact may be left undecided because Goering even as the second man in the state did not have the power to prevent such measures if they were carried out by Himmler and were ordered or at any rate approved by Hitler.

Conclusion

If we now review the personality and life of the defendant Goering the following viewpoints have to be considered for the appreciation of his actions:

Of good educational and characterological background he received his decisive impressions as a young officer and combat airman during World War I during which he proved an outstanding man and was awarded the highest award for bravery the order of "Pour le merite". He experienced the collapse of the German war effort as—as it was seen by him—a consequence of German treachery from inside.

After the rule of the Kaiser (Kaiserreich) had been overthrown, the German people wanted to give themselves a new constitution on a democratic basis and then hoped to be able to work their way up again by industry and perseverance. In this, the confidence in the far-sightedness of the victorious powers of that time, especially in the 14 points of Wilson, played a great part.

DEFENSE

But when the treaty of Versailles utterly frustrated these hopes, the Weimar democracy came into a serious crisis from which it was not to recover any more. The latter together with world economic crisis which was added later on formed the prerequisite which could not be ignored for the fact that Hitler was able to seize power.

At first, the "fight against Versailles" made his rise as a party leader possible. Goering as witness described how he agreed with Hitler during their first meeting in the conviction that nothing could be achieved by paper protests.

The powerlessness of the German democracy became apparent now to the entire world. Goering as well as Hitler were convinced that Germany infallibly would become a victim of Bolshevism if it was not possible to awaken against the latter sufficient defensive strength by the reestablishment of German self-confidence at home. It was understood that they also had to stand up with rigor against the Versailles powers. But in this, Hitler started out without question from the fact that Germany belonged basically to the West, culturally, economically, and even politically. He believed that the Bolshevik danger, at first directed against Germany, would afterwards also threaten the Western countries. He therefore, was of the opinion that he would be able to find gradually also their recognition and support if he took up the ideological struggle against the East.

From this basic attitude alone is it possible to explain his entire policy until the actual collapse. May one today rightly condemn it as having failed from the beginning; one must not forget that, at first, many things in the development clearly seemed to justify it. Thus it can be explained how Hitler succeeded in winning over an increasing part of the Germans to his following.

Goering sincerely believed that salvation could only come through Hitler. He recognized in him the born natural leader who understood to influence the masses and to guide them and who, driven by a fascinating strong will, could not be frightened by any obstacle. He realized that under a democratic constitution only such a man of certainly demoniacal-demagogic talent could survive. And therefore he joined him.

Because Goering was an honest German, only inspired by love for his fatherland, he did not think of using Hitler only as a tool for his new rise to power. He rather took it upon himself from the beginning to recognize in him the sole man vested with authority, namely the "Fuehrer", and to be satisfied with a subordinate role. He the famous air force captain and "pour le merite" did not hesitate to swear to Hitler, then still an unknown man the oath of allegiance, an oath which was to be valid for his entire life and was valid.

It is tragic that a fight which Goering waged together with Hitler could be so completely misunderstood as to lead to accuse him of a conspiracy, entered into from the beginning for the purpose of committing crimes. His aim was at first directed to free Germany from the shackles of the treaty of Versailles. Although the Weimar government has made repeated attempts to achieve a liberation from the especially burdening obligations of this treaty, Germany was not successful in her endeavoring for a revision. One made no progress by negotiations.

Did not international law appear to be an instrument in the hands of the victors of Versailles to keep Germany down permanently? Was it not true in the world that might went before right and would the Germans only achieve then something when they got up the courage to hit on the table forcibly with their fists?

Such considerations appear absolutely understandable from the situation of that time. To construe from them even a proof for the conspiracy as stated by the prosecution would mean a complete misunderstanding. Actually, the development after 1933 appears to justify Hitler completely. He easily achieved with his methods many more times than what, if given freely, would have kept the Weimar government in power.

The German people could only recognize in the willingness of the foreign countries not only to conclude treaties with Hitler—such as the naval agreement of 1935 and the Munich pact of September 1938—but also to participate in the party rallies to the end, the fact that Hitler had chosen the correct road for reaching international understanding. This impression and this judgment were also absolutely correct until the fall of 1938. If Hitler would afterwards have observed loyally the Munich agreement, then he would probably have taken the arguments out of the hand of the "stop" policy carried out against him. Not only would the peace have been kept, but Hitler could also have harvested the fruits of his domestic and foreign policy, carried out until then, and recognized by all powers.

Basically, one argues today only whether the development since then with its catastrophic consequences are to be charged solely to him or who has to share the responsibility. All Germans who followed Hitler at any time and in any way, are accused. For, as it is said by the prosecution, above all those who did not trust him from the beginning with anything good and who deprived his government from the beginning already of legality: "That could be seen from the beginning that it would end as it did!" Thus, everyone who supported him at any time and in any way is therefore also guilty.

DEFENSE

This accusation must be objected to because it constructs looking backwards from this sad result an obligation which must annihilate all belief not only in freedom but also in the insight of man. Naturally Hitler did not desire the end as it now happened either. He has often enough announced publicly that he was not out for the laurels of war, but that he would like to devote the rest of his life to peaceful reconstruction. Looking from a truly objective vantage point, one can only accuse that he did not limit his goals when he could no longer believe in their achievement by peaceful and human means.

If under such means only those are understood which are to renounce force generally in any form, then he need not have gone his own way and have looked for a new solution. A certain play with force as long as it does not degenerate will therefore have to be left at his disposal. Where the degeneration began—because of the lack of other points of reference—can be surmised only from the results, which he actually caused with his policy. Most certainly he did not foresee and intend the bad results. However, it will have to be considered as his guilt, that he would never let himself be taught by his failures, but only let himself be led to increasingly exorbitant acts. How much of this guilt, however, can and may be charged also to his followers?

Whoever did not reject Hitler's methods and thereby him personally from the very beginning as illegitimate found difficulty in recognizing where Hitler's political aims came to an end, to give justifying reasons for his measures, and where afterwards his politics became a crime. In this respect the border from the stand-point of purely German law sentiments surely ran along a line considerably different from that of other nations or mankind in particular. Because the latter for example were hardly interested in the maintenance of the Weimar constitution and the basic rights granted by it to the individual German, its violation therefore up to the Second World War has never caused other states to intervene with the German government. On the other hand, once the war had broken out, the Germans were forced to give precedence to German interests over their sympathy with members of other, especially the enemy states. Each of them believed to be doing enough, if he took care in his field, that unnecessary hardships were avoided. To rebel against orders which came from the highest German command would not only have appeared completely senseless and hopeless, but until shortly, until the bitter end, it would also have been a violation of German legality, and thereby a criminal injustice. Accusations that no rebellion was undertaken can therefore be raised only if the breach of formal legality without consideration of the immediate practical effect only on behalf of the principle, ergo the attitude of a revolutionary, could be defined as a legal obligation.

The consequences of such a conception are so far from the point that it cannot be mentioned seriously at all. Because the hitherto existing international law was primarily based on the unlimited sovereignty of the states, no state was willing to submit in vital decisive questions to the judgment of others, however great a majority it may be or however independent a tribunal it may be. And now every individual citizen of such a sovereign state was supposed to have not only the right in relation to the other nations or humanity, but even the duty to rebel against the legal power machine of his own state, because the latter violated human rights and the rights of humanity. Such an imposition, made retroactively, pronounces its own sentence. It would place the autonomy of the individual above state sovereignty. Thereby the strength of the individual person would not only be innumerable overestimated, but this would have to lead to the breaking of the last ties of traditional order, to anarchy. Compared to such a manner of thinking Goering almost represents the exact opposite pole. As others went into the war, in order to fight war as such, so he became a revolutionary in order to give back honor to the concept of loyalty. Thus having once cast his lot with the Fuehrer he has stood by his side even after he had already lost the latter's confidence for a long time, yes, even after he had been sentenced to death by Hitler. He remained loyal until today in spite of everything by confirming to excuse Hitler before himself. To many this may appear incomprehensible, and many may see more weakness than strength in it. In this loyalty, however, the man reveals his whole nature. Goering has been described in the press as a late Renaissance type; and there is something in this. Although of high intelligence, he has allowed himself to be guided in his actions less by considerations of common sense than by the feelings of his impetuous heart. Such a man expresses himself of necessity in a way that is primarily subjective. He not only sees his surroundings and other people impassionately as immovable quantities he has to reckon with, but he rather and above all is sensitive to the effect they have on him and how they call for his approval or disapproval, so that he finally makes his personal reaction to them the basis of his judgment as a whole.

DEFENSE

In this, as can be seen from the statements of the General Supreme Staff Judge Dr. Lehmann, he always showed himself at pains to remain just and to lend an ear to considerations of sentiment. He always kept himself free from doctrinal prejudices. As a soldier and expert he always endeavored to hit on the right factor in the individual case. His judicial decisions, also his social attitude which General Bodenschatz testified to among other things, show his serious moral feeling of responsibility. His attitude towards all criminal acts directed against the honor of women are proof of his chivalry. But he takes no dogmas for his standards in this, only the spontaneous judgment of his feelings, not only the intellect, therefore, but life. From life he derives his ideas and the values which determine his actions.

Therefore the Fuehrer and the oath of loyalty he had taken meant everything to him and was the substance of his life. Ambassador Henderson had already judged Goering correctly, when he wrote about him: "He was the perfect servant of his master, and I have never seen greater loyalty and devotion than he maintains toward Hitler. He was recognized as the second power in the country, and always gave me to understand that he was Hitler's natural successor as leader. Men in secondary places often tend to emphasize their own importance. In all the open discussions in which I engaged with Goering, he never spoke of himself or the great part which he had played in the Nazi revolution; Hitler had done everything, all confidence was confidence in Hitler, every decision was Hitler's and he himself was nothing." This judgment still applies today. But his loyalty became his disaster, and the world for him sank into ruins. He certainly recognized many a mistake of the past, but he never showed the regret, which many would like to see with him. He thereby remains true to himself, as well. With this the picture of his character ends. In a period which is still threatened by chaos and which is again searching for a firm foundation for life, the positive value of such loyalty too should not be ignored.

2. FINAL PLEA by Hermann Wilhelm Goering

The Prosecution in its final speeches have treated the defendants and the presentation of evidence as completely worthless. The statements made under oath; the statements made by the defendants were assumed to be absolutely true, whether they served to support the Prosecution and the documents, but at the same moment, the statements were treated as perjury when the statements refuted the Indictment. That is not a convincing statement for the proceedings and thesis of evidence.

The Prosecution uses the fact that I was the second man in the State as a proof that I should have known everything that happened. But it does not present any documentary or other convincing proof that there, under my oath, I refuted the contents of this knowledge, and therefore, it is only an assertion and an assumption when the Prosecution says, "Who should have known that if not Goering who was the successor of the Fuehrer?"

Repeatedly we have heard here how the most awful crimes were veiled with the most secrecy. But I condemned these terrible mass murders to the utmost, and to show that I am not lacking any misunderstanding in this connection, I wish to state emphatically the following comments once more, quite clearly, before the High Tribunal. Never did I ever decree a murder upon a single individual in any period of any time, but neither did I decree any cruelties at any time while I had the power and the knowledge to prevent them.

The new statements presented by Mr. Dodd in his final statement that I had ordered Heydrich to kill the Jews lacks every proof, and that statement is not true. There is not a single order signed by me or signed in my behalf that enemy fliers should be shot or should be turned over to the SD. And not a single case has been established where units of my airforce have carried out things like that.

The Prosecution has in part submitted documents repeatedly which contain alleged statements, and written down by third and fourth parties without my having seen these statements, in order to correct erroneous statements contained therein and to preclude misunderstanding.

How easy it is, when third parties set down reports, that the sense may be distorted. This fact may be proved also by the stenographic records taken in these proceedings which, in many cases, need correction when they are checked.

The prosecution quotes a period of 25 years and quotes singular statements which were made under completely different circumstances and without any conclusions arising at the time. These statements were made, and now they are used to prove intent and guilt. Sometimes statements can easily be made because of the commitment of the moment and because of the atmosphere that obtains. There is hardly one leading personality on the other side of whom we could not say the same in the course of a quarter of a century, about whom something similar was not set down in word or in writing.

DEFENSE

Out of all the happenings of those 25 years, conferences, speeches, laws, and decisions, the prosecution seizes at the consequences and makes a connection according to which everything had been intended and wished that way from the beginning. This is a statement or an opinion which is erroneous and which is entirely devoid of logic, an opinion which will be rectified some day by history, after the proceedings here will arrive at the erroneousness of this assertion.

Mr. Jackson in his final speech referred to the fact that the signatory states are still in a state of war with Germany and, because of unconditional surrender, a state of truce is obtaining now.

However, international law is uniform. The same has to apply for both sides. Therefore, if everything which is happening in Germany because of the occupying powers, that is, if everything is admissible under international law, then before that time, as far as France, Holland, Belgium, Norway, Yugoslavia, and Greece are concerned, Germany found herself in the same position. If today the Geneva Convention, so far as the Germans are concerned, does not have any validity any longer, of today in all parts of Germany industry is being dismantled and other great assets in all spheres can be brought to the other states, if today the monies of millions of Germans are being confiscated and other serious interventions in freedom are taking place, then measures like that taken by Germany in the countries mentioned above cannot have been criminal on the part of Germany as far as other countries are concerned.

Mr. Jackson stated further that you cannot accuse and punish a state but rather, that you have to hold the leaders responsible. One seems to forget that Germany was a sovereign state, that Germany had a sovereign right, and that her legislation for the German people was not subject to the jurisdiction of foreign countries. No state ever, through a notification, called the attention of the Reich in time to the fact that the activity towards National Socialism would be made subject to punishment and persecution. To the contrary, if now individual persons, first of all—we, the fuehrers—are being called to account and are to be sentenced, very well. But, at the same time, you cannot punish the German people as well. The German people confided their trust in the Fuehrer and, in his authoritarian government, had no influence on happenings. Without knowledge of the grave crimes which we have learned of today, the people, loyal, ready to sacrifice, courageously endured the struggle for existence, the struggle to the death.

The German people are free of guilt.

I did not want a war, nor did I bring it about. I have done everything to prevent it through negotiations. After it had broken out, I did everything to assure victory. Since the three greatest powers on earth, together with other nations, fought against us, finally we were conquered by tremendous enemy superiority.

I am standing back of the things that I have done, but I condemn most emphatically and reject most emphatically that my actions were dictated by the will to subjugate foreign peoples through wars, to murder them, to rob them, or to enslave them, or to commit cruelties or crimes.

The only motive which guided me was my ardent love for my people, its fortunes, its freedom, and its life. And for this I call on the Almighty and my German people as a witness.

IV. RUDOLF HESS

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Alfred Seidl, Defense Counsel

Mr. President, Honorable Judges! When the German people, having lost the first world war, set out in 1919 to rebuild their existence according to Democratic principles, they found themselves facing difficulties which were caused not merely by the war itself and the material loss resulting therefrom. The defendant Rudolph Hess was among the first comrades in arms around Hitler who time and again reminded the German people of the great dangers which would of necessity arise for Germany's domestic and world economy because of the reparations policy of the victor states of 1919. The consequences of that policy were bound to be all the more devastating for Germany when in 1923 France proceeded to military occupation of the Ruhr territory, the center of Germany's economic power. At that time of economic collapse and complete disarmament of Germany, Hitler made the first attempt through the revolution of 9 November 1923 to seize the power of the State. The defendant Rudolph Hess also took part in the march on the Feldherrn Hall in Munich. Together with Adolph Hitler after conviction by the People's Court, he underwent imprisonment at Landsberg Fortress where Hitler wrote his book "Mein Kampf."

When in 1925 the Party was being established again, Rudolph Hess again was one of the first to resume with Adolph Hitler the struggle for national rebirth of the German people. During the first years after its reestablishment the Party was to begin its very slow climb. Germany's domestic economy had recovered from the worst effects of the Ruhr invasion. The currency had been established and due to very extensive foreign credits it had even been possible to bring about an economic boom.

Very soon, however, it was to be revealed that the economic progress of the years 1927/1928/1929 in reality was but illusory prosperity for which in Germany, at any rate, there was no foundation of a sound and well-balanced national economy. It is true that the economic crisis which began in 1930 was a general crisis in world economy and that the decline which Germany experienced at that time was but a part of the general disintegration in world economy. It is just as certain, however, that this was not a question here simply of a seasonal decline within the capitalist economy, such as had been experienced repeatedly before by individual national economies of countries and by world-commerce, but a case in this instance of structural changes at work which may differ in causes but one of the most important of which undoubtedly was the disturbance in the exchange of products and legal tender caused by the unreasonable reparations policy.

It is just as certain that the consequences of the crisis of the world economy were so devastating in Germany, finally finding expression in an unemployment figure of almost 7 million because the changes brought about in the national economy as a result of reparations payments were particularly far reaching, a fact not of negligible importance. If, consequently, the National Socialist Party won a major electoral victory in the Reichstag elections of 14 September 1930 and entered the new Reichstag with no less than 107 delegates, it is not to be attributed in the last place to the then prevailing economic crisis, to the great unemployment and, indirectly to the economic absurdity of the reparation payments and the refusal of the victorious states to consent to a new deal despite the most urgent warnings. True, the reparation payments stipulated in the Treaty of Versailles and the mode of settlement were amended by the Dawes and Young plans. It is, however, just as true that these amendments came too late and continued to demand payments from Germany to an extent and under conditions which were bound to, and did in fact, lead to an economic catastrophe. In this connection, I must point to the following fact: The Prosecution has produced an extensive amount of documentary evidence in reference to the rise of the NSDAP until its seizure of power. A comparison of the Reichstag mandates in the years ranging from 1930 to 1932 with the unemployment figures for the same period would disclose that the progression of these figures was approximately parallel. The more hopeless the social consequences of unemployment became—and in 1932, no less than 25 million people, including family members, may be estimated to have been hit by the consequences of unemployment—the more impressive became the electoral successes of the National Socialists. I hardly believe that the proof of the existence of a causal relation between the consequences of the reparation policy of the victorious powers of 1919 and the rise of National Socialism can be more convincingly demonstrated. The causal relation may be summed up in a short formula: No Versailles Treaty, no reparations; no reparations, no economic collapse with its particularly catastrophic effects upon Germany, resulting in an unemployment figure of nearly 7 millions; and without this collapse, no seizure of power by the National Socialists. The political and historical responsibility of the authoritative statesmen of the opposite side as resulting from this causal origin is so crystal-clear that further demonstrations of it are superfluous in the framework of this trial.

This formula may appear constructed and could be carried further to prove that it was not the economic emergency and the high unemployment figure alone which induced millions of Germans to vote National Socialist on the 14 September for the first time and which led to the subsequent progress of the Party's rise to power. Nevertheless, these causes were assuredly among the foremost and even the other causes which played a part in the decision of many voters can be traced back in finality to the fatal effects of the Treaty of Versailles and refusal of the victorious powers, especially France, to consent to a revision of the treaty. This applies in the first place to the claim for equality of rights raised by all subsequent democratic governments.

DEFENSE

When the German nation had disarmed in fulfillment of the Versailles Treaty it was entitled to expect the victorious powers to disarm also, in accordance with the obligation assumed by them in the Treaty. This was not carried out and there can be no doubt that their denial of the equality of rights as evidenced by their refusal to disarm themselves, figures among the most decisive causes of the rise of National Socialism in the years 1931 and 1932. And if any of Hitler's arguments ever found a response in the German nation, it was that equality of rights could not be denied in the course of time, even after a lost war, to a nation like the German nation with a population of over 75 millions situated in the heart of Europe and with a cultural past of which few other nations can boast. It has already been remarked in this room that a nation which has produced a Luther, a Kant, a Goethe and a Beethoven cannot be indefinitely treated as a minor nation.

Again and again Hitler had occasion to remark upon the fact that the statement of the Weimar Republic left no method untried to arrive at a peaceful revision of the more unbearable clauses of the Treaty of Versailles. For eight years the statesmen of democratic Germany, a Stressmann, and a Bruening, went to Geneva to obtain at last the repeatedly promised equality of rights for Germany and they were repeatedly sent home with empty hands. The dangers produced by this situation could not remain concealed to anyone. In fact, the world was warned by German statesmen, as well as by shrewd politicians of Germany's former enemies. All these warnings were scattered to the winds.

When finally in 1932 the National Socialist Party with 250 seats in the Reichstag had become by far the strongest party in Germany, it could only be a question of time until Hitler and his party would be entrusted with the taking over of government leadership. In the long run this could be avoided all the less since the previous governments of Herr von Papen and General Schleicher had no worthwhile following in the Reichstag at their disposal and exercised their governmental authority exclusively by the means of emergency decrees in accordance with Article 48 of the Weimar Reich Constitution. When on 30 January 1933 Adolf Hitler was actually appointed Reich Chancellor by Reich President von Hindenburg and was entrusted with the formation of a new cabinet, then this was done altogether according to the clauses of the Reich Constitution.

At the Reichstag election in 1932 the National Socialist Party collected in its favor so many votes as had not been accomplished by any party since the existence of the German Reich. If the leader of this strongest party was intrusted with the formation of the cabinet, then this was, particularly in view of the parliamentary conditions prevailing in Germany at that time, by no means extraordinary and there cannot be the slightest doubt that Hitler and his party came to power legally, that is according to the Constitution. However, it is correct that in the course of the following years the constitutional structure of the German Reich and particularly Hitler's position, underwent a change. There is, however, no evidence on hand that this development as well was not legal.

In order to avoid repetition I am hereby referring to the statements of the witness Dr. Lammers.

In this case it may be left completely undecided whether one wants to declare this development to Hitler's absolutely autocratic rule by the creation of a so-called common law or whether one avails oneself of another theory. For the scope of this trial it seems to me much more decisive that not a single nation with which Germany maintained diplomatic relations raised any objections whatsoever or even drew diplomatic or international legal conclusions neither at the seizure of power nor on the occasion of the transformation of the constitutional structure carried on openly before the entire world. Neither at the seizure of power nor at any later period was the question of diplomatic and international legal recognition of the National Socialist State in doubt.

In addition, may it merely be pointed out that the law, which in the following period was to be of the greatest importance for the relationship between citizen and state, was still issued by Reich President von Hindenburg pursuant to Article 48 of the Reich Constitution. I have in mind the decrees of the Reich President for the protection of the people and state, dated 28 February 1933 (Reichsgesetzblatt, part 1, page 83). In article 1 of this decree the pertinent basic laws of the Weimar Constitution were voided and curtailments of personal liberty, the rights of free speech, including freedom of the press, the right to organize and assemble, interference in the privacy of the letters and mails, telegraph and telephone, orders for searching of homes and confiscations, as well as limiting property were declared valid, also outside of the legal limitations otherwise designated for it.

DEFENSE

From a formal viewpoint there can be just as little doubt about the validity of this decree as there can be about any other so-called constitutional or basic state law issued by the Reichstag, the Reich Cabinet, the Ministerial Council for Reich Defense, or by Hitler himself.

Gentlemen of the Tribunal:

On behalf of the defendant Rudolf Hess, I have already stated that he assumed the full responsibility for all laws and decrees which he has signed in his capacity as the deputy of the Fuehrer, as Reichsminister and member of the Ministerial Council for Reich Defense.

I have refrained from presenting documentary evidence in reference to accusations which, as a sovereign state, merely concern the domestic affairs of the German Reich and have no bearing on the crimes against peace and crimes against the laws of war asserted by the Prosecution. I shall, therefore, now also only touch on such laws and constitutional and political measures which have some recognizable connection with the actual counts of the Indictment and the common plan or conspiracy asserted by the Prosecution.

The Indictment accuses the defendant Rudolf Hess of having sponsored the military, economic and psychological preparations for war and to have participated in the political planning and preparation of wars of aggression. As evidence for this assertion, the Prosecution pointed to the fact that the defendant Rudolf Hess, in his capacity as Reich Minister with Portfolio, co-signed the law of 16 March 1935, for the reconstruction of the armed forces. This law reintroduced general conscription in Germany and stipulated that the German peace army was to be divided into 12 corps commands and 36 divisions.

For this trial the proclamation which the Reich Cabinet directed to the German people in connection with the publication of this law and which was placed ahead of the law in the Reichsgesetzblatt, appears to me no less important than the contents of this law. I refer to the contents of this proclamation which has been presented as an exhibit.

This proclamation of 16 March 1935, contains no essential arguments on this question which had not already previously been brought out by the democratic German government at the time of the Weimar Republic.

Your Honors, the Tribunal has permitted me at least to read some of my brief in connection with this question. With reference to the fact, however, that defense counsel for defendant von Neurath has already referred to this question in detail, I shall merely refer to his argument in this connection and I shall therefore forfeit, on my part, coming to that question in detail once again.

[At this and succeeding points marked by asterisks, Dr. Seidl adduced arguments regarding the alleged unfairness of the Versailles Treaty. The Tribunal ruled that such arguments were irrelevant and refused to hear them, whereupon Dr. Seidl omitted portions of his prepared address.—Ed.]

The re-introduction of general military service by the law of March 16, 1935, is apparently not considered in the Indictment as a punishable offense in itself, but only as part of the general plan asserted by the Prosecution, which is claimed to have been intended to commit crimes against peace, against the rules of war and against humanity. Whether such a plan ever existed at all, whether and to what extent the defendant Rudolf Hess was involved in it and what part the re-introduction of general military service may have played in both an objective and a subjective way, I shall take up in detail later.

Within the scope of the common plan, of having planned and prepared a war of aggression, the defendant Rudolf Hess is also accused of having, in his capacity as deputy of the Fuehrer, set up the foreign organization of the NSDAP, the National League for Germans Abroad, the German Eastern League, the German-American Bund and the German Foreign Institute. The documents submitted by the Prosecution in this connection are not able to furnish proof to the effect that the defendant Hess himself issued directives or orders to these organizations, which could have caused them to pursue activities similar to those of a fifth column.

The testimony of the witness Bohle, Stroehlin and Alfred Hess has, on the contrary, proved that the defendant Hess, in particular, forbade these organizations and leaders in the most definite way to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries. The Prosecution has not been able to prove in any way that the above named organizations had actually developed activities which were aimed at undermining the structure of foreign states from within.

Under these circumstances it is superfluous to go into the activity of the above-named organizations and establishments in more detail, all the more so that there is nothing at all tending to prove that there was any causal connection between the tasks and functions of these organizations and the events which later led to the outbreak of war in the year 1939.

The Prosecution, furthermore, tried to prove that defendant Rudolf Hess also took a decisive part in the occupation of Austria on 12 March 1938. I do not intend to enter into details of the history of the annexation and to consider from the legal point of view the facts which actually led to the annexation of Austria to the German Reich in the year 1938.

DEFENSE

In order to save time, again I shall refer to the extensive statement made by the Defense Counsel for the co-defendant Dr. Seyss-Inquart.

* * * * *

Whatever now concerns the participation of the defendant Rudolf Hess and the Party in the execution of the annexation, the evidence has shown here only that the annexation of Austria was an incident which did not have anything to do with the National Socialist Party in the Reich as such. It is sufficient to refer in this connection to the testimony of the defendant Goering and to that of Dr. Seyss-Inquart on the witness stand, which shows that the question of the annexation was solved exclusively by the Reich; that is, therefore, by state authority and not by the Party.

If any doubts should still have existed about this, then they are removed by Document USA-61, 812-PS, presented by the Prosecution. It deals in this case with the letter of the Gauleiter of Salzburg, Dr. Friedrich Rainer, to Reich Commissioner District Leader Josef Buerckel, and in which he states, among other things:

"Soon after the seizure of power in the Eastern Province, Klaussner, Globocnik and I flew to Berlin in order to give a report to the deputy of the Fuehrer, Party Comrade Rudolf Hess, about the incidents which led to the seizure of power."

A report naturally would not have been required if the deputy of the Fuehrer and the Party itself had been directly and decisively participating in the solution of the annexation question. I do not mention this in order to give reasons of justification or excuses on behalf of the defendant Rudolf Hess. The findings are rather made exclusively in the interests of the historical truth.

I now come to the question of the Anschluss of the Sudetenland.

Three and one-half million Sudeten-Germans were incorporated into a state with eight and one-half million Czechs and Slovaks, without being granted a decisive influence on the state. All attempts of this national group to receive autonomy within the Czechoslovakian state structure remained without success. When the question of annexation with regard to Austria was solved, it could not but happen that the future position of the Sudeten Germans, which after all consisted of three and one-half million persons and whose membership in the German nation is beyond any doubt, was also subject to a test.

Now, I do not have the intention to take a stand in all questions of the annexation of the Sudetenland to the Reich in the actual and legal respect. In view of the fact that the Prosecution in the Trial Brief which it presented before the Tribunal against the defendant Hess treated the Sudeten German question and has also presented several documents as evidence, it appears necessary, in spite of all, to take a brief stand concerning them.

In document 3258-PS, GB-262, it deals with a speech of the deputy of the Fuehrer at the meeting of the Foreign Organization of the NSDAP on 28 August 1938. The letter takes a stand in the Sudeten German question in only general statements and that under emphasizing the principle of nationalities and the right of self-determination of the nations. Also the remaining documents presented by the Prosecution, USA-126 and USA-26, do not show on which a decisive participation of the defendant Rudolf Hess in the solution of the Sudeten German question could be based.

However, the extent of this participation can be completely ignored, as the annexation of the Sudetenland to the Reich cannot in itself be a charge of a criminal act according to international law. After all, the annexation of the Sudeten province was not carried out on the basis of a one-handed act of Germany or on the basis of a perhaps disputable agreement between the German Reich and the Czechoslovak Republic. The annexation, rather, took place on the basis of an agreement which had been concluded in Munich on 29 September 1938 between Germany, the United Kingdom of Great Britain, France, and Italy. In this Treaty exact and very detailed agreements were reached about the evacuation of the territory to be ceded and the step-by-step occupation by German troops. The final determination of the frontier was carried out by an international committee.

Without wishing to go into further details, it can still be said with certainty that this is a treaty which had been concluded on the basis of a free agreement of will and that all those participating maintained the expectation that it might provide the basis or at least a considerable prerequisite for an improvement of international relations in Europe.

I am now coming to another point of the Indictment. As well within the limits of the Indictment as a whole, as also in the personal accusation raised by the Prosecution against the defendant Rudolf Hess, the latter is accused of having participated in the outbreak of war and of being responsible for it. The defendant Rudolf Hess actually did take a stand in several speeches on the question of the Polish Corridor and the problem of the Free State of Danzig. In this case, however, the following still has to be stated:

Through the establishment of the Polish Corridor, not only the right of self-determination of the nations was violated—after all, more than one million Germans came under Polish domination in this manner—but in excess of this through the partition of the state territory of the German Reich into two areas completely separated from each other, a condition was established which was not only contrary to all economic common sense but which, in excess of this, had to become the cause for constant discord and incidents from the very first day on. Indeed, from the day of the signing the the Versailles peace treaty, the demand for a revision of the treaty, especially in the question of the Polish Corridor, has never been silenced at any hour. There was no party and no government in Germany which did not acknowledge and demand the necessity of a revision of the treaty, primarily in this point. It cannot be the subject of any doubt that, if Poland ought to have an independent access at all to the Baltic Sea under all circumstances, this problem could have been solved much more sensibly than by the establishment of the so-called Corridor and the thereby conditional partition of the German Reich into two areas which were completely separated from each other.

DEFENSE

Something similar applies with regard to the status of the Free State of Danzig on the basis of international law and state sovereignty. It is not necessary to regard the facts more closely in this case, which in the course of time have led to constantly increasing difficulties and which in the end caused a situation which made a change of the position in regard to international law and state sovereignty of this purely German city necessary.

It is just as unnecessary to go into closer details with regard to the minority problem which was raised by the Polish Corridor and the establishment of a Free State of Danzig. The fact is that in the course of two decades, no less than approximately one million Germans were forced to leave their settlement area and especially under circumstances which could not remain without effect on the general political relations between the German Reich and the Polish Republic. It is also not as if the problems which have been raised here have been publicly discussed only since the coming into power of Adolf Hitler.

* * * * *

Under these circumstances, it could not surprise anyone if after the seizure of power through Adolf Hitler and his party, the questions caused by the Polish Corridor and the separation of Danzig from the Reich were subject to an examination anew. This was all the less avoidable since after the conclusion of the German-Polish Treaty in the year 1934, Poland's attempts to exclude the German element to a continually rising extent did not stop in any way.

I do not intend to occupy myself anymore closely with the negotiations which were conducted by the German Reich with the Polish Republic, the aim of which was to find a modus vivendi under consideration of the justified interests of Poland. In any case, it appears important to me to keep the following facts in mind, and this seems to be essential for the reason that the Prosecution stated again and again that the German Government was obliged to do everything to clarify those questions and that, especially, the German Government was obliged to conduct negotiations and that the one thing that they should not have done was to start a war. The following statements are to show that it was indeed attempted to solve the problems through negotiations, the problems that could not be forgotten and which had to be brought to a solution.

For the first time the Reich Minister for Foreign Affairs discussed in the course of a conversation with the Polish Ambassador on 24 October 1938 the questions caused by the Corridor and the separation of the City of Danzig and suggested a solution which was to be based on the following foundation:

1. The Free State of Danzig returns to the German Reich.
2. An extra-territorial Reichsautobahn belonging to Germany and likewise an extra-territorial railroad with several tracks would be constructed across the Corridor.
3. Poland likewise obtains an extra-territorial road or Autobahn and railroad and a free port in the Danzig area.
4. Poland receives a guarantee of disposal for her goods in the Danzig area.
5. The two nations recognize their common frontiers (Guarantee) or the territories of both sides.
6. The German-Polish Treaty is being extended by 10 to 25 years.
7. Both countries include in their treaty a consultation clause.

The Prosecution itself submitted to the Tribunal the reply of the Polish Government to this proposal. The document is TC-73 No. 45, which describes the attitude of the Polish Foreign Minister Beck of 31 October 1938 and his instructions to the Polish Ambassador Lipski in Berlin. In this document the German proposal is flatly turned down on the ground that "any attempt to incorporate the Free City of Danzig into the Reich would invariably lead to a conflict, and the resulting difficulties would not merely be of a local nature, but would prevent any possibility of Polish-German understanding in all its aspects."

In fact, such also was the stand taken by the Polish Ambassador during another conversation between him and the Reich Foreign Minister on 19 November 1938. Asked about the Polish Government's attitude regarding the German proposition of an extra-territorial arterial motor road and an extra-territorial railway through the Corridor, the Polish Ambassador declared that he was not able to make an official statement.

DEFENSE

It is impossible to deny that the proposal made by Germany was very restrained and contained nothing incompatible with Polish honor or the vital interests of that State. One should be the more willing to admit this, as the creation of the Corridor and the separation of East Prussia from the Reich was really felt by the German people as the hardest of the territorial burdens of the Versailles Treaty. If, nevertheless, the Polish Government turned this proposal down, for reasons leaving hardly any prospect of finding a solution in subsequent negotiations, the conclusion could be drawn that at that time already Poland altogether lacked a sincere wish for an agreement, which would take into consideration Germany's legitimate interests. This impression was confirmed by the negotiations during the visit of the Polish Foreign Minister Beck to Berlin, on 5 January 1939, and the return by the Reich Foreign Minister to Warsaw, on 21 January 1939. If, in spite of this hostile attitude of Poland the Reich Foreign Minister repeated the proposition made on 24 October 1938 in another meeting with the Polish Ambassador on 21 March 1939, this must lead to the conclusion that the German Government was sincerely desirous of solving, by means of negotiation, the questions relative to the Corridor and the separation of Danzig. Thus it cannot be seriously denied that the German Government tried to solve the Danzig question and that of the Polish Corridor by negotiation and that it made very moderate proposals in that respect.

The reply to the German proposals of 21 March 1939 was a partial mobilization of the Polish armed forces. It need not be defined as to what was the connection between the partial mobilization ordered by the Polish Government and the British proposal for consultation, dated 21 March 1939, and whether, incidental to the transmission of this consultation proposal in Warsaw, the declaration of guarantee of 31 March had already been promised or contemplated. There can be no doubt, however, that the partial mobilization of the Polish armed forces, as also admitted by the British Prime Minister Chamberlain in a declaration before the House of Commons on 10 July 1939, was bound to do anything but create favorable prerequisites for further negotiations. As a matter of fact, the subject of the memorandum of the Polish Government handed by the Polish Ambassador Lipski on 26 March 1939 was a complete rejection of the German proposal. It was declared that extra-territoriality for the highways could not come into the question, and that a reunion of Danzig with the Reich could not be considered. In the conversation between the Reich Foreign Minister and the Polish Ambassador, which followed the handing over of the Memorandum, the latter declared openly that it was his unpleasant duty to point out that to pursue further the German plans, particularly insofar as they had a bearing on the return of Danzig to the German Reich, would be tantamount to a war with Poland.

If I have stated that the connection between the partial Polish mobilization of 23 March 1939 and the Polish memorandum of 26 March 1939 containing a complete rejection of the German proposal on the one hand, and the proposed British guarantee-pledge of 31 March 1939 on the other hand remains undecided, this appears justified with regard to the proposed "formal declaration" made by the British Government as early as 21 March in Warsaw, as well as in Paris and Moscow. This "formal declaration" was to announce the opening of immediate discussions on measures of mutual resistance against any threat against any European state. Furthermore, the speech by Prime Minister Chamberlain on 17 March in Birmingham, and the speech of the British Foreign Minister Lord Halifax of 20 March in the House of Lords, reflected a point of view bound to encourage the Polish Government all the more towards stubbornness. As a matter of fact, the proposed step of "a mutual formal declaration" already proposed by the British Government to the Governments in Warsaw, Paris and Moscow, proved to be the opening of extended discussions whose purpose it was to place an iron ring around Germany. It was thus clear from the outset under such conditions bilateral negotiations between the German and the Polish Government promised but little success, in any case as long as those discussions lasted. In another memorandum handed to the Polish Foreign Minister on 28 April 1939, already submitted by the Prosecution, the German Government nevertheless once more explained its attitude completely and established once more its readiness for further negotiations. Contents of this memorandum, including proposals made in March 1939, were announced publicly by Adolf Hitler in his speech delivered in the Reichstag on 28 April 1939.

In reply to the memorandum of the German Government of 28 April 1939, the Polish Government transmitted on 5 May 1939 a Note Verbale which has also been submitted by the Prosecution. The contents of that Note Verbale contained even more emphatically a complete rejection of Germany's proposition for solving the problem of the Corridor and the Danzig question.

DEFENSE

Negotiations which began on 21 March 1939 between London, Paris, Warsaw, and Moscow for the purpose of establishing an alliance exclusively directed against Germany, did not proceed as desired. Nor was it possible for the French and British Military Commissions, sent to Moscow on 11 August 1939, to eliminate completely the difficulties arising from evidently far-reaching differences of opinion. It need not be established how important was the fact that Poland, which was to obtain a guarantee by England, France, and the Soviet Union, publicly refused to accept military assistance from the Soviet Union. It also remains uncertain whether it is correct what the Soviet Foreign Commissar Molotov asserted during the emergency meeting of the supreme Soviet on 31 August 1939 to the effect that England had not only dissipated Poland's apprehensions, but that, on the contrary, had furthered them. It seems more important to examine the fundamental differences of opinion.

And now here I was going to refer to an extract from the well-known book written by the former British Ambassador in Berlin, Sir Neville Henderson. In consideration of the fact that the Tribunal does not desire to have this question read, but that on the other hand during the taking of evidence this extract had been admitted, I shall confine myself merely to refer to it.

* * * * *

Meanwhile, the following actually occurred:

At the 18th Congress of the Communist Party of 10 March 1939, the President of the Council of People's Commissars of USSR, Stalin made a speech in which he intimated that the Soviet Government considered it possible or desirable to reach a better understanding even with Germany. Hitler understood this hint perfectly well. Foreign Commissar Molotov expressed similarly himself in his speech before the Highest Soviet on 31 May 1939. Thereupon the discussions between the German and the Soviet Governments were followed by the conclusion of a German-Soviet Trade and Credit Agreement. This Agreement was signed in Berlin on 19 August 1939. But already during these economic negotiations, questions of general political nature were discussed which, according to the Soviet Russian News Agency "Tass" of 21 August 1939, made known the desire of both parties to bring about the change of their policy and to ban war by the conclusion of a non-aggression pact. This Non-aggression Agreement was signed in Moscow in the night from 23 to 24 August 1939; therefore, as shown by the presentation of evidence in this trial, the attack of German armies against Poland was ordered two days before.

Besides this Non-aggression Agreement, a "Secret Supplementary Protocol" was signed as an important part of the former. On the basis of the presentation of evidence, especially on the basis of the affidavit of ambassador and Chief of the legal department of the Foreign Office, Dr. Friedrich Gaus, on the basis of the testimony of State Secretary in the Foreign Office Baron von Weizsaecker, and on the basis of the statements of the defendants von Ribbentrop and Jodl, the following contents of the secret supplementary protocol can be considered as established.

In the case of territorial-political reorganization in the territories belonging to the Baltic States, Finland, Estonia, and Latvia should fall into the sphere of interest of the Soviet Union, whereas the territory of Lithuania should belong to the sphere of interest of Germany.

For the territory of Poland, the division of spheres of interest was made in the manner, that the territories lying to the east of the rivers Narev, Vistula and San should fall to spheres of interests of the Soviet Union, whereas the territories lying to the west of the demarcation line determined by these rivers should belong to the German sphere of interest. In other respects, an agreement was reached concerning Poland that both powers would come to a mutual understanding about the final settlement of questions concerning this country. With regard to the Southeast of Europe, the limits of spheres of interest of both sides were made in the manner, that the Soviet side stressed its interest in Bessarabia, whereas the German side declared a complete political disinterest in this territory. According to the testimony of several witnesses, but especially on the basis of the statements by Ambassador Dr. Gaus and State Secretary von Weizsaecker it is established that this secret agreement included in it a complete new settlement concerning Poland and the future fate of the Polish State.

The efforts to come anyhow to an understanding with Poland with regard to the question of Danzig and the Corridor made after the conclusion of the German-Soviet Non-Aggression Agreement and of the Secret Supplementing Protocol belonging to it failed. The Pact of Assistance which was made on 25 August 1939 between Great Britain and Poland did not prevent the outbreak of the war, but simply delayed it for a few days. I have no intention to go into particulars of the diplomatic negotiations which were conducted after the conclusion of the German-Soviet Agreement of 23 August 1939, so that an agreement can still be obtained. One thing, however, can be said with certainty: Should the one-sided guarantee declaration of England of 31 March 1939 show that it raised the already existing stubbornness of the Polish Government against the German offers, then an Assistance Pact with Great Britain would operate quite certainly against a readiness to negotiate on the part of the Polish Government. The failure of the negotiations which were carried out between Germany and Poland can surprise all the less, when one bears in mind the testimony of the witness Dahlerus before this Tribunal. Had not this witness confirmed that the Polish Ambassador in Berlin, Lipski, declared on 31 August 1939 that he was not interested in discussing the proposals of the German Government? He based this negative attitude on the statement that in case of war, a revolution will break out in Germany and the Polish Army will march towards Berlin.

DEFENSE

Whatever the news might have been which induced the English Government to conclude the treaty with Poland and which possibly intimated at a rift in the German-Italian alliance and at symptoms of deterioration in the German State structure—and here I refer to the testimonies of the witnesses Dahlerus and Gisevius—the future will prove that such ideas were not based on any facts.

When on 1 September 1939, war broke out between Germany and Poland, it was at first the question of a localized conflict between two European states. But when Great Britain and France declared war on Germany on 3 September 1939, this conflict expanded into a European war, into a war, which as all modern wars between great powers indicated from its very beginning the tendency of developing into a world war because of the presently insufficient international organization and the complete collapse of the system of collective security. This war was to bring immeasurable suffering for all humanity, and when on 8 May 1945 the European war found its end with Germany's unconditional surrender, it left behind a Europe in ruins.

Adolf Hitler did not live to see Germany's collapse and unconditional surrender. Twenty-two former leaders of National Socialist Germany stand before the bar of the Tribunal in order to answer charges of having committed crimes against the peace, against the rules of warfare, and against humanity in the execution of a common plan.

The so-called London Agreement of 8 August 1945 concluded between the Government of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Government of the United States of America, the Provisional Government of France, and the Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, is the basis of this trial. The present Tribunal was created pursuant to this agreement, the composition, competency, and tasks of which were established by the Charter of the International Military Tribunal, which is a considerable part of the agreement concluded by the four mentioned Governments on 8 August 1945.

The Charter of the International Military Tribunal, though, does not only contain the regulations dealing with its composition, competence, and tasks; besides those, it includes—and these are the most important parts of the Charter—the regulations of material-juridical contents. This applies above all to Article 6, which contains the definitions of crimes against the peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, with all the characteristic facts of the case. Paragraph 3 of Article 6 of the Charter, which enumerates the characteristics of the so-called conspiracy in detail, has to be considered above all as the penal facts of the case. Furthermore, Articles 7, 8, and 9 of the Charter are to be considered as material-juridical regulations.

The subsequent part of my brief was not allowed by the Tribunal. It deals principally with the contents of the statement made by the defense at the beginning of this trial on the 21st of November; and therefore, I need not read them.

* * * * *

In the indictment the defendant Hess is charged with having supported the seizure of power of the so-called Nazi conspirators, the strengthening of their control over Germany, and furthermore the furthering of the military, economic, and psychological preparations for war. He, moreover, is charged with having participated in the political planning and preparation of wars of aggression and of wars in violation of international treaties, agreements, and assurances, and in the preparations and planning of the foreign political schemes of the so-called Nazi conspirators.

Count I of the Indictment refers to the so-called common plan of conspiracy. According to it, all the defendants and various other persons have participated for a number of years prior to 8 May 1945 in the planning and execution of a common plan as leaders, organizers, instigators, and collaborators. This plan aimed at and brought about the commitment of crimes against the peace, of crimes against laws of warfare, and against humanity. It is asserted that the defendants planned, prepared, unleashed, and directed wars of aggression, and committed war crimes and crimes against humanity in the execution of this common plan.

While the Charter only knows three specifications of crimes—crimes against the peace, against the rules of warfare, and against humanity—the Indictment contains four of them. In the Indictment the common plan or conspiracy is made an individual and independent count of the charge, without the Charter bringing forth sufficient reasons for this. It may be left undecided whether conspiracy is considered a particular type of crime according to Anglo-American law. In view of the fact that the Charter rejects the use of both Anglo-American and continental law, but has established its own standards of law, and these "sui generis", only the text and spirit of the Charter itself is decisive.

DEFENSE

According, however, to what is expressly stated in Article 6, paragraph 3, of the Charter, regarding the outlining of execution of a plan for the perpetration of a crime against peace, against the customs of war, or against humanity, it cannot be subject to any doubt that there cannot be an independent state of criminality as stated in Count 1 of the Indictment under the heading of Concerted Plan or Conspiracy. In all events, not according to the principle of the provisions of the Charter.

After the defendant Hess has been charged with all four counts of the Indictment, it is necessary first to answer count 1 of the Indictment:

The Indictment places at the center of the incriminated concerted plan or conspiracy the National Socialist "German Labor Party" of which Adolf Hitler had become the leader in 1921, and which the defendant Rudolf Hess also joined as early as 1921. Even the Indictment does not, apparently, claim that the party program of the NSDAP was actually criminal in itself. It appears all the less necessary to probe further into this question, as in the subsequent routine of political life the party program has not by any means played the part which could probably be supposed. Moreover, the appraisal of evidence has definitely revealed, as far as the position and rise of the NSDAP is concerned, that up to 20 January 1933 the National Socialist Party was a party alongside other parties; that it has fought with the same legitimate means as other parties for the attainment of its objectives; and that not least among the factors of its rise is that Germany experienced, in 1932-1933, as a consequence of the reparations policy of the victor powers in 1919, an economic and social decline of uncommon magnitude; and that, finally, on 30 January 1933, the Party, as the strongest, was entrusted with the formation of the Government in application of the provisions of the Reich Constitution and its leader, Adolf Hitler, was nominated Reich Chancellor.

During the so-called period of struggle, the Party, like all other parties, openly fought for the principles it represented, and the Prosecution could not admit in evidence a single argument which allowed the conclusion to be drawn that by using illegal means the Party and its leaders had been participants in a common plan aiming at launching a war of aggression. In fact, one has to keep in mind only the political, economic, and military condition of Germany in the first years after the end of World War I in order to recognize how mistaken the acceptance of such a plan aiming at starting a war is for that time. The conception put forward by the indictment reveals not only an entirely false idea of the economic, political, and military conditions which Germany faced as a consequence of the peace settlement by Versailles, but this conception also discloses complete failure to appreciate the intrinsic virtue of any policy.

When Adolf Hitler had been appointed leader of the strongest party by the Reich President Von Hindenburg on 30 January 1933 as Reich Chancellor, it was necessarily out of the question for him and his Government, in which other parties participated, to start drafting a common plan aiming at a war of aggression, being not abreast with political, and above all, economic conditions. The problems which the German Reich Cabinet faced at that time resulted directly from the fact that up to 7,000,000 unemployed people in Germany had to be put to work. As the witness Dr. Lammers stated, the elimination of economic and social distress actually was the most important question at the first Cabinet session. There was no question at all of a common plan aiming at launching a war of aggression and, in fact, it is inconceivable that in the circumstances at that time even one member of the Government could consider such an idea in some concrete shape. Furthermore, it has been established through the testimony of Dr. Lammers and other witnesses, that the subject matter of the first cabinet meeting and the resolutions there passed are contained in the governmental declaration of 1 February 1933, made known to the German people in the form of a manifesto of the German Government.

According to the Indictment, abrogation of the armaments restrictions imposed on Germany through the Versailles Treaty was the first aim of the conspiracy charged by the Prosecution. I have already expressed my opinion on that question. The final refusal of the victor powers to disarm in their turn, according to their pledge, has at least accorded the German Reich the right to obtain an equalization of armament through its own rearmament. This was not done in secrecy by any means, but in public, through the announcement of the reintroduction of the Draft Law on 16 March 1935. The Prosecution has not been able to show evidence for its assertion that this law was connected with, and was part of, the common plan aimed at bringing about a war of aggression. The exclusive purpose of the law was rather to reestablish Germany's right to equality at least for that question, sixteen years after the end of the First World War. In that connection brief reference is appropriate to a document which the Prosecution produced, together with nine other documents, so-called key documents, and which first of all serve the purpose of establishing the proof for existence of the common plan claimed in the Indictment. This is the written record on a discussion at the Reich Chancellery of 5 November 1937, USA-25, 386-PS.

DEFENSE

As it is known to the court, this is not a literal reproduction of Adolf Hitler's statements, but a report of Colonel Hossbach which was drafted by the latter 5 days later, viz., on 10 November 1937. I have no intention of entering any further into the contents of this document. I refer here to the statements which other defense counsel have made on this question. I only mention that when addressing this speech to the Commanders-in-Chief and the then Minister of Foreign Affairs, Hitler had a chronological plan in view which reveals no conformity whatever with the subsequent events. In these circumstances the existence of a determined and well-outlined plan by Hitler himself even seems very unlikely. Only one conclusion can, with certainty, be drawn from the contents of this document; namely, that until 5 November 1937 Hitler himself only thought of an amicable settlement of the territorial problems raised by the Versailles Treaty. For this reason, therefore, there can have been no question of a common plan aiming at the launching of a war of aggression, at least, up to this time.

This document, however, is still worthy of notice for another reason: The report begins with the Fuehrer's assertion "that the subject of today's conference is of such importance that its discussion in other states should belong to the Forum of the Government Cabinet. He (The Fuehrer) however, considering the importance of the matter, refrained from making it the subject of discussion in a full session of the Reich Cabinet." First of all, it can be left undecided in how far other questions from 1937 on were still dealt with by the Reich Cabinet in Cabinet sessions, or in the so-called circulation procedure; in the administrative procedure or in the legislative way. The conclusion can, however, be drawn with certainty by reason of the total outcome of the presentation of evidence and in particular by reason of witness Dr. Lammers' statements and other witnesses, but also from a great number of documents submitted by the Prosecution itself that at the latest, from 5 November 1937 on, all problems concerning the question of war and peace were no longer dealt with by the Government as State Authority, nor by another larger circle of collaborators remaining almost the same, but exclusively by Adolf Hitler himself.

In all probability this situation already existed in the year 1933. In this connection, I should like to draw attention to the statements of several defendants in the witness box who, for example, were informed of the reoccupation of the demilitarized zone of the Rhineland in the same way as any other citizen, i.e., by means of the press and radio.

It is certain, however, that all important political and military decisions were taken by Adolf Hitler alone after 5 November 1937, and particularly after the so-called Fritsch crisis and the change of the Reich War Ministry into the High Command of the Wehrmacht which it involved. According to witness Dr. Lammers' statements, general conferences between the Reich Government, the Supreme Party Directorate and the Generals never took place. According to the statement of this witness and others, it was rather that a closer connection never existed between these three institutions. Indeed, not a single one of the documents submitted by the Prosecution reveals anything which might cause us to admit the existence of an independent collaboration between the Reich Government, the Supreme Party Directorate and the Reich War Ministry or afterwards the High Command of the Wehrmacht and the Commanders-in-Chief of the Wehrmacht Branches and their Chiefs of Staff. On the contrary: If a positive conclusion can really be drawn from the presentation of evidence, it is that the power was concentrated exclusively in the hands of Adolf Hitler, that the Reich Government, the Supreme Party Directorate and the Wehrmacht received their orders and directives only from him; that it was Hitler's own policy to prevent a working and independent combination of these institutions.

It can thus also be explained that in all questions of a political or military nature, only those officers were included which had directly to do with the task to be carried out. It is clear from all the documents submitted by the Prosecution that, as a rule, at the conferences presided over by Hitler, there was no question of conferences as is customary in parliamentary Democracies, but they were essentially only concerned with the issuing of orders.

It is not necessary to examine in detail the statements on their relation to Adolf Hitler made by nearly all the defendants; nor is it necessary to define an attitude towards the statements on the attitude assumed by a whole series of other witnesses regarding Adolf Hitler's position in the German Governmental system. One thing can be said with certainty: At the latest, from 5 November 1937 on Hitler's position was so commanding and his treatment of all decisive political and military questions so free of doubt that for this reason alone there could be no grounds left for the acceptance of a common plan.

The defendant, Rudolf Hess, though the Fuehrer's Deputy and the highest political leader for Party matters, did not contribute to nor take part in any of the conferences or any other important political or military decisions characterized by the Prosecution as being essential to prove the existence of a common plan, just as little as he contributed to or took part in the conference of the Fuehrer in the Reich Chancellery on 5 November 1937 (USA 25). The same holds good, for example, for the next exhibit USA 26 (388-PS) submitted by the Prosecution.

DEFENSE

This is the case of the most important case "Gruen" Czechoslovakia. Without having to enter any further into the details of this document, it can be said without more ado that it deals only with what is entirely the work of the General Staff, which was originally intended as a draft, and afterwards elaborated into a real operational plan. This operational plan was not put into action, the documents referring to case Gruen, on the contrary, concluding with direction No. 1 of the Fuehrer and Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht, which refers to the occupation of the Sudeten German areas separated from Czechoslovakia by virtue of the Munich Agreement of 29 September 1938. In these circumstances, it is superfluous to deal further with the letter of the Chief of the High Command of the Wehrmacht to the Fuehrer's Deputy of 27 September 1938, which is also contained in the documents for the Gruen case and refers to the carrying out of mobilization measures which were to be effected without the issuing of a mobilization order or a corresponding code word.

What I have already said concerning Document USA 25 holds good in the same way for Document USA 27 (L-79). This is another so-called key document having as subject the instruction of the Commanders-in-Chief of the Wehrmacht Branches and the Chiefs of the General Staff by the Fuehrer in the new Reich Chancellery on 23 May 1939. Without intending to enter into the importance or the value of this document as evidence, the Fuehrer's speech closed with the order to set up a small Research Staff in the High Command of the Wehrmacht; this document shows clearly that no common plan in the shape asserted by the Prosecution can have existed, especially not between the defendants now facing their trial. Not a single Minister or official of civil administration took part in this conference at the Fuehrer's Headquarters, which in reality was not a conference but an instruction and issuance of orders.

The next three documents submitted by the Prosecution as key documents refer to one and the same subject, namely to Adolf Hitler's speech addressed to the Commanders-in-Chief of the Wehrmacht on 22 August 1939. The following documents are in question: USA 28 (L-3), USA 29 (798-PS) and USA 30 (1014-PS). I will not enter any further into the value of these documents as evidence, although it is obvious that these cannot be equivalent documents, and though it is quite clear that a corresponding reproduction to some extent of Adolf Hitler's expositions is out of the question. None of these documents reveal their authorship. Moreover, the statements differ considerably one from another as far as volume and contents are concerned.

Document USA 29 seems to contain the most complete reproduction of Hitler's statements. And here again the conclusion is most worthy of notice, a conclusion which throws some light upon the situation at that time and defines the event which made it possible for Hitler to make such a speech to the Commanders-in-Chief: "I was convinced that Stalin would never accept the English offer. Russia is not interested in the maintenance of Poland and then Stalin knows it means the end of his regime, it being immaterial whether his soldiers come off victorious or vanquished. Litvinow's solution was decisive. I gradually changed Russia's attitude in this matter. In connection with the commercial treaty we engaged in political talks. Proposal for a nonaggression pact. Then came a general proposition from Russia. Four days ago I took a special step which caused Russia to signify her willingness to conclude it yesterday. The personal contact with Stalin is established. Von Ribbentrop will conclude the Treaty the day after tomorrow. Poland is now in the position I wanted her in . . ." Besides the Commanders-in-Chief, no minister or leader of the Party, specifically not the defendant Rudolf Hess, attended this speech of the Fuehrer.

The same holds good for Document 789-PS (USA 23). The subject of this document is a discussion with the Fuehrer on November 23, 1939. It appears from this document that here again only the Commanders-in-Chief of the Wehrmacht were assembled to receive the Fuehrer's directions for the imminent operations in the West.

The next key document is Exhibit USA 31; namely, directive No. 21 for the Barbarossa case. This was a question of a directive by the Fuehrer and Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht which had an exclusively military character and was intended only for the sphere of the Wehrmacht. Any participation by civilian administrative officers or of the Party, even in the person of the highest political leader; namely, the defendant, Rudolf Hess; is excluded from the first by the nature of this directive.

It appears also from document USA 32 (2718-PS) the subject of which is a file memo on the result of a conference on 2 May 1941 about the Barbarossa case, that neither the deputy of the Fuehrer nor any other political leader took part in this conference.

DEFENSE

The last so-called key document to discuss is USA 33 (1881-PS) an account by Ambassador Schmidt of the conversation between the Fuehrer and the Japanese Foreign Minister Matsuoka in Berlin on April 4th, 1941. By the very nature of this conference there could be as a matter of course, no question of any participation in it by the defendant Rudolf Hess or by any other political leader of the Party. However, something else appears from this document; namely, the fact that it is not only false to talk about a common plan within Germany aiming at a war of aggression, but even more than this, that no kind of close political or military co-operation existed between the so-called Axis powers, in any case as far as the relations between Germany and Japan are concerned.

What conclusion can now be drawn from the contents of this so-called key document which the prosecution itself has characterized as particularly relevant as to the existence of a so-called common plan? Without wanting to express a view as to the material relevance of those documents, in any case it is established by these notes that the defendant Hess was not present at any of these conferences or when these orders were issued. If, in appraising this circumstance, one considers the further fact that the defendant Rudolf Hess was the Fuehrer's deputy and therefore the highest political leader, and that furthermore, after September 1st, 1939, he was designated as the Fuehrer's successor after the defendant Hermann Goering, then there would not seem to be in fact any place for the assumption of a common plan in the form asserted by the prosecution.

In this connection, may I refer to the report of the Chief of Staff of the United States Army to the Secretary of War for the period from July 1, 1943, to June 30th, 1945. I quote: "The proofs at hand show that Hitler's original intention was to create a Greater German Reich that would dominate Europe by absorbing the Germanic peoples in the countries bordering on the German Reich and by strengthening these new boundaries. For the achievement of this aim Hitler pursued a policy of opportunism by which he succeeded in occupying the Rhineland, Austria and Czechoslovakia without military resistance. No proof has yet been found that the German High Command had an over-all strategic plan. The High Command did fundamentally approve Hitler's policy, but his impetuous strategy outran Germany's military capacities and finally led to Germany's defeat. The history of the German High Command since 1938 is full of constant personal conflicts in which Hitler's personal order increasingly prevailed against military judgment.

The first clash occurred in the year 1938 and ended in the dismissal of von Blomberg, von Fritsch and Beck, and in the elimination of the last important conservative influence on German foreign policy.

"The campaign in Poland, France, Norway, and the Netherlands resulted in serious dissensions between Hitler and the generals, with regard to details in the execution of the strategic plans. In every case, the general staff favored an orthodox form for the offensive, whereas Hitler was for an unorthodox attack, the objectives of which lay deep in enemy territory. In every case, Hitler's idea prevailed and the really amazing success of each of these successive campaigns raised Hitler's prestige to a point where one no longer dared to oppose his views. His military self-confidence became boundless after the victory in France, and henceforth he began to criticize and disparage his generals' way of thinking even in the presence of junior officers. So the result was that no opposition was brought forward by the general staff when Hitler made his fateful decision to advance against the danger threatening in the east.

"By Italy's entrance into the war, Mussolini intended to realize his strategic plans for the expansion of his empire under the cover of the German military successes. Field Marshal Keitel states that the Italian declaration of war was in contradiction with the declarations made to Germany. Both Keitel and Jodl agree that it was not desired. From the beginning Italy was nothing but a burden for the German war potential. Because of her dependence for oil and coal, Italy was a constant source of friction in the economic field. Mussolini's one-sided campaign against Greece and his attack on Egypt forced the Germans into the Balkan campaign, as well as into the African campaign and led to an overstraining of the German forces which became one of the chief factors of the German defeat.

"Moreover, there is no evidence whatsoever of a strategic planning between Germany and Japan. The German general staff recognized the fact that Japan was obligated by her neutrality pact with Russia, but hoped that Japan would tie up strong British and American land, sea, and air forces in the Far East . . ."

The statements of the defendants Keitel and Jodl, which they have made on the witness stand, are essentially the same as the statements of the American chief of staff; so further details on this point are superfluous. It may be considered as proven that not once did a complete agreement exist among the most intimate circle of Adolf Hitler's associates on the measures to be taken in the political and military field, whereby, first of all, the constitutionally established relationship of rank between the officers of the armed forces and the head of the state and supreme commander need not be considered. One sees that the existence of a common plan aiming at war cannot be accepted even in the case of that group of persons for whom it first seemed most likely.

DEFENSE

The second common goal of the conspiracy is declared by the indictment to be the appropriation of the territories which Germany had lost as a result of the World War of 1914–1918. The preamble to the Treaty of Versailles provides for the possibility of a revision of the Treaty. Going beyond this, the demand for the reunion of Austria to the German Reich and the annexation of the Sudeten German regions cannot in itself be concluded to rest on the existence of a plan which was to have been realized at the proper moment by the use of violence or by way of war. As a matter of fact, by a disregard of the right of self-determination of nations, these territories had already been prevented in the year 1919 from annexing themselves to the German Reich. On this question I can refer to the statements I made at the beginning. Actually, the annexation of Austria took place—this can perhaps be said as a result of the presentation of evidence—under circumstances which cannot be described as warlike and which permit the conclusion that the greater part of the Austrian population approved the annexation. Concerning the Sudeten-German question, it suffices here to refer to the Munich agreement between Germany, Great Britain, France, and Italy by which the reunion of the Sudeten-Germans with the Reich was settled.

And finally, the third aim of the common plan was described as the annexation of additional territories on the European continent which should serve the conspirators as “Lebensraum.” The indictment is very unclear in this point and lacks every substance. But in fact the question of the so-called “Lebensraum” is a problem which is completely independent of the National Socialist ideology and is determined by the size of the area and number of inhabitants. Every German Government had to and must deal with this question. If any argument by Hitler found a lasting response in the German people, it was the demand made by him for an appropriate share of the German people in the material wealth of the world. This demand appears to be all the more justified, as the proportion between the size of the area and the number of inhabitants was more unfavorable for the German people than for any other people.

I do not need to give detailed reasons in what insufficient way the most important sources of raw materials are distributed and that certain raw materials are completely monopolized. It is certain that the bitterness about the unjust distribution of the material wealth of the world had to increase in the German people, as not only every reasonable revision was rejected, but moreover it was said by the opposite side in an unmistakable manner that the nations were divided into two classes; namely, the "haves" and the "have-nots." In fact, this classification could be felt as nothing else than ridicule. Moreover, even after 1933 there was no unanimous opinion about the possible solutions concerning the removal of the difficulties resulting from the need for space. So as, for instance, the defendant Rudolf Hess belonged precisely to those who wanted to solve the problem of "Lebensraum" by the acquisition of colonies if possible. For instance, in a big speech in Stettin, on 21 March 1936: "The natural way to make more food available for the people of Germany, to improve our living standard, is to supplement it by having colonies. Therefore, the Fuehrer by stating his willingness to return to the League of Nations, connected with this the expectation that the question of colonies would be submitted to examination. The Fuehrer knows, that a people without a sufficient area, without a sufficient food basis, a hungry people must in the long run become a center of unrest because of its instinct of self-preservation against which the most ingenious statesman is powerless. For hunger is a natural instance which cannot be subdued either by warnings or by others. Our desire for colonies is therefore only the desire for a pacification of Europe for a long time, and therefore the question of the allocation of colonies to Germany is part of the Fuehrer's big proposal of pacification. * * *"

The connection between the unjust distribution of the material goods of the world which contradicts all economic reason and the political tensions which shake the peace of the world again and again, cannot simply be overlooked.

Your Honors, I now turn to the legal evaluation of the state of affairs which may be considered as actually established. As I have already stated, article 6, paragraph 3, of the Statute is not the standardization of an own and independent state of criminality, but the expansion of the criminal responsibility of the leaders' instigators, and participants who have taken part in the drafting or in the execution of a common plan for the committing of a crime mentioned in paragraph 2. According to the mentioned regulation, these persons are to be responsible not only for the acts which they themselves have committed, but they also are to take upon themselves the penal consequences for all acts which were committed by any person in the execution of such a plan.

In article 6, paragraph 2a, of the Statute the fact of a crime against the peace is defined as follows: "The planning, the preparation, the initiation, or the execution of a war of aggression or of a war which violates international treaties; the conclusion of agreements or the giving of assurances, or the participation in a common plan or in a conspiracy for the execution of one of the above-mentioned acts."

DEFENSE

While it is expressly defined in article 6, paragraph 3 of the statute that the criminal responsibility of the participant in the draft of a common plan is limited to acts which "have been committed by any person in execution of such a plan", the crime against the peace is according to article 6, paragraph 2a, of the Statute already completed with the "conclusion of agreements or the giving of assurances or the participation in a common plan or in a conspiracy for the execution of a plan which has as its aim the preparation or initiating or execution of a war of aggression." In contrast to article 6, paragraph 3, it is here not necessary that an act of execution is actually committed.

I do not intend now to deal with the question more specifically whether the war as such and especially the start of a war of aggression was a crime according to international law valid at the time of the day of the outbreak of war, on 1 September 1939. This question has already been discussed in the opening speech of the defense. This examination of the legal side of this question has shown that neither the League of Nations agreement nor the Briand-Kellogg Pact contain anything which would allow the conclusion that the starting of a war was a criminal and therefore punishable offense. Valid international law knew neither a criminal responsibility of the state as a body corporate nor even less a criminal responsibility of the agencies of the state, such as the head of the state, the members of the government, the military commanders, the economic leaders, etc.

It can also be left undecided to what this unsatisfactory condition of international law had to be traced back. It already was correctly pointed out that the idea of sovereignty in the refusal of the great powers in particular to relinquish some of these rights of sovereignty in the interest of a better supernational organization, also were a reason for the unsatisfactory status of the international law especially in this question. In connection with it there is another fact which does not seem to be less important to me, namely that it was not possible until now to create an effective organization and a procedure which would guarantee a real satisfaction of the justified claims of the peoples for a proper participation in the material goods of the world, and which would also in other respects take care of a just settlement of the conflicting interests.

Already on the basis of these establishments and examinations there can hardly be any doubt that a crime against the peace, as it has found its factual definition in article 6, paragraph 2a, of the Statute, does not exist. This section of article 6 of the Statute does not have a sufficient basis in existing international law.

I omit the following important statements as well as the following statements concerning the secret German-Russian treaty of 28 August 1939, which deals with the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The Tribunal has to consider officially whether the jurisdiction still exists concerning this secret treaty.

* * * * *

Moreover, the following is to be said about article 6, paragraph 3 of the Charter: The constitutive facts of a conspiracy, as they have been expressed in article 6, paragraph 3, are a typical institution of Anglo-American law. The Continental European law does not know such a state of criminality. But there cannot be any doubt that international penal law, insofar as there exists any in the restricted and actual sense, and if one does not understand in it the standards which are to be observed in the application of national or foreign law, also does not know the concept of conspiracy as a criminal state of facts.

But it is not only the question of the prevailing international law and the concordance of the Charter with the same, which is to be put to test. The issue is rather also the answering of the following question:

In the opening speeches of the four chief prosecutors and also in the discussions prior to the trial concerning the legal bases of the trial, two entirely contradictory arguments were introduced. While some argued that the Charter was a complete expression of the prevailing international law and was in agreement with the common legal conviction of all members of the international legal community, the others asserted that it was one of the main tasks of the International Military Tribunal now being instituted to develop international law further. This latter conception for instance, stands out clearly in the report of the American Chief Prosecutor to the President of the United States of 7 June 1945. Here it is stated verbatim among other things: "In initiating this trial, we must also remain aware of the aims with which our people assumed the burdens of war. After we entered the war, and our men and our wealth were mobilized to eradicate this evil, there was the general feeling among our people that out of the war there should arise unmistakable rules and a practical machine from which anyone who entertains thought of a further predatory war should realize that he will be personally held responsible and that he will be personally punished."

DEFENSE

Or in another part of this report, the following is stated literally : " * * * According to the International Law of the 19th and early 20th century, the waging of war was not generally considered as unlawful or as a crime in the legal sense. Summed up, the prevailing doctrine held that both parties in any war were to be considered as being in the same legal situation and therefore had the same rights." The legal considerations in the report then actually conclude with the following challenge: " * * * An attack against the fundamental principles of international relations must be considered as nothing less than a crime against the community, which rightly must protect the integrity of its fundamental agreements by punishing the aggressor. We therefore propose to raise the challenge that a war of aggression is a crime and that modern international law has abandoned the justification according to which he who instigates or wages a war acts in accordance with the law."

And as a matter of fact, it would not be necessary to raise the demand for a penal law if the action under consideration already had been threatened with punishment by existing law.

It is obvious that the fulfillment of such a demand by a court of law, regardless of whatever legal bases there may be for its proceedings, would be contradictory to a principle derived from the penal legislation of nearly all civilized nations and which finds its expression in the rule "nulla poena sine lege" meaning that an act can only be the object of punishment if the punishment has been provided for by a law before the act was committed. This state of affairs seems all the more remarkable, since the rule "nulla poena sine lege" is a principle anchored in the constitution of practically all civilized nations. Thus for example, it is contained in Article 39 of the English Magna Charta of King John in 1215, in the North American Constitution of 1776 and in the declarations of the French Revolution in 1789 and 1791. This principle of "nulla poena sine lege" is not only contradictory to the assumption of a crime against peace, such as is to be defined by the Tribunal in the further development of prevailing international law as a punishable act in the opinion of some of the prosecutors but it is also especially contradictory to create now also in the further development of international law an independent state of criminality of conspiracy by judicial opinion. In this it cannot differentiate whether this conspiracy has as its aim the commitment of a crime against the peace or the commitment of a crime against the customs of war. Also, the assumption of a common plan or an agreement to commit war crimes as an independent state of criminality is not compatible with the principle of "nulla poena sine lege". Applicable are rather here also, as already rightly expounded by the French chief prosecutor, the rules pertaining to participation according to the native law of the perpetrator or according to the local law of the place of perpetration. These rules pertaining to participation will be limited under the given circumstances to the extension of the threat of punishment for cases of complicity, instigation and assistance.

Apart from his participation in the general plan or complicity, as defined in count I of the Indictment, the defendant Rudolf Hess, within the limits of his personal responsibility for war crimes and crimes against humanity, is charged by the Prosecution for the contents of only one document, i.e., document GB-268 (R-96).

This is a letter of the Reich Minister of Justice to the Reich Minister and Chief of the Reich Chancellery of 12 April 1941, which deals with the introduction of punitive laws against Poles and Jews in the incorporated Eastern territories. The defendant Rudolf Hess plays a part therein only in so far as the letter mentions among other things that the deputy of the Fuehrer had proposed the discussion of the introduction of corporal punishment. If one takes into consideration that the staff of the deputy of the Fuehrer alone comprised 500 officials and employees and that for questions of legislation, there was a special department which dealt directly with the several ministries, it seems very doubtful, whether the defendant Rudolf Hess was personally concerned with the matter at all. In this connection I refer to the affidavit of the witness Hildegard Fath, Exhibit Hess No. 16. Considering however that the measure proposed for discussion by the deputy of the Fuehrer was not introduced, the knowledge of the defendant should not matter very much. Without it being necessary to probe any deeper into the subjective facts of the case, it can be said that, as can be deduced from the penal law of all civilized countries, there is here not even an attempt. The attitude of the deputy of the Fuehrer, as shown in the letter of the Reich Minister for Justice is penally irrelevant. It may be entirely left out of consideration whether a penal law would have been violated if the measure put up for consideration had effectively found its legislative outcome in a Reich law.

Another document submitted by the Prosecution is USA Exhibit 696 (062-PS). This refers to the directives of the deputy of the Fuehrer of 13 March 1940, dealing with the instructing of the civilian population as to the proper attitude to be taken in case of landing of enemy aircraft or parachutists on German Reich territory. This is the same document for which I applied for a correction of the translation because the translation from German into English was in my opinion not correct. This document however has been included neither in the trial brief submitted by the British Prosecution nor mentioned by Colonel Griffith Jones on February 1946 when he dealt with the personal responsibility of the defendant Rudolf Hess. Considering however that this directive has been officially submitted as documentary evidence, it becomes necessary to deal with it briefly.

DEFENSE

Occasion for this directive of 13 March 1940 was the fact that the French Government officially and by radio gave instructions to the French civilian population as to how they were to conduct themselves in case of landings by German aircraft.

On the basis of those instructions of the French Government, the Commander-in-Chief of the German Luftwaffe considered himself obliged for his part to inform also on his part the German population accordingly via the official Party channels. He, therefore, issued a directive about the attitude to be adopted in the case of landings of enemy aircraft or parachutists, which was used as appendix to the mentioned order of the Fuehrer's deputy of 13 March 1940.

This directive, however, does not contain anything which is contrary to the laws and customs of warfare, as they have been expressed, for instance, in the Hague Convention on Land Warfare. This applies particularly to No. 4, which contains the instructions either to arrest or to "render" enemy parachutists "harmless". There cannot be the slightest doubt that according to the text as well as to the spirit of No. 4, this was only meant to say that enemy parachutists were to be fought and annihilated in combat if they did not surrender voluntarily and tried to prevent their arrest by using force, particularly by the use of firearms. This becomes evident from the word "or" alone. First of all their capture was to be attempted. This alone in the interest of the Intelligence Service. Only if this was made impossible by resistance should they be "rendered harmless", that means annihilated in combat.

Any other interpretation of this instruction would not only be contrary to the text and the spirit, but beyond that would also be contrary to the fact that up to the French campaign the war had been waged according to the rules which had been established, among other things, in the Hague Convention on Land Warfare and that, at any rate at that time, March 1940, the war had not yet developed into the mutual struggle of annihilation as it was to become after the outbreak of the German-Russian war. The fact that another interpretation is absolutely impossible, is also evident from the so-called "Commando Order" of the Fuehrer, dated 18 a member of an organization that the organization to which the defendant belonged was a criminal one. A prerequisite for this is, according to the Charter, that this declaration of the Tribunal is connected with an act for which the defendant is being convicted.

DEFENSE

One can understand under an act within the meaning of Article 9 of the Charter only a personally imputed and reproachable act or failure to act but on the other hand not the increased liability resulting from Article 6, paragraph 3 for the act of another. Since, however, neither in the Indictment nor in the trial brief dealing with the personal responsibility of the defendant Rudolf Hess, no act of any kind is imputed against him which contains the facts of a war crime or a crime against humanity; in this case a conviction of the defendant Hess, namely as a member of the corps of political leaders, would be synonymous with the establishment of a criminal responsibility for the acts or omissions of another. Although the defendant Hess was the highest political leader and although no action is imputed against him which contains the facts of a criminal case, he is to be convicted as a member of the reputedly criminal organization of which he was the leader; it cannot be denied that this is quite an unusual legal case.

But something else appears more important. The Defense was compelled to attack the core of the Charter, namely Article 6, as not being compatible with the generally valid principles of international law. Article 9 of the Charter is not less in contradiction with the common legal conviction of all members of the international legal community. There exists neither a legal statute in international law nor a legal statute in any national law which declares the membership in an organization as criminal without it being examined in each individual case, whether the person concerned has made himself personally guilty by his own actions or omissions. Contrary to the general principles of criminal law, as they are derived from the penal laws of all civilized countries, the Charter provides in Article 9 for a criminal responsibility and a collective liability of all members of certain organizations and institutions, and this without any consideration as to whether the individual members has incurred any guilt.

The Charter thus abandons a principle which is an integral part of any modern practice of criminal law. The rule of "no punishment without guilt" and the declaration that a certain organization is criminal, is a penalty for the members affected by it, is an essential part of the consciousness of criminal law of our time insofar as one understands by guilt the inclusion of those prerequisites of the penalty which justify the personal reprobation of the unlawful act as against the culprit. If already the fact of membership in a certain organization alone becomes the object of a sentence of criminal unworthiness, then the act which is construed as being blamable in law does not appear any more as a legally condemnable expression of the personality of the culprit. This must, in particular, apply to organizations which had hundreds of thousands, and even millions of members. Punishment without guilt has existed only amongst primitive peoples.

Liszt, who was at the same time a constructive thinker in the field of international law, says therefore appropriately:

"Just as religious teaching does not oppose the visiting of the sins of the fathers on the children and on the children's children, as in the dramas of the ancients blindly swaying fate and in the literature of today the law of heredity take the place of guilt, so does even the oldest law of all people know of no penalty without guilt."

Only in primitive law did there exist a criminal responsibility without guilt. As a matter of fact, in the history of law of all countries, the so-called criminal responsibility for the effects of crime without actual guilt was very soon replaced by the principle of responsibility for guilt only and thereby that state was reached which is alone compatible with the dignity of man. The regulation provided by Article 9 of the Charter signifies not only a deplorable contribution to the apparently irresistible trend of herding together of man, but it is moreover a return to the first beginnings of concepts of criminal law. Considering these facts it cannot be acknowledged that this provision of the Charter is in agreement with prevailing law as it is derived from the common legal convictions of all the members of the community of international law and from the general principle of criminal law of all civilized nations.

Rudolf Hess is finally accused as a member of the Reich Cabinet. In regard to his belonging to the Secret Cabinet Council, the following may be said. The presentation of evidence has shown that this Secret Cabinet Council was only created to avoid the resignation of former Reich Foreign Minister von Neurath appearing to public opinion as a breach between him and Adolf Hitler. Actually no session of this Secret Cabinet Council ever took place. The Council did not even convene in a constitutional session.

With reference to the Reich Cabinet, it is established on the basis of the results of the presentation of evidence that no cabinet meetings took place since 1937 at the latest. The tasks to be fulfilled by the Reich Cabinet, especially the legislative functions, were taken care of by the so-called circulating procedure. The presentation of evidence has shown further that from 1937 on at the latest, great political and military decisions of Adolf Hitler were taken exclusively by him alone without making them known beforehand to the members of the Reich Cabinet. The Reich Cabinet, as an institution since Hitler's appointment as Reich Chancellor, has probably not made any decisive decision on politically or militarily important questions already very long before 1937. It would be completely misleading to assume that the members of the Reich Cabinet in the National Socialist State had even an approximately similar position as it is a matter of course in a state governed by parliamentarian principles. Just as little as there was a common plan of conspiracy among the men sitting in the prisoner's dock, was there something similar within the Reich Cabinet.

DEFENSE

It was partly even so that opposing forces became apparent within the Reich Cabinet which by themselves alone would make it impossible to arrive at an agreement for a common plan, as it was expressed in the Indictment. It is sufficient here to point to the testimony of the witness Lammers and to the fact that Adolf Hitler, from whom such facts could not remain hidden, finally issued even a prohibition with the contents that the individual Reich Minister had no right to assemble any more for conferences on their own.

In this connection, something else cannot be left unmentioned. If the presentation of evidence in this trial produced anything with certainty, then it is the proof of the position of enormous political power and the unimaginable authority which Hitler had within the German governmental system. When General Jodl testified on the witness stand that there was no one who could contradict Hitler in the long run and that there could not exist anyone, then one may say that he hit the nail right on the head with a few words. This may perhaps be regrettable, but one cannot alter anything of the fact as such. If one now keeps also in view that this dominant position of Hitler became always greater during the years, then this alone should be sufficient to exclude the assumption of a common plan, as it is asserted in the Indictment.

In any case, the following must be said: The former party leaders, generals and members of the cabinet indicated before this Tribunal are accorded in this trial an importance because of Hitler's death which they actually did not have in public life of the past. While the entire political life was overshadowed in Germany during the past twelve years by the overwhelming influence of Hitler's personality, the absence of this man from the prisoners' dock affects this trial in a manner which undoubtedly must result in an entirely distorted picture of the political reality of the past twelve years.

Your Honors, I come now to the event which was to conclude the political career of the defendant Rudolf Hess—his flight to England on 10 May 1941. This enterprise is of considerable importance as relevant evidence in this trial. As is shown by the presentation of evidence, the defendant Rudolf Hess had made the decision for this flight as early as June 1940, that is, immediately after the surrender of France.

The execution of the plan was delayed for a number of reasons; especially certain technical conditions had to be fulfilled in advance. Besides, considerations of political nature played a part; namely, that such an enterprise could be accompanied by success only when political situations and especially the military position appeared favorable for the preliminary arrangements of peace negotiations, for reestablishment of peace was undoubtedly the aim which Hess pursued by his flight to England.

When the defendant Hess was led before the Duke of Hamilton on the day after his landing, he explained to the latter, "I come on a mission of humanity." During the conversation which the defendant had with Mr. Kirkpatrick of the Foreign Office on 13, 14 and 15 May, he explained to him in detail the motives which had induced him to take this extraordinary step. At the same time, he brought to his knowledge the conditions under which Hitler would be prepared to make peace.

On 9 July 1941 a conversation took place between Rudolf Hess and Lord Simon who appeared on the instructions of the British Government. I submitted the transcript of this conversation to the Tribunal as evidence and am referring to it.

It is shown by this document that the motive for this extraordinary flight was the intention to avoid further bloodshed and to create favorable conditions for the introduction of peace negotiations. During the course of this conversation, the defendant Hess handed a document to Lord Simon which stated the four conditions under which Hitler would have been prepared at that time to conclude peace with England. The conditions were:

"1. In order to prevent future wars between the Axis and England, a delimitation of spheres of interests is proposed. The sphere of interest of the Axis powers is to be Europe, and that of England its Colonial Empire.

"2. Return of the German colonies.

"3. Indemnification of German nationals who were domiciled prior to or during the war in the British Empire and who suffered damage to life or property because of measures taken by a government in the Empire, or through incidents such as pillage, riots, etc. Indemnification to British nationals on the same basis by Germany.

DEFENSE

"4. Conclusion of an armistice and peace treaty with Italy at the same time."

Rudolf Hess explained to Mr. Kirkpatrick, as well as to Lord Simon, that such were the terms on which Hitler was prepared to make peace with Great Britain immediately after the conclusion of French Campaign and that this position of Hitler had undergone no further change since completion of the campaign against France. There are no indications of any kind why this account of the defendant should not appear plausible. On the contrary, it tallies very well with any declarations which Hitler himself had made on the subject of relations between Germany and England. In addition to that, the defendants Goering and von Ribbentrop confirmed also while in the witness box that the terms which Hess disclosed to Lord Simon corresponded with Hitler's views.

The fact that the terms disclosed by Hess mention Europe as the sphere of interest of the Axis powers should not result in the conclusion that this was to mean Europe's domination by the Axis powers. The declarations made by Hess, rather, demonstrate—they are included in written notes on the conversation between him and Lord Simon—with all clarity that this was merely meant to eliminate England's interference in Continental Europe.

What legal consequences result from these facts?

In the indictment, the defendant is charged, together with the other defendants, with having cooperated in the psychological preparation of the German people for war. To the extent that the charge of psychological preparation for war is part of the common plan, it may suffice to refer to the remarks I have made in that connection.

However, if the Prosecution also wants to claim that the defendant Hess went further and personally engaged in this psychological preparation for war, proof to the contrary is at least offered, disregarding his numerous speeches in favor of peace, by this flight to England and the intentions responsible for it.

Without going into detail as regards general circumstances and the personal relations between Hitler and the defendant Hess, one thing can be said with certainty: With his flight to England the defendant Hess accomplished a deed which in view of his position in the Party and in the State, and especially because of the fact that after Goering he was to become the Fuehrer's successor, can only be called a sacrifice, a sacrifice which Hess made not only for the sake of the German people and for the resumption of peace, but for the entire world.

This sacrifice was all the greater as Hess was one of the very few whose relation to Hitler was based on intimate personal confidence. If, nevertheless, the defendant decided to stake his position in the Party and everything that meant a personal bond with Hitler for the reestablishment of peace, this must lead to the conclusion that the defendant Hess likewise saw in war the ghastly scourge of mankind and that even if this were the only reason, there results little likelihood that it was his intention to prepare the German people for war.

Your Honors, the following statements deal with the question of what legal questions are to be drawn from the flight of the defendant Hess to England and in regard to his participation in the common plan alleged by the Prosecution, particularly in view of the attitude of the defendant, to what extent penal responsibility was incurred after the flight to England. The defendant himself does not wish to have any favorable conclusions drawn for him in this trial from this flight and the intentions connected with it. He has therefore asked me to omit a part of the following statement. Nevertheless, I consider it my duty as the defense counsel to draw all the legal conclusions resulting from the flight of the defendant Hess and the intentions connected with it and to point out the facts and points of view which speak in favor of the defendant.

As I have already brought out, there is reason to assume on the basis of evidence presented, that the plan claimed by the Prosecution did not exist. In case, however, the Tribunal should judge the results of the testimony differently and in application of article 6, paragraph 3 of the Charter, should accept the existence of such a plan, directed towards the beginning of a war of aggression, it becomes necessary to examine the question of what legal consequences the flight of the defendant Rudolf Hess to England and what the aims it contemplated had on his participation in the common plan as asserted by the Prosecution.

To this the following can be said: Article 6, paragraph 3 of the Charter extends the criminal responsibility of the defendant to include all acts committed by any person while carrying out the common plan maintained by the prosecution. The Charter itself contains no provisions as to whether and under what conditions withdrawal from a common plan is possible. This does not justify the conclusion, however, that such a withdrawal should be excluded as matter of principle. That assumption is out of the question for the very reason that the Charter quite clearly does not purport to give an exhaustive ruling on all questions of substantive and procedural law. If a withdrawal is permitted in Anglo-American law as a matter of fundamental principle, this should be possible with even greater reason under the Charter. For the Charter represents a compendium of principles in which well recognized institutions of Continental European law are also given consideration. Continental European law proceeds quite unequivocally from the idea that the responsibility of the perpetrator before the penal law reaches no further than the extent to which his actions or omissions are embraced by his will. The withdrawal from the attempt, as a reason for acquittal, has therefore become an institution which can be found in almost all European codes of law. If, according to Anglo-American Law, withdrawal from the conspiracy is possible, there can be no doubt as to that possibility's existing, in principle, according to the Charter. There is all the more reason for that assumption in that it has been a practice to apply German Law in cases where the Charter fails to establish a binding rule. As regards the defendant Rudolf Hess, there should be even less reason for doubt, because the deeds charged against the defendant Rudolf Hess took place on German Reich territory. According to generally accepted principles of law, as they find expression in particular in the so-called International Penal Code of all nations, the so-called lex loci, i.e. the law of the place where the action took place, will be binding in this case.

DEFENSE

Applying these principles to the behavior of the defendant Rudolf Hess and to his flight to England of 10 May 1941, it follows, and the evidence did not in any case produce anything to the contrary, that no subsequent developments can be embraced by his will. His influence on the events within the scope of war developments as a whole ceased, at the latest, with his flight to England. It contradicts all principles of penal law as they derive from the codes of law of all civilized nations to hold someone responsible, according to principles of penal law for a happening over which he had no influence and was no longer able to exert influence and which his will did not adopt. In this connection reference should also be made to the Prosecution's contention that the defendant Hess did not undertake his flight to England in order to create thereby favorable conditions for peace negotiations. That, on the contrary, it was his intention—this is the argument of the Prosecution—thus to protect Germany's rear in its planned campaign against the Soviet Union. The documents submitted by the Prosecution do not permit establishment of that assumption. To begin with, this is contradicted by the fact that as early as June 1940, the defendant Hess had already decided on the flight; in other words, at a time when no one in Germany thought of a campaign against the Soviet Union. On the contrary, from the letter which the defendant Hess left behind and which was handed to Adolf Hitler at a time when Hess had already landed in England, it becomes perfectly clear that Hess had no knowledge of the imminent campaign against the Soviet Union. In this letter the defendant Hess did not state by a single word—and this is established by testimony of the witness Fath—that the purpose of his flight was to cover Germany's rear for the forthcoming campaign against the Soviets. In that letter Hess did not mention the Soviet Union by a single word. There is reason for the probability which almost amounts to certainty, that if Hess had had knowledge of the proposed attack and if he had intended to combine with his flight the intention which the Prosecution now claims, Hess would have dealt with that question. In this connection I should like to refer to the Exhibit USA 875, 3952-PS, which also clearly shows that Hess had no knowledge of the campaign against the Soviet Union.

But even if Hess had had definite knowledge of the proposed campaign against the Soviet Union, this would not oppose the reason for penal acquittal in regard to the later period of time. Evidence has shown that in ordering the attack against the Soviet Union, the idea of anticipating a forthcoming attack on the part of the Soviets was by no means last in Hitler's mind. I refer to the report of the American General, which I have already read.

It is immaterial within the framework of the question to be examined here, whether such an attack was actually planned by Soviet Russia and would have taken place. Statements made by the defendant Jodl while in the witness box make this appear very likely, if not even certain. The point at issue here is merely that on the basis of the reports he had before him, Hitler himself was of that opinion. Had the defendant Rudolf Hess been successful in creating in England the prerequisites for armistice and peace negotiations, the political and military situation in Europe would have been so fundamentally changed that under these modified conditions an attack by the Soviet Union on Germany would have appeared most unlikely, and the apprehensions entertained by Hitler would have become untenable. The attempt made by the defendant Hess by his flight to England would also maintain its character whereby penal acquittal for all that happened after May 10, 1941, incidental to the execution of the common plot claimed by the prosecution is in order, if it were argued that it was not the fear of an imminent Soviet attack which prompted Hitler in his decision, but economic pressure resulting from the situation in which Germany found herself as a result of failure of the invasion of England. With the end of the war, this embarrassing economic situation would also have come to an end; at least it would not have been so stringent.

DEFENSE

In conclusion it may be said: In undertaking his flight to England, and considering the intentions therein bound up with the reestablishment of peace, the defendant Hess made an attempt by which he pledged his entire personality to bring about the reestablishment of peace, an attempt which obviously sprang from the desire to avert further bloodshed at all costs. Applying principles of law such as derived from the penal codes of all nations, and especially applying German penal law, which if doubt arises will be taken as a basis for this question, the conclusion must be accepted that the defendant Hess's responsibility according to penal law will in any case be confined to deeds which took place prior to the flight to England.

Your Honors, the past war has brought misery upon the whole of mankind to an almost unimaginable extent; it has made Europe into a continent bleeding from a thousand wounds and left Germany a field of ruins. It appears certain that at the present stage of modern technique, humanity would not survive another world war. This would, as far as it is humanly possible to foresee, utterly annihilate civilization, which has already suffered to an inexpressible extent in this war. It appears therefore only too understandable when under these circumstances the endeavor should be made in the name of humanity struggling for its existence, to leave no method untried from the legal standpoint as well, to prevent the repetition of such a catastrophe.

There can, however, be no doubt that the law, whatever its strength may be in social life, can only play a subordinate part in the prevention of war. This applies with limitation as long as the community of nations is composed of sovereign states acknowledging no legal order derived from a superior authority and as long as no procedure and no organization exists capable, by virtue of its own authoritative power, of legally limiting legitimate claims of nations and bringing them into harmony with one another. As long as these conditions are not fulfilled, justice cannot be in the domain of international relations the regulating force it is in national life where it rests simply upon the power of the state which is behind it. Tempting as it may be to try to establish at least an improved and more powerful international law on the ruins left us by the past world war, such an attempt must be doomed to failure from the outset if it does not coincide with a comprehensive new order of all international relations and if international law is not simultaneously an essential component of an order which guarantees the indispensable rights of all nations and which assures in particular the satisfaction of the legitimate claims of every nation to a proportionate share of the material wealth of the world. The Charter of the International Military Tribunal is undoubtedly not part of such a general new order. It was enacted by the victorious powers for a limited duration, namely as a foundation for a criminal trial against the statesmen, military commanders and economic leaders of the defeated Axis powers. The content of the London Agreement makes the Charter of the International Military Tribunal, which constitutes an essential part of the agreement, appear as a legislative measure ad hoc by reason of the very time limit of one year stipulated by Article 7. As a matter of fact, it can scarcely remain doubtful that essential parts of the Charter are not in accordance with the general sentiment of all members of the international legal community and that they do not therefore constitute a really valid international code. Under these circumstances, a conviction for a crime against the peace and for participation in a common plan to initiate a war of aggression could only take place at variance with the prevailing international law if the Tribunal decided, violating the principle nulla poena sine lege, upon a juridical extension of international law. Great as this temptation may be, its consequences would be incalculable. Not only a principle would be violated which is derived from the principles of the penal codes of all civilized nations and constitutes in particular an integral component of international law, namely that an act can be penalized only when its penal character has been juridically specified prior to the commission of the act; but above all, in view of the fact that in the present trial the jurisdiction on counts I and II of the Indictment excludes the competence of the Tribunal so far, the violation of the principle nulla poena sine lege, combined with these special circumstances, must put the concept of law in doubt altogether.

If the way for a genuine progress of international legislation is not to be obstructed, then the actual international code which is now valid must exclusively be considered as the legal foundation for the judgment of this Tribunal.

2. FINAL PLEA by Rudolf Hess

Some of my comrades here can confirm the fact that at the beginning of the proceedings I predicted the following:

First of all, that witnesses would appear who, under oath, would make untrue statements and, at the same time, these witnesses could create an absolutely reliable impression and could enjoy the best possible reputation.

Point 2: It was to be reckoned with that the Court would receive affidavits containing untrue statements.

Point 3: The defendants would, with a few German witnesses, hear of astonishing facts.

DEFENSE

Point 4: Some of the defendants would act rather strangely: They would make shameless utterances about the Fuehrer; they would incriminate their own people; they would incriminate each other wrongly, in part; and perhaps they would even incriminate themselves, and also wrongly.

All of these predictions have come true. As far as the witnesses and affidavits are concerned, in dozens of cases the defendants, under unequivocal oath, were confronted with statements made under oath.

I should only like to mention the name Messersmith who, for instance, knew the Great Admiral at Berlin and allegedly claims to have talked with him in Berlin when the Admiral was in the Indian Ocean or in the Pacific Ocean, to my knowledge.

These predictions of mine were not only made here at the beginning of these proceedings, but rather months before the beginning of these proceedings in England. And, among other things, I made these predictions to the physician who was with me, Dr. Jones, and at the same time I set these predictions down in writing.

I should like to base my predictions at some happenings in countries outside of Germany. In this connection I should like to emphasize right here and now, that, if I mention these incidents I am convinced from the beginning that the governments involved knew nothing whatsoever of these happenings. Therefore, I do not wish to accuse these governments in any way.

In the years 1936 to 1938, in one of these countries, political proceedings or trials were taking place. These were characterized in such a way that the defendants were accusing each other in an astonishing way. In part they cited great numbers of crimes which they had committed or which they claimed to have committed. At the end, when death sentences were passed against them, they clapped their approval.

This happened quite to the astonishment of the world.

Some foreign reporters, press people, reported that one gained the impression that these defendants, through a means unknown up until that time, had been transported into an abnormal state of mind, and that was the reason for their behaviors, the reason they acted the way they did.

These incidents were recalled to my mind through a certain happening in England. It wasn't possible for me there to receive the reports on the proceedings at that time just the way I had not had them here, but here the various numbers of the newspapers "Voelkischer Beobachter" were at my disposal. When I perused these numbers—I got to the date of the 8th of March—there was a passage I found here in a report from Paris, under the date of the 7th of March 1938, it reads as follows: A large Paris newspaper "Le Jour" made revelations about the means which obviously were viewed in these trials. This is a rather mysterious means. I quote literally: this is the report: "This means affords the possibility that the victims are permitted to act and to speak according to the orders given them," and I emphasize and should like to refer to the fact that in this report of "Le Jour" it does not only say that they can be made to speak according to orders given them, but that they can be made to act according to the orders given them. The latter point is of tremendous importance in connection with the actions which had not been explained, of the personnel of the German concentration camps, including the physicians and scientists who carried through these atrocious experiments on the inmates, incidents which normal human beings, especially physicians and scientists, could not possibly carry out. But it is of equally great significance as well, when we look at the actions of these people who, without doubt, gave the orders and directions for these atrocities in the concentration camps and who gave the order to shoot prisoners of war, and lynch-mob justice and others all the way up to the Fuehrer himself.

I should like to recall your attention to the fact that the witness Field Marshal Milch testified here that he had the impression that the Fuehrer during the last years was not quite normal mentally and a series of my comrades here quite independently of each other and without having any knowledge of the testimony which I am giving now, my comrades have told me that the facial expressions and the expression of the eyes of the Fuehrer in the last years contained something cruel and even had a tendency towards madness, and I can call the comrades involved by name.

I said before that a certain incident in England caused me to think of the reports of the earlier trials. My motive was that my surroundings during my internment acted towards me in an inexplicable way, in a way which would lead me to conclude that these people somehow were acting in a state of mind which was not normal. At the same time, these people of my surroundings, the people that surrounded me were exchanged from time to time, some of them who had been exchanged, and new people who came in, some of them had strange eyes. They were glassy eyes and they had a dreamy cast. The symptoms, however, lasted but a few days and then they created a completely normal impression. They could not be differentiated from completely normal human beings. Not only I noted these strange eyes but the doctor who attended me at that time, Dr. Jones-Johnston, a British military physician, a Scotsman. In the Spring of 1942 I had a visitor, a visitor who quite obviously wanted to be nice to me and acted in a strange way towards me. This visitor had these strange eyes. Afterwards, Dr. Johnston asked me just what my opinion was of this visitor. He told me, rather I told him, that I had had the impression that for some reason or other he was not quite normal mentally and Dr. Johnston, not quite the way I expected, protested but agreed with me and asked me whether these strange eyes had not come to my attention, these eyes that had a dreamy cast. Dr. Johnston did not suspect that he, himself, when he visited me, had the same eyes.

DEFENSE

The essential point, however, is that in one of the reports which might still be found in the press archives these are the trials which took place in Moscow; in these reports, it said that the defendants had strange eyes but they had glassy and dreamy eyes. I have already stated that I am convinced that the government involved knew nothing of these happenings, therefore, it would not be in the interest of the British Government, in my statements about that which I experienced in my internment, the outside world would be excluded; for in that way the impression would arise as if, in fact, something was to be concealed or in fact the British Government had been involved or had her fingers in the pie. On the contrary, I am convinced that the Government of Churchill, as well as the present government, gave directions that I was to be treated fairly and according to the rules of the Geneva Convention. I fully realize that everything that I should like to state, dealing with the treatment which I received, on first glance will be incredible but to my good luck, at an earlier period of time, prison guards treated the inmates which, first of all, at first glance, seemed quite incredible when the first rumors of this treatment reached the world. These rumors were to the effect that quite deliberately, prisoners had been permitted to starve to death, that the sparse food which they had been given, among other things, had been mixed with ground glass; that the physicians who attended the prisoners who had been taken ill as a result of this, that the prisoners had received harmful medicants and harmful medicines and in that way the number of victims was increased that way. For a fact, all of these rumors afterwards came out to be true. It is an historical fact that a monument was erected for 26,000 or so poor women and children who, in British concentration camps, who died in British concentration camps, in the most part died of hunger. Many Englishmen, among others Lloyd George, at that time objected to these happenings in British concentration camps and protested most emphatically, and an English eyewitness, Miss Emily Hopfords, objected; however, at that time, the world stood before the riddle which could not be explained, for the same riddle which the world is confronted with today, relating to the happenings in German concentration camps. At that time, the British people stood before a riddle which could not be solved and the same riddle which confronts the German people today in connection with the happenings in German concentration camps, even the British Government itself, at that time, as far as the incidents in the South African concentration camps are concerned, the British Government found herself confronted with the riddle. The same enigma which faces today the members of the British Government and the other defendants in this trial and the other trials, as far as the incidents in German concentration camps were concerned.

Of course, it would be of the utmost importance that that which I had to say about the incident, during my own arrest and incarceration in England, that I should like to make these statements under oath; however, it was quite impossible for me to bring my defense counsel to the point where he would declare himself willing to put these questions to me and in the same way, it was impossible for me to set out another defense counsel to put these questions to me, but it is of the utmost significance that that which I am saying has been said under oath and under oath I should like to state that now I swear by God the Almighty and Omniscient, that I am saying the pure truth, that I shall leave out nothing and add nothing. I should like to ask the High Tribunal, therefore, to consider everything which I will say from now on as being under my oath and I should like to interpolate regarding my oath that I am not a church person. I had no inner-relationship to the churches, but I am a deeply religious person. I am convinced that my belief in God is stronger than that of most other peoples and there I ask the High Tribunal to evaluate these things which I am stating under oath and calling upon God as my witness.

[The President of the Tribunal here cut off this line of discourse, reminding Hess that he had previously rejected an opportunity to testify on his own behalf under oath.—Ed.]

Those statements which my defense counsel made in my name before the High Tribunal I let rest because of the sentence, and for history and for my people. That is the only thing which counts with me. I am not defending myself against my accusers, whom I deny the right to accuse me and my fellow countrymen. I will not deal with accusations which concern things which are purely German matters and therefore are of no concern to foreigners. I am not protesting against statements which are directed at attacking my honor or the honor of the German people. I consider such accusations made against me by the enemy as a sign of honor.

It was my pleasure that many years of my life were spent in working under the greatest sun which my people produced in its history of 1,000 years. Even if I could, I would not want to erase this period of time from my life. I am happy to know that I have done my duty to my country and my people, and my duty as a German, as a National Socialist, and as a loyal follower of my Fuehrer. I do not regret anything.

DEFENSE

If I were once more at the beginning, I should act once more the way I did act, even if I knew that at the end I should meet death on a bonfire. No matter what human beings might do, some day I shall be before the judgment seat of the Almighty. I shall be responsible to him, and I know he will call me innocent.

3. AFFIDAVIT of Friedrich Gaus and Secret Additional Protocol [The following documents were offered in evidence as part of Hess' case and are published here because of their unique historic interest. The former was admitted, the latter rejected by the Tribunal.—Ed.]

Instructed as to the consequences of making a false sworn statement, I declare for the purpose of submittal to the International Military Tribunal in Nurnberg under oath the following, after having been requested to do so by Attorney at Law, Dr. Alfred Seidl, and it has been pointed out to me by him that according to the rules of procedure of this Military Tribunal, I, as a witness, am in duty bound to make such an affidavit as well as verbal testimony under oath.

I. Personal Data: My name is Friedrich Gaus, born on 26 February 1881 in Mahlum, District of Ganderheim, Evangelical-Lutheran religion, Dr. of Law, until the end of the war legal advisor, at the Foreign Office in Berlin and that finally with the title of "Ambassador for special duty" [Botschafter zur besonderen Verwendung]:

II. Facts: The preliminary history and the course of the negotiations for the political treaty of the Reich Government [Reichsregierung] with the Soviet Government in the fall of 1939 about which I, as a witness, have been asked by Attorney Dr. Alfred Seidl, as far as I personally participated as legal advisor, and as far as I remember at present, may be described as follows:

1. In the early summer of 1939—it must have been in the last half of June—the Reich Minister for Foreign Affairs at that time, von Ribbentrop, asked the then Secretary of State of the Foreign Office, von Weizsaecker, and me, to come to his estate of Sonnenburg near Freienwalde on the Oder, and told us that Adolf Hitler had been considering for some time making an attempt to create more tolerable relations between Germany and the Soviet Union. For this reason, as we probably had noticed already, for some time the extremely sharp controversy of the German press against the Soviet Union has been greatly toned down. An attempt was first of all to be made to sound the Soviet government by ordinary diplomatic methods by a simple question to the point, in order to ascertain whether the latter would agree to hold a practical conversation with the Reich Government. If so, extensive political discussions could be entered on after such a conversation in order to see whether a modus vivendi for the two countries could be brought about. If I remember correctly, the first subject of conversation was to be the not very important question of the consular representation of the Soviet Union in Prague. Herr von Ribbentrop gave the order to the Secretary of State and me to draft appropriate instructions for the German ambassador in Moscow, for which he also gave a series of detailed directions. The Secretary of State and I then immediately dictated in Sonneburg an appropriate draft, which was then changed by Herr von Ribbentrop at various points, and what the latter wanted to submit to Hitler for approval. But I heard shortly afterwards—I no longer remember whether it was from the Reich Foreign Minister himself or from the Secretary of State—that the instructions dictated by us in Sonneburg, were not sent because Hitler found them “too plain-spoken.” For the time being, I did not learn anything more about the intentions of making a change in German-Russian relations.

2. At the end of June or the beginning of July, I went for a holiday to Garmisch-Partenkirchen, however, already toward the middle of July I was called by the Reich Foreign Minister to his summer residence at Fuschl in the vicinity of Salzburg for a special official reason, not connected with Russia, and had to remain until further notice at the disposal of the Reich Foreign Minister in Salzburg. After some time, Herr von Ribbentrop gave me one day in Fuschl, to my surprise, a document to read which contained the draft of a special message from the Reich Government to the Soviet government, and which ended in the proposal to begin negotiations for a political treaty. After introductory statements about the development of German-Russian relations hitherto and the contrast in the systems of the two states, the idea was emphasized that the interests of the two states lay very close to each other but did not overlap. I did not learn by whom his draft was written; judging from its style, it did not originate, or at least not alone, from the pen of the Reich Foreign Minister. The telegram to the German ambassador in Moscow to deliver the message was sent, and not long afterwards the answer to the Soviet government arrived, which did not reject in principle the idea of placing German-Russian relations on a new basis, but stated that before the start of direct negotiations, longer examination and diplomatic preparation were required. Very quickly after, a second message was sent to Moscow in which the urgent German desire for the immediate start of negotiations was expressed. I also did not learn who was the author of this second German message. In this second message, but maybe already in the first one, the early sending of the Reich Foreign Minister to Moscow was offered for the purpose of starting political discussions. After that—I believe it was on 21 August—the content of the Soviet government arrived which, as I was able to observe personally by chance, caused great joy to Hitler and his entourage. If my memory does not deceive me, the two German messages had the outward form of a direct personal communication from Hitler to Stalin, and the preparatory correspondence was limited to the two exchanges of these messages.

DEFENSE

3. On 23 August toward noon, the plane of the Reich Foreign Minister whom I had to accompany as legal advisor because of the planned treaty negotiations, arrived in Moscow. In the afternoon of the same day, the first conversation between Herr von Ribbentrop and Stalin took place in which on the German side besides the Reich Foreign Minister, only Botschaftsrat Hilger as interpreter and perhaps also ambassador Count Schulenburg participated. I myself, however, did not. The Reich Foreign Minister returned from this lengthy conversation very satisfied and said in effect that it was as good as certain that the agreements, which the Germans had endeavored to obtain, would be concluded. The continuation of the discussions, during which the documents to be signed were to be thoroughly discussed and completed, was contemplated for the later evening. I participated in this second conversation personally, also the ambassador Count Schulenburg and Botschaftsrat Hilger. On the part of the Russians, the negotiations were led by Messrs. Stalin and Molotov who were assisted by Mr. Pavlov as interpreter. Rapidly and without difficulty the text of the German-Soviet Non-Aggression Pact was agreed upon. Herr von Ribbentrop had personally added to the preamble of the draft of the treaty drawn up by me a rather extensive change concerning the friendly form of German-Russian relations, which Mr. Stalin objected to with the remark that the Soviet government, after having had "buckets of swipes" thrown over it by the National Socialist Reich Government for 6 years, could not all of a sudden come out into the open with German-Russian assurances of friendship. The passage of the preamble concerned was then deleted or changed. Besides the Non-Aggression Pact, a special secret document was discussed for a long time which, as far as I can remember, was given the designation "Secret Protocol" or "Secret Supplementary Protocol", and the contents of which amounted to a limitation of the spheres of interests of both parties in the European territories situated between the two states. I no longer know whether the expression "spheres of interests" or other expressions were used. In this document, Germany declared herself disinterested politically in Latvia, Estonia and Finland, on the other hand considered Lithuania within her sphere of interest. With reference to the political disinterest of Germany in the two Baltic countries mentioned, it came at first to a controversy insofar as the Reich Foreign Minister, by reason of his instructions, wanted a certain part of the Baltic territories exempted, which however was not agreed to by the Soviet side, especially because of the ice-free harbors located in just that part of the territory. Because of this point, which obviously had already been discussed in the first conversation, the Reich Foreign Minister applied for a telephone connection with Hitler which did not take place until during the second discussion and during which he was then authorized by Hitler in a direct conversation with him to accept the Soviet point of view. A demarcation line was established for the Polish territory; I do not remember whether it was exactly drawn on a map appended to the document, or whether it was only described in the document in words. In addition, an agreement was made with regard to Poland, the approximate contents of which were that the two powers would act in mutual agreement in the final settlement of the questions concerning that country. However, it is possible that this latter agreement concerning Poland was only made at the time of the later changes of the secret document mentioned under No. 5 below. As to the Balkan countries, it was confirmed that Germany only had economic interests there. The Non-Aggression Pact and the secret document were signed the same night at a rather advanced hour.

4. Supplementing the above statements I add to No. 3, asked about this point especially, that Herr von Ribbentrop, during a light meal while the final copies of the documents were being made, related in the course of conversation that a public speech by Stalin which he made in the spring, contained a sentence which, although Germany was not mentioned in it, was interpreted by Hitler to mean that Mr. Stalin wanted to imply that the Soviet government considered it possible and desirable to reach a better understanding with Germany as well. Mr. Stalin made a short remark in reply to that which the interpreter Pavlov translated as: "That was the intention." In this connection, Herr von Ribbentrop mentioned also that a short time ago Hitler had a motion picture shown to him which had been taken during one of the larger public celebrations in Moscow, and that he, Hitler found this film with the Soviet personalities appearing therein to be "very congenial". In addition, it deserves to be mentioned, since I have been asked about it, that during those conversations as well as during the actual negotiations, the Reich Foreign Minister regulated his words in such a manner that he let a warlike conflict of Germany with Poland appear not as a matter already finally decided on, but only as an imminent possibility. No statements which could have included the approval or encouragement for such a conflict, were made by the Soviet statesmen on this point. Rather, the Soviet representatives limited themselves in this respect simply to taking cognizance of the explanations of the German representatives.

DEFENSE

5. During the negotiations concerning the second German-Soviet political treaty, which took place about a month later, the secret document, mentioned above under No. 3, in accordance with a suggestion already previously communicated to Berlin by the Soviet government was altered to the extent that Lithuania as well, with the exception of a small "corner" bordering on East Prussia, was taken out of the German sphere of interest, but in place of that, however, the demarcation line on Polish territory was placed further to the East. In later negotiations carried on through diplomatic channels, as far as I remember during the end of 1940 or the beginning of 1941, this "Lithuanian corner" was also subsequently relinquished on the part of Germany.

Nurnberg 15 March 1946
RU/3

[s] FRIEDRICH GAUS

Secret Additional Protocol—Russo-German Non-Aggression Pact

On the occasion of the signing of the non-aggression pact between Germany and the USSR the signatory delegates of the two parties have discussed in a strictly confidential meeting the question of the limits of each party's sphere of influence in Eastern Europe. This discussion has led to the following conclusions:

1. In the event of a territorial political change in the area of the Baltic states (Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania) the northern border of Lithuania forms at the same time the demarcation of the spheres of interest of Germany and the USSR. At the same time Lithuania's right to the area of Vilna is hereby recognized by both parties.

2. In the event of a territorial political change in the territory belonging to the Polish state the spheres of interest of Germany and the USSR shall be divided roughly by the line of the rivers Narew, Vistula, and San.

The question, whether the interest of the two parties desires the maintaining of an independent Polish state and what the borders of this state would be can only be cleared up as a result of further political developments.

In any case the two governments will solve these problems by way of friendly negotiation.

3. Regarding South East Europe the USSR stresses her interest in Bessarabia. Complete political disinterest regarding this area is stated on the part of Germany.

4. This protocol will be treated by both parties as strictly secret.

MOSCOW, 23rd August 1939

For the German Government

[signed] RIBBENTROP

Plenipotentiary of the government of the USSR

[signed] V. MOLOTOV

V. JOACHIM VON RIBBENTROP

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Martin Horn, Defense Counsel

Introduction

"All great repercussions of history of the world and especially in modern Europe have at the same time been wars and revolutions."

We are standing in the midst of such a repercussion. It absolutely is not concluded as yet. To select single events in order to render judicial judgment is not only almost impossible, but entails the danger of too early a verdict. Make no mistake about it.

Here we do not judge a local crisis whose causes are limited to a certain part of Europe. We have to form a judgment about a catastrophe which touches the deepest roots of our civilization.

The prosecution has laid down strict measures in judging certain national and international events. Germany is much interested in the development of the idea of the law if its use leads to a betterment of international morals. This court has the high task, not only to decide about certain defendants and uncover the causes of the present catastrophe, but at the same time it will create norms which are expected to be adopted universally.

No law should be created that is only applied to the weak. Otherwise we should risk the danger that again all political efforts are directed toward ability for total resistance and thereby make war still more pitiless than the one about which judgment is to be rendered here.

DEFENSE

In reference to these basic thoughts I beg to present to the Tribunal the case which I represent.

H. von Ribbentrop is being considered among the conspirators as the man mainly responsible for the foreign policy and diplomatic side of an alleged conspiracy, which is supposed to have had as its goal the preparation and execution of aggressive wars. It is my task to find out from the evidence when an attack in the meaning of international law is prevalent, and in which cases aggressive wars were conducted.

The term aggression follows not only the proposed formal judicial definition by the American and British prosecutors, but has, beyond all, a basis in realities.

Only the knowledge of these premises permits the adoption of an attitude which will serve as a basis for the decision of the court. I am therefore deferring the discussion of the problematic aspects of aggression and aggressive wars till I have presented to the court the evidence for the valuation of German foreign policy and the participation in it by H. von Ribbentrop.

As the Tribunal intends to consider the matter in the light of criminal law, I shall examine especially, to what extent H. von Ribbentrop checked or promoted the decisions concerning foreign policy during the time of his political activity.

The Foreign Policy of Ribbentrop as Ambassador and Foreign Minister 1935-1938

Mr. von Ribbentrop's first step into the world of the balancing of interests and therefore of the international game of power was successfully taken when he in 1935 concluded the naval agreement between Germany and England. The circumstances under which this treaty came to life are as significant for the political problems of those years as they are characteristic for judging the personality of von Ribbentrop and his further political development. This treaty—as it is known in informed quarters—came about under exclusion of the official German diplomacy. The then German Ambassador in London, von Hoesch, and the Wilhelmstrasse were very skeptical toward this project. Both Hoesch and the Wilhelmstrasse did not believe that England was inclined to conclude such a treaty, which contradicted the terms of part V of the Versailles Treaty as well as her previous attitude displayed at the different disarmament conferences. Furthermore they did not believe that such an agreement could materialize a few weeks after the Council of the League of Nations had declared the restoration of German military sovereignty as a breach of German obligations, and England, France and Italy had met at Stresa in order to counteract this German step. They did by no means believe that a successful conclusion of such a far reaching treaty with its fundamental significance could be achieved by an outsider like Mr. von Ribbentrop.

The consequences of concluding this treaty were just as significant as far reaching. The authority of Mr. von Ribbentrop who came from the party rose in Hitler's eyes. However, the relationship between Mr. von Ribbentrop and the conservative diplomatic corps became more and more difficult. This acting ambassador (Titularbotschafter) who had managed to acquire Hitler's confidence was distrusted because his activity could not be controlled by the Foreign Office.

From the conclusion of the naval agreement on, Hitler began to see in Mr. von Ribbentrop the man who could help him in the fulfillment of his pet wish—and, we may say, of that of the German people—to bring about a general political alliance with England. The tendency to realizing these intentions originated in real as well as ideal motives.

The real motive can be condensed into short consideration, that it is the bad luck of our nation and of all of Europe that Germany and England were never able to understand each other, in spite of serious attempts of both countries during the last 50 years.

The ideal motives rested in Hitler's undisputable preference for many approved internal institutions of the empire.

Politically the naval agreement represented the first important break with the Versailles policy which was sanctioned by England with the final approval by France. And thus the first practically useful armament limitations were accomplished after many years of fruitless negotiations.

With all these factors a generally favorable political atmosphere was created at the same time. The naval agreement and its effects may also have been the reason for Hitler to appoint Herr von Ribbentrop Ambassador to the Court of St. James the following year, after the death of Hoesch.

As surprisingly fast as Herr von Ribbentrop succeeded in closing the naval agreement, as little success had he in offering a general alliance to England. Was it the fault of Herr von Ribbentrop's diplomacy or the basic difference of interests?

He who knows the Anglo-Saxon psychology knows that it is not advisable to attack these people at once with proposals and requests. If at the first moment one may especially from the German side recognize many mutual characteristics in the British, still on close contact one will note profound differences. Both root in a different soil. Their spiritual field is watered by various streams. The deeper the Germans and the British go, the greater will be the proof of the difference of their faith and their intellect. The deeper the British and the French penetrate into the nature of the other, the more mutual features they will find. Common political interests in the past 50 years have deepened these mutual features between the British and the French.

DEFENSE

In the course of modern history England always had the need for an alliance with a continental military power and searched and found satisfaction of this interest, according to the stand-point of British aims, sometimes in Vienna, sometimes in Berlin, and from the beginning of the 20th century, in Paris.

Even at the time of Herr von Ribbentrop's activity as an ambassador, England's interest did not require a deviation from this line. To this was added the principal British attitude that Great Britain did not wish to commit herself on the continent. One was able to recognize from the Thames the complications slumbering under the surface of the continent. Added to this was the fact that authoritative men in the Foreign Office thought still too much in the political terms of the end of the 19th and beginning of the 20th century and this attitude was still, now as then, governed by leaning towards France.

The voices of those who supported a closer approach toward Germany were negligible, their political power inferior to that of the opposition. To this were added the difficulties which resulted for Herr von Ribbentrop from Germany's participation in the non-interference committee, which at that time met in London in order to keep the powers out of the Spanish civil war.

The prosecution raised the question of how Herr von Ribbentrop regarded the German-British attitude on his departure as an Ambassador from London. The answer to this will best be furnished by document TC-75, which contains the view of Herr von Ribbentrop about the then prevailing situation of Germany with regard to foreign politics and the future possibility for shaping German-British relations.

Herr von Ribbentrop presupposes that Germany does not plan to be bound by the status-quo in Central Europe. He entertains the conviction that the implementation of these objectives of foreign politics will by force lead Germany and England "into different camps."

For this case he advises to strive toward a constellation of alliances, loose though at first, with powers of equal interests (Italy and Japan). Through this policy he hopes to bind England at the danger points of her Empire, still to keep open the possibility of an understanding with Germany.

Herr von Ribbentrop then turns to the question of Austria and the Sudetenland. According to his conviction then prevailing, England will not in both these questions give her consent to a modification of the status-quo but might be forced through the power of circumstances to tolerate a solution of these questions.

In view of vital French interests a change of the status-quo in the East will, however, cause England always to become an opponent of Germany in arguments of such nature. Herr von Ribbentrop upheld this interpretation not only in 1938 when this document was penned, but contrary to the assertions of the prosecution warned Hitler of this danger even before and at the outbreak of the second World War.

From this document follows also that Herr von Ribbentrop did not, as was asserted here, represent the British toward Hitler as a degenerate nation, but he says in this document quite clearly that England would be a hard and keen opponent to the pursuance of German interests in central Europe.

These interpretations of Germany's attitude in foreign politics at that time, as expressed in TC-75, evidently agreed with Hitler's idea inasmuch as in the course of the Fritsch crisis Herr von Ribbentrop took over the foreign ministry in place of the resigning Herr von Neurath.

According to Herr von Ribbentrop's statements, Hitler asked him upon entering his office, to assist him in solving four problems. These consisted in the Austrian, the Sudeten-German, the Memel as well as in the Danzig and Corridor question. As shown by the evidence this was not a secretive understanding which was arrived at by two statesmen.

The Party program contains, in point 3, the demand for revision of the peace treaties of 1919. In a number of speeches Hitler repeatedly pointed to the necessity of fulfilling these German demands. Reich Marshal Goering testified here that, in November 1937, he explained to Lord Halifax the necessity of solving these questions and said that they are an integral part of German foreign politics. These goals he also presented openly to the French Minister Bonnet. Herr von Ribbentrop therefore gave his principal support to goals, which were known, and which resulted, of necessity from the dynamics, at that time prevailing in central Europe on account of the recuperation of the Reich.

How far the freedom or restriction of action of Herr von Ribbentrop as a Minister reached in the solution of these questions, I shall explain in connection with my remarks on the participation in the conspiracy of which the defendant is accused. Only that much may be said here, that as was proven by evidence, with the dismissal of Freiherr von Neurath the concentration in Hitler's hands of the decisive authority also in the field of foreign politics had found its conclusion. Herr von Neurath was the last Foreign Minister who, at first as a Foreign Minister had managed to maintain a decisive influence on foreign politics under the regime of National Socialism, which in time with the increasing power of the regime, he had to surrender to Hitler's striving totality, more and more.

DEFENSE

In Herr von Ribbentrop, a man now became Foreign Minister whom Hitler had elected after his own taste.

Besides, of all forms of state law and jurisdiction, government without a doubt has a strong component in the purely personal relations among the rulers. Seen from this point of view it is necessary for the understanding of certain actions and history to look into the relations between Hitler and Herr von Ribbentrop.

Herr von Ribbentrop as a well-to-do man from the nationalistic camp, saw in Hitler and in his party, efforts which corresponded with his own ideas and feelings. Herr von Ribbentrop's ideas about the foreign countries visited by him aroused Hitler's interest. Hitler's personality and political convictions formed in Herr von Ribbentrop a form of loyalty, the final explanation of which one can perhaps find in the effects of the power of suggestion and hypnosis. We do not wish to conceal that not only Herr von Ribbentrop but also an enormous number of people on this side as well as on the other side of the border fell victim to this power.

What is in this court-room to be conceived in the forms of law, will find its final explanation only from the point of view of the effect on the masses and in the psychology, to say nothing of the pathological form of these phenomena. This task may be left to the sciences concerned.

As an attorney—and only as such do I have to evaluate the results of the evidence—I may, with the permission of the Tribunal, present, after clarifying these facts, the role of Herr von Ribbentrop within the alleged conspiracy for the plotting of wars and acts of aggression under breach of contracts.

Ribbentrop's part in the annexation of Austria

Herr von Ribbentrop had not yet been Foreign Minister for 10 days when he was called upon by Hitler to participate in the conference with the Austrian Bundeskanzler and his Foreign Minister on 12 and 13 February 1938 in Berchtesgaden. Evidence presented in court has confirmed the fact, that questions especially involving Austria were exclusively within the domain of Hitler. The then Ambassador von Papen reported directly to the Head of the State. Herr von Ribbentrop had no influence whatever upon activities of the party in Austria as well as in the southeastern territory. My client alleges to have been informed only rarely and not officially about its activities there.

The former Austrian Foreign Minister, Dr. Guido Schmidt, deposed that Herr v. Ribbentrop did not participate in the decisive conference between Hitler and Schuschnigg. During the rest of the conference he did not conduct himself in the Hitlerian style and created the impression of not being informed on the subject, which was probably due to his late activity in London and his being appointed Foreign Minister only recently. From this unobjectionable conduct of v. Ribbentrop the prosecution deducted that Hitler and Ribbentrop had agreed upon a premeditated maneuver. It sees in H.v. Ribbentrop's conduct that, which is typically characterised as "double talk". Must not the undisputable data and facts as regards H.v. Ribbentrop, the impression of the witness Schmidt hence resulting, my portrayal of Ribbentrop's position as minister, his lack of information on the long planned preparations with respect to Norway and Denmark and other undeniably proofed facts raise the question whether H.v. Ribbentrop participated in decisions of foreign policy to a far lesser degree as is contended by the prosecution?

The hearing of evidence proves conclusively that, at least as far as Austria's annexation is concerned, he played no important part. For him Austria remained a country mutilated by "St. Germain", a country which, according to healthy principles could hardly exist and which once shared a common destiny in history with Greater Germany. The National Socialists were not the first to awaken Austria to the thought of a union with Germany. This thought had ripened, since in the German element of the Habsburg Monarchy the revolution of 1848 aimed at a democratic and Greater Germany. It was fought for by the Social-Democrats for ideological and realistic reasons after the downfall of this monarchy. It was this very democracy that looked at the Weimar state as their spiritual offspring. The economic distress resulting from the destruction of the Danube area as an economic entity nurtured the thought of a union with the Reich which was economically better off. The National Socialists were in a position to utilize this fostering soil. In any event, presuppositions for a union with Germany existed, when assistance of Austria by Italy ceased, through closer relations of the former towards Germany by reason of the Abyssinian conflict. Further reasons that contributed to and justified the union will be specifically stated by my colleague Dr. Steinbauer.

DEFENSE

Reichsmarshal Goering testified that, as interpreted in the narrow sense of the law of reunion of 13 March 1938, which was signed also by H.v. Ribbentrop, the union did not even correspond with the intentions of Hitler but was arrived at by Goering himself.

As further violation of treaties the prosecution denotes the violation of Article 80 of the Treaty of Versailles and the corresponding articles of the Treaty of St. Germain as well as the violation of the treaty between Austria and Germany of 11 July 1936.

In justification of these violations one could point out that the provisions concerned constitute a violation of the basic right of self-determination. The outcome of the vote after the annexation at any rate clearly confirms the Austrian attitude at that time.

The clausula rebus sic stantibus could be considered as a further justification of violation. One could refer to the statement of Under Secretary Butler in the House of Commons who, upon questioning after the union asserted that England had given no special guarantee for the independence of Austria as undertaken in the Treaty of St. Germain.

These judicial evaluations would hardly do justice to the facts. Positive law always lags behind the ideal state of justice. Such is the case not only in laws governing internal relations but also in international law.

Events show that, if in the drawing up of treaties no provisions are contained for change of circumstances, history shatters them by revolution in order to rebuild them upon a new base.

Whether participation in such events can be legally evaluated is questionable. To general principles of the adaptability of justice to the might of facts I shall refer later on.

Ribbentrop's part in the Czechoslovakian Crisis

An Englishman asserted:

"We have to face the stubborn fact that Central Europe is populated by an almost solid block of 80 million people who are highly gifted, highly organized and who are conscious of these achievements in the highest degree. The majority of these people have the strong and evidently unextinguishable desire to be united in one state".

This artificially split up block created by the Peace Treaty of 1919 was put in motion by the annexation of Austria and the racial theories of National Socialism. No attentive observer could fail to notice the effect of the annexation upon the neighboring states.

It is not my intention to take up the time of the Tribunal with the particulars of the then proceeding efforts by the various groups of Germans in the neighboring states for incorporation into the Reich. The facts which now have become history are only too well known. My task here is to examine whether these events are the results of a premeditated plan of an individual person or of a group of persons or whether a long and artificially stored up force assisted in accomplishing the objectives which were assigned to H.v.Ribbentrop by Hitler at the time of his appointment.

The Anschluss of Austria was the signal for the Sudeten German Party to force the Anschluss now on their part too. Herr von Ribbentrop had been accused by the prosecution that in his capacity as Foreign Minister he engaged in the creating of difficulties under the Sudeten-German Henlein. It further accuses him of having induced the Sudeten-German Party to increase their demands step by step instead of entering the Czechoslovak government, and in that way of having prevented a solution of the whole problem without having made the German Government appear as peace maker.

The document 3060-PS submitted by the prosecution shows just the contrary. It is true that H. v.Ribbentrop knew that the Anschluss efforts of the Sudeten-Germans received help from the party. But he had no influence on this party policy nor any thorough knowledge of it. With regard to the difficulties which had arisen with the Czech Government caused by the separation efforts of the Sudeten Germans and their partly uncontrollable policy, H. v.Ribbentrop found it necessary to take care of the realization of the Sudeten German aims within the limits of a responsible policy.

There was at first a short calming down of the foreign situation through the Munich Pact. It was complicated again only through the visit of Hacha in Berlin and the concomitant events, a step of Hitler's which was in this far-reaching form completely surprising to H.v.Ribbentrop.

As Reichsmarshal Goering has testified, Hitler, after the solution of Slovakia in spite of all warnings, decided upon setting up the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. On the basis of the available material it might be difficult to ascertain the final reasons for Hitler's step. According to the testimony of the defendant Goering they sprang from Hitler's lasting fear that through an alliance of the Czech officer corps with Russia the situation in the South Eastern Territory could be complicated again. This and the resulting strategical and historical reasons might have induced Hitler to this step of 13 March 1939, which came as a surprise also to H. v. Ribbentrop.

DEFENSE

This decision which is only understandable by Hitler's inclination for surprising decisions, brought a complete change of the German foreign policy.

Herr v. Ribbentrop had at that time with a warning demonstrated to Hitler the reaction of the Western powers, especially of England, which had to be expected as a result of this step.

Ribbentrop's role in the Polish crisis

The results manifested themselves immediately in the Danzig and Corridor question which had been discussed since October 1938. Whereas up to that time the Poles, because of the German policy since 1934 and the return of the Olsa territory, did not refuse discussions about this problem, the reaction to the setting up of the protectorate could be seen immediately at the end of March. England regarded the establishing of the protectorate as a violation of the Munich Pact and began consultations with a number of countries. At the same time Minister Beck, instead of coming once more to Berlin, went to London and returned from there with the assurance that England would resist any change of the status-quo in the East. This declaration was also given in the House of Commons after previous consultation with the French Government.

On 26 March 1939 the Polish Ambassador Lipske called at the Wilhelmstrasse and stated to Herr v. Ribbentrop that any continuation of the revision policy towards Poland—especially as they are concerned with a return of Danzig to the Reich, would mean war.

This made the Polish question into a European one. H. v. Ribbentrop told the Polish Ambassador at that time that Germany could not be satisfied with this decision. Only a clear return of Danzig and an extra-territorial connection with East Prussia could bring a final solution.

I submitted to the Tribunal in the form of documentary evidence a review of the now beginning course of the Polish crisis: I can therefore assume that the actual course of events is known, also inasmuch as they are connected with the annexation of the Memelland which was returned to the Reich through an agreement with Lithuania.

In order not to take up the time of the Tribunal unnecessarily,

I confine myself to the pointing to the facts which are apt to clear the role of H. v. Ribbentrop.

The prosecution accuses H. v. Ribbentrop that during the Sudeten crisis and the setting up of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, he had lulled Poland by pretending friendly feelings. May I, in contradiction of this assertion, point out that the relations between Germany and Poland since the agreement of 1934 were good and even friendly, and that this attitude became of course even more favorable through the fact that Poland owed the acquisition of the Olsa territory to the German Foreign policy.

She had therefore every reason to harbor friendly feelings towards Germany without the necessity of a deceitful conduct on the part of H. v. Ribbentrop. As the evidence has shown H. v. Ribbentrop continued this friendly policy towards Poland even after the dissolution of Czechoslovakia as there was no reason to deviate from this attitude.

The prosecution further accuses H. v. Ribbentrop of having known that Hitler had already in spring 1939 been resolved to start a war against Poland and that Danzig served only as pretext for this conflict. It deduces this from the documents USA 27 and USA 30 (L-79, 1014-PS). They deal with the well-known speeches by Hitler on 23 May and 22 August 1939.

May I point out in the first place that H. v. Ribbentrop was not present at these conferences which were only for military personnel.

A number of key documents have been discussed in detail here. I only wish to name the best known such as the Hossbach document, the two Schmundt files and the aforementioned speeches. Quite a number of interpretations of these documents have been the subject of the testimony. People who knew Hitler stated that they were used to extravagant ideas from him in the form of sometimes repeating and surprising speeches and that in consideration of his peculiarities they did not take them seriously.

One can present in contrast to these documents quite a number of speeches in which Hitler asserted the contrary. One can object to that by saying that Hitler had always connected a certain purpose with his utterances. That is certainly true. But it is also true that even the few key documents, submitted as proof of the aggressive war, contain so many contradictions with regard to the aggressive intentions deduced from them that perhaps a critic judging retrospectively could recognize such intentions in accordance with the strict regulation for secrecy; the content of these documents were for that matter only known to those who took part in the conference. This makes it clear why Herr v. Ribbentrop learned to know about them only here in the courtroom.

DEFENSE

The instructions concerning foreign policies which Hitler gave him at that time dealt solely with the re-incorporation (Rueckgliederung) of Danzig and the establishment of an extra-territorial road through the Corridor, in order to have a direct land-route to East Prussia. As the court may remember, the desirability of realizing these aims had already been mentioned by Hitler when he appointed Herr von Ribbentrop as Foreign Minister. This demand was historically just as justified, as the solution of the preceding incorporation of areas which were inhabited by Germans became inevitable in this case. The status of the purely German city of Danzig, which had been determined by the Treaty of Versailles in the course of the erection of a Polish State, had always been the cause of frictions between Germany and Poland. Poland had effected this solution at Versailles on the basis that it needed an outlet to the sea. For the same reason, yet against all ethnological needs, the Corridor was established. Already Clemenceau in his memorandum pointed to this artificial creation as a source of danger, especially due to the fact that the people united in this area had been separated through long years of bitter enmity. It was not difficult to foresee that, as result of this fact, the League of Nations and the International Court at The Hague would be occupied with other than current complaints against violations of the Agreement for Minorities.

The same cause gave rise to confiscation of German real estate on the largest scale up to 1 million hectar and the expulsion of far more than 1 million Germans in the course of 20 years. Not without reason had Lord d'Abernon spoken of the Danzig-Corridor-problem as of the "powder-barrel of Europe." If then efforts were made to solve this question, recognizing the Polish right for maintaining an outlet to the sea, such efforts were justified from the standpoint of history and common sense.

The evidence showed no basis whatever for the assumption that this question served as a pretense only, of which Herr v. Ribbentrop must have been aware. No evidence has been produced that Herr v. Ribbentrop was acquainted with Hitler's aims, which far exceeded these demands. Just as little has it been proved that Herr v. Ribbentrop before 1 September 1939—as has also been asserted by the prosecution—did all he possibly could to avoid peace with Poland, although he knew that a war with Poland would draw Great Britain and France into the conflict. The prosecution bases this statement on document TC-73. This involves a report of Lipski, the Polish Ambassador in Berlin, to his Foreign Minister. The document contains nothing whatsoever to substantiate this assertion.

Moreover, I do not believe, that according to the result of the evidence, Lipski can be counted as classical witness. May I recall that it was Lipski who, during the decisive stage of negotiations before the outbreak of the war, remarked that he had not the least cause to be interested in notes or propositions from the German side. After a period of 5½ years as ambassador in Germany, he was very well acquainted with conditions there. He was convinced that in case of war unrest would break out in Germany, and that the Polish Army would march into Berlin victoriously.

According to the testimony of the witness Dahlerus it was exactly Lipski, who during the decisive discussion at the Polish Embassy created the impression with the Swede, that Poland was sabotaging every possibility for negotiations.

Further results of the evidence also speak against the above allegations of the prosecution. So for instance the fact that Herr v. Ribbentrop, knowing that the Polish-English Guarantee-Pact had been signed, by his intervention with Hitler caused the latter to recall the marching-orders for the Armed Forces, because, according to his conception, a conflict with Poland would also involve the Western Powers. This conception is identical with the conclusions, Herr von Ribbentrop drew from his opinion of the European situation, voiced in the already mentioned document TC-75.

Ambassador Schmidt has testified here, that it was Herr v. Ribbentrop who on 25 August 1939, after the Hitler-Henderson meeting, sent him to Sir N. Henderson with the verbal communique presented as TC-72/69 in which the contents of Hitler's propositions were drawn up. With it Herr v. Ribbentrop combined the urgent request, at once and in person, to warmly recommend to the British Government Hitler's proposition. According to the English Blue Book, Sir N. Henderson could not refrain from calling these proposals exceptionally sensible and sincere. They did not represent the usual Hitler-proposals, but "proposals of the League of Nations."

Anyone studying the negotiations of the succeeding fateful days cannot deny that everything was done on the German side to get at least negotiations on a workable basis under way. The opposite side would not have it thus, because the decision had been made to take action this time. The good services of England ended with the breaking off of all mediation without having been able to bring Poland to the table of negotiations.

DEFENSE

Herr v. Ribbentrop has been blamed for having practically defeated the purpose of the last decisive discussion with the British Ambassador Henderson by having read the German proposals to Poland so fast, contrary to all diplomatic custom and international courtesy, that Sir N. Henderson could not understand them, and, hence, could not pass them on. The interpreter for Ambassador Schmidt was present at this decisive discussion. He has testified here under oath that this statement is not true. One may consider Hitler's order to acquaint Sir N. Henderson only with the substance of the memorandum as unwise. The fact is that not only did Herr von Ribbentrop read the entire contents at a normal speed to the British Ambassador, but he also, by having the interpreter present, made it possible for Sir N. Henderson to become familiar with the entire contents and, moreover, to have explanations given on it. Besides, upon the initiative of Reichsmarshal Goering, it was transmitted to the British Embassy during the same night by dictation to the Counsellor of the Embassy Forbs. Thus the British Government should have been able to render the good services offered for opening negotiations based on positive propositions.

By reason of these facts here deposed, one must rightly doubt the allegation to be true, that the defendant had done everything, to avoid peace with Poland.

The Outbreak and Extension of the Second World-War Causes of War

At the beginning of my defense speech I stressed that legal considerations concerning aggressive war are not possible without knowledge of the presuppositions leading to an armed conflict. Before I proceed to the legal aspects of the conflict with Poland, may I make some additional statements concerning the causes that led to the war.

The period between two world wars is characterized by the mutual reactions of those powers which were satisfied and those which were dissatisfied. It seems to be an inevitable law that, after great war shocks, the victorious states tend as far as possible towards the reestablishment of the pre-war status and pre-war mentality, whereas the conquered are forced to find a way out of the consequences of their defeat by new means and methods. That way the Holy Alliance came about after the Napoleonic wars, and under Metternich's leadership, using the legitimacy as an authorization, it tried to ignore the effects of the French Revolution.

What the Holy Alliance did not achieve the League of Nations did not succeed in either. Created in an atmosphere of fervent belief in human progress, it was quickly transformed into a tool of the saturated states. Every effort to "reinforce" the League of Nations meant a new bulwark for maintaining the status quo. Under the elegant diction of juridical proceedings power-politics continued. Besides, the obsession by the idea of "sécurité" soon deprived the newly created body of any breadth of freshness and life. In this fashion naturally a solution of the problems created by the end of the first world-war could never be founded. In international relations the interests of conservative powers content with the status quo and those of the revolutionary powers trying to do away with it were found to be in growing conflict. It could only be a question of time, when under these circumstances the political initiative would pass to the discontented powers. The formation of this front depended exclusively on the force of the revolutionary spirit, which crystallized in opposition to political complacency and longing for the past. On this fostering-soil grew the doctrines of National Socialism, Fascism, and Bolshevism obscure in many parts of their programs, elastic and incoherent in others. Their power of propaganda was based not so much on their programs but on the fact that they admittedly brought something new and that they did not exhort their followers to worship a political ideal that had failed in the past.

The economical crises of the post-war period, the controversies about reparations and the occupation of the Ruhr, the fact that the democratic governments were not capable of attaining anything for their peoples in need from the other democracies unavoidably led to test the doctrines which had not been tried out yet. The practical results of this revolution, as we experienced them in Germany after 1933, could, aside of the social program, only consist in abolishing the peace settlements of 1919, which were a classical example of the failure in understanding of the revolutionary character of a world crisis. These tasks were for this revolution no. juridical questions but doctrines, exactly as it had already for a long time become a doctrine for the saturated states to keep up the status quo at all costs eventually at the costs of a new world war.

Only he who does not shut his eyes before these facts can judge the political crises of the past decade.

Every revolution has but two possibilities, either it meets so little resistance that eventually conservative tendencies develop and an alloy with the old order is formed, or the antagonistic forces are so strong that finally the revolution breaks due to its having oversharpened its own means and methods.

DEFENSE

National Socialism went the second way which began so unbloody and, in parts, with a remarkable bias towards tradition. But it too could not escape the laws, inherent in history. The aims were too high for one generation, the revolutionary essence too strong. The successes in the beginning were stupefying. But they also caused a lack of criticism as to the methods and aims.

It would most probably have been achieved to all larger German groups in the Central European space, if, at the end—I mean in setting up the protectorate Bohemia and Moravia and in following up the Danzig corridor question—revolutionary speed and methods had not been carried to excess as a result of previous successes. No soberly judging person will deny the right to gain a solution in the Danzig corridor question, delicate as it was.

The prosecution wants it that, in reality, Danzig was but a pretext. Seen from the state of affairs in 1939 this cannot be proved. But it is sure that also the opposed party was concerned with other things but the keeping up of the status quo in the East. National Socialism, and with it in its newly gained strength the German Reich, had become such a danger in the eyes of the others, that after Prague one was determined to make any further German enterprise a “test case”, wherever it should happen.

I have already said that the revolutionary process in Central Europe was caused in the first place by economical conditions of “Versailles”. At Versailles on Germany was imposed a treaty of peace, of which it was well known, that the conquered could not comply with its economical provisions. Many things have been said here about the slogan “Lebensraum”.. I am convinced that this word would never have become a political program, if after the first World-War one would have given Germany the possibility to link up with the world markets instead of strangling her economically. By systematically cutting her off from all places where raw-products occurred in the world—all this because for “sécurité” reasons—one of course fed the tendency towards autarchy, the inevitable way out from the barring from the world markets and, at the same time, one allowed, as the economical situation became more aggravated, the cry for Lebensraum to fall on fertile soil.

So Stalin is right, when he says: “It would be erroneous to believe that the second World War came about in a haphazard way or resulted from faults of one or the other of the statesmen, though such faults were made without doubt. In reality the war resulted inevitably from the development of international economical and political forces based on modern monopolistic capitalism." (Stalin's speech on the eve of the Soviet elections in February 1946.)

Remarks Concerning World War II considered from the point of view of Illegal Attack.

Professor Jahrreiss has already thoroughly proved in his basic arguments concerning the legal and the actual signification of the Kellogg agreement that the defense cannot attach to this war prevention program the meaning given to it by the prosecution.¹

It is true that war has already been previously declared an international crime, especially at the 8th League of Nations assembly of 1927; however, at preliminary conversations—and the fact has been proved by documents already submitted to the Court—it was agreed upon that this declaration does not make war a crime in any legal sense, but is rather the expression of a wish to prevent, for the future, international catastrophes on a World War I scale. Moreover, neither the US nor the USSR participated in the League of Nations resolution of 1927.

Any further projects of outlawry of war in the period between World Wars I and II remained mere projects—and the British prosecutor had to acknowledge this in the course of his significant argumentation—because practical politics could not follow these moral postulates.

All these experiments—and they are by no means few—clearly show that the problem of definition lies in the difficulty of condensing a political event, depending upon a host of components, into a juridical concept susceptible of covering any of the many-shaped cases occurring in fact. The failure to formulate a definition which could be used in international law has led to this, that instead of working out universal characteristics to be used in every single case, the designation of the aggressor has been left to the decision of an organ superior to the contending parties. In such a way, the question of defining the aggressor became the question, "quis judicavit", i. e., "who designates the aggressor." From this decision follows a new difficulty, "what is to be done against the aggressor?"

Previous to the attempt of settling in a general way the concept of aggression and the sanctions against the aggressor, political alliances determined the obligations of the parties to wage war. In order to improve this unsatisfactory, anarchic situation, the United States, under Secretary of State Bryan, took the initiative, in a series of separate treaties, to agree upon delays of respite, which were meant to postpone an outbreak of hostilities and to allow the passions to cool down.

¹ Mr. Justice Jackson tries, in this connection, to refer to article 4 of the Weimar constitution of 1919. According to this article, universally acknowledged rules of international law are binding parts of German Reich law. With regard to the differences in juridical interpretation by the great powers of the Kellogg pact its interpretation by the prosecution cannot be considered as German Reich law. (Cf. Reich Supreme Court decisions in civil cases, vol.103, p.276. Anschuetz: "The Constitution of the German Reich", 10th edition, p.58,etc.)

DEFENSE

The statutes of the League of Nations took up this point of view, but went one decisive step further by determining a procedure for establishing by League organs the permissibility or nonpermissibility of war. The decision purported whether the war was permitted or not by the statute. The aim of this settled procedure was to hit the disturber of international order, who was not necessarily identical with the aggressor. The state which went to war in accordance with the resolutions of the League of Nations organs behaved in a lawful way, even when undertaking preliminary hostilities, amounting to an aggression in the military sense.

It was therefore apparent that the discrimination between aggressor and attacked was not sufficient to secure an equitable settlement of international relations.

Although these statutory definitions and the proceedings based thereon pointed out that the antinomies (lawful—unlawful, permitted—prohibited, aggressor—attacked) did not apply, it was still being tried to brand the transgressor of international order through the concept of the aggressor. As the material decision failed owing to the difficulties just mentioned, it was tried to make out of the indeterminable juridical concept a political decision of the League of Nation organs qualified for maintaining international order. Such was the case in the draft of a mutual assistance agreement elaborated in the year 1923 by order of the League of Nations assembly. The Geneva protocol, which was meant to supplement the statute inadequacies concerning the question of conflict settlement, also transferred to the League of Nations council the decision of determining who had violated the agreement and was, therefore, the aggressor.

All other attempts for outlawing war and settling conflicts mentioned by the British chief prosecutor have remained drafts, excepting the Kellogg Pact.

It can probably put down to this fact that the idea of a juridical definition of the aggressor was once more taken up at the disarmament conference. In this way the definition was established in the year 1933 by the committee for security questions, guided by the Greek Politis, of the general disarmament conference committee. Owing to the failure of this conference, the definition was made the object, in the same year, of a series of separate treaties at the London conference. The only great power participating was the Soviet Union, which had taken the initiative of the definition at the disarmament conference. This definition has also been adopted by the United States chief prosecutor, who has based thereon the indictment for a crime against peace before this tribunal. This definition is no more than a proposal of the prosecution within the limits of the statute, which does not circumscribe the concept of a war of aggression. It must be emphasized that Mr. Justice Jackson cannot invoke in this matter any universally acknowledged principle of international law.

The report of the 1933 commission did not become the object of a general treaty, as projected, but was merely agreed upon between a number of individual parties in agreements binding only for the concerned. As a matter of fact the only agreements were those between the Soviet Union and a number of states around it. No other great power accepted the definition. In particular, Great Britain kept aloof, notwithstanding the fact that the separate agreements mentioned were actually signed in London. At least the participation of the great powers would have been required for the constitution of an international law principle of such far-reaching importance for the reorganization of international relations.

Besides this juridical way of treatment the utterances of British and American chief prosecutors show that also as far as facts are concerned the proposition does not give much satisfaction. In the important question of point 4 of the definition, the British differs from the American accusation. The old conflict of interests between mare liberum and mare clausum has led the prosecution to Sir Hartley Shawcross not mentioning the naval blockade of the coasts and parts of a state as aggressive action.

The definition of 1933 may offer valuable characteristics for establishing the aggressor, but one does not get around the fact that a formal juridical definition shows the impossibility of doing justice to all actual political cases.

At the experiment to set down new regulations for creating order in the world in the Charter of the United Nations one returned, evidently having recognized this truth, to the idea of a decision by an international institution, without wanting to squeeze its judgment in to the bed of Procrustes of a rigid definition. The Charter of Peace of San Francisco says, in chapter VII, Article 39: "The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security."

DEFENSE

In 1939 there was neither a recognized definition of the aggressor nor an institution authorized to designate the aggressor.

The League of Nations as institution for the settlement of conflicts had completely failed. This was expressed outwardly already by the part that three great powers had left it. How little the League of Nations Torsos was taken notice of in international life was shown by the attitude of the Soviet Union in the Finnish question. It did not take into consideration in any way the decision of the League of Nations but followed in its dealings with Finland its own interests.

If now after these statements I make a proposal to the court of what should be understood by the word "attack" in article 6a of the Charter, this qualification cannot link up with a definition recognized in international law. We, therefore, must start off from the suppositions which the practices of states and the traditions of diplomacy are wont to connect with it.

According to the conception existing in 1939, the outbreak of war, in whatever way it happened, was not valued juridically. The Kellogg Pact and the negotiations following it have not been able to abolish this fact which was the result of a development of centuries. This is to be deeply regretted but one cannot go past reality. That this opinion is in accordance with the conception of international law of the main participating powers that had signed the statute when war broke out follows from the fact that men of international reputation in the field of international law were of the opinion that, should the Kellogg Pact and the system of collective security fail, the traditional legal conception as to war was still valid. (Oppenheim-Lauterpacht, International Law, 5th Edition page 154.)

Was Herr von Ribbentrop obliged to have the opinion in 1939 that his acts, measured by the tradition of diplomatic technique, would be valued as crimes punishable by international law?

I have already pointed out that generally and therefore also by Herr von Ribbentrop the then existing frontier line in the East was considered not to be tenable in the long run and was, therefore, considered to be needing some adjustment.

The Peace Conference (1919) created problems, by satisfying the Polish demands when this state was newly created, which could not be solved by international cooperation in the time during the two world wars.

These frontiers could never be guaranteed inside a system of European pacts. In the Locarno treaties a guarantee for the Eastern frontier created by Versailles could not be reached because of the opposing interests of the participating powers, whereas for the Western frontiers it was arrived at. All that was achieved after endless efforts were arbitration treaties, connected to the Locarno system, between Germany and Poland and Germany and Czecho-Slovakia. They did not contain any guarantees for frontiers but only methods for settling litigations. I shall deal with them when I come to the various violations of treaties which Herr v. Ribbentrop is blamed for.

After Hitler had also expressed his distrust towards collective security by leaving the Disarmament Conference and the League of Nations, he went over to the system of bilateral treaties. At the preparatory negotiations to the agreements between Poland and Germany of 1934 it was clearly stated, that between the two states a solution of the problems should be found in the spirit of the treaty. We will not suppress here that for this settlement but peaceful means were considered and a 10-year non-aggression pact was concluded. Whether Hitler believed honestly in the possibility of solving this problem or hoped to change the untenable situation in the East by means of evolution is of no importance for the forming of an opinion on Herr v. Ribbentrop's behavior. He did not take any initiative in this step, but found this agreement as an existing political and juridical fact.

The experience of settling international interests teaches that agreements are durable only when corresponding to political realities. If that is not the case, the force of facts oversteps of itself the original intention of the contracting parties. A great statesman of the 19th century has expressed this truth by saying, "The element of political interest is an indispensable lining of written treaties." Thus, the Eastern question was not removed by the agreement of 1934, but continued to burden international relations. As shown by the evidence, it became more and more clear in the course of political evolution that sooner or later solutions of some kind had to be attempted. Both the statute of the Free City of Danzig, which was in contradiction with ethnological, cultural, and economical facts, and the isolation of Eastern Prussia through the creation of a corridor had brought about causes for conflict, which a number of statesmen feared as far back as when at Versailles.

Taking into consideration such a state of things, the English guarantee declaration to Poland of March 21, 1939, enlarged on August 25, 1939, into the mutual aid agreement, was susceptible, in case of the appearance of a possibility of conflict with this country, of making the Poles averse, from the first, to a sensible revision even within a moderate frame. This guarantee declaration shows once more how much Great Britain drew conclusions, taking a sensible political view, out of the decline of the collective security system, and how small a confidence it had in the practical results of the moral condemnation of war through the Kellogg Pact.

DEFENSE

Mr. v. Ribbentrop had, therefore, to draw the conclusion out of the behavior of Great Britain, that the attitude of the Polish Government from which Germany was entitled to expect some concession was bound to become rigidly inflexible. The development during the following months proved this provision to be right. The stepping-in of the Soviet Union into the conflict demonstrates in particular that the coming danger would take place within the compass of the usual principles of politics and the carrying through of the interests of one's own country. The Soviet Union too had, on her side, left the ground of the collective security system. She looked at the approaching conflict from the viewpoint of Russian interests exclusively. As things were, Mr. v. Ribbentrop took pains to, at least, localize the threatening conflict, if it could not be avoided. He could rightly hope to succeed in this endeavor, as both powers primarily interested in Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union and Germany, concluded the non-aggression and friendship agreement previous to the outbreak of armed hostilities. At the same time, they came to terms by way of a secret agreement concerning the future fate of the territory of Poland and the Baltic countries. Nevertheless, the machinery of the assistance agreements was released and thereby the local Eastern European conflict became a world conflagration.

If one wants to apply a juridical standard to these facts, one cannot do so without taking into consideration the Soviet Union from the point of view of participation.

The extension of the war and its causes

The conflict in Eastern Europe grew, through the participation of Great Britain and France, into a European one, necessarily followed by the universal conflict. The entry in the war of the powers mentioned took place according to the forms provided by the 3rd Hague Convention concerning opening of hostilities, i.e., an ultimatum with conditional declaration of war.

At the session of March 19, 1946, Mr. Justice Jackson interpreting the indictment has stressed the point that the extension of the war brought about by the Western powers did not constitute a punishable aggression on the side of Germany. This interpretation is in keeping with his general argumentation concerning the notion of aggression. Should he want to carry this through quite consistently, he would logically have to declare Great Britain and France aggressors of Germany for having brought about the state of war by means of the ultimatum.

I believe I am sharing the prosecution's viewpoint when I give voice to the supposition that such a result would not meet the prosecution's approval. The prosecution has brought forward its evidence in such a way as to enter into the politically historical background of the war. It has accordingly not been satisfied with relying on the formal juridical definition or any single criteria thereof.

It accordingly confirms my conclusion presented by me to the Court that the definition proposed by the prosecution is no suitable base for the qualification of the indeterminable concept of aggression.

May I be allowed to summarize the events at the outbreak of the war: Kellogg Pact and aggression concept, the prosecution's pillars, do not support it. The Kellogg Pact had no juridically expressible contents, neither for the countries nor, and even much less, for an individual. The attempt to put life into it afterwards by means of a formal concept of aggression was frustrated by political reality.

Denmark and Norway

Mr. v. Ribbentrop's share in the extension of the conflict to Scandinavia was so small that it hardly can be put to his charge as a separate action. The interrogations of the witnesses, Great Admiral Raeder and Field Marshal Keitel, have shown beyond doubt that, as a matter of fact, Mr. v. Ribbentrop was informed of this operation for the first time only 36 hours in advance. His contribution was solely the elaboration of notes prescribed to him in contents and form.

Concerning the actual side, viz., the imminent violation of Scandinavian neutrality by the Western powers, he had to be content with the information communicated to him. The evidence has shown, and I shall expose later on in juridical arguments, that he was, as Minister for Foreign Affairs, not competent to check those informations, and that he did not possess any actual means to do so. Presuming that these informations were true, he could justly assume that the German Reich behaved, in the intended action, according to international law. I leave more detailed argumentation concerning this point of law to my colleague, Dr. Siemers, well conversant with this point, whose client, Great Admiral Raeder, had submitted to Hitler a large part of enemy information and the proposal for a German occupation of Scandinavia.

DEFENSE

Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxemburg

In the case of Belgium and the Netherlands it has been proved by evidence that an unrestrained maintenance of the neutrality of the Belgian-Dutch territory by these countries could not be guaranteed. Previous to the war, there already existed between the general staffs of the Western powers and those of both neutral countries agreements and current exchanges of experiences concerning behavior and occupation in case of a conflict with Germany. Detailed deployment plans and fortification systems built under supervision of detached officers of the Western powers were meant to prepare the reception of allied forces. These projects comprehended not only a cooperation of the armies concerned, but also the assistance of certain civilian authorities, for the purpose of carrying out supplying and advance of the Allies. Important about these preparations is the fact that they were made not only for the case of defense, but also for the offensive. For this reason Belgium and the Netherlands also could not or would not prevent it that British bomber formations continued to fly over them, whose near aim was the destruction of the Ruhr district, the heel of Achilles of the German war industry. This area was also the main goal of the Allies in case of an offensive on land.

These intentions as well as the most intensive preparations for offensive measures by the Western Powers had been ascertained beyond a doubt by sources of information. The grouping of the offensive forces showed that the Belgian-Netherland territory was included in the theater of operations. As has already been described in connection with preceding cases of conflict, such information was currently passed on to Herr v. Ribbentrop by Hitler or his deputies. Here too Herr v. Ribbentrop had to rely upon the accuracy of these informations without having the right and the duty of checking on them. In that way he, too, became convinced that in order to avert a deathly danger—namely an allied thrust into the Ruhr district—preventive countermeasures were necessary. On the basis of these considerations Luxemburg simply could not be spared because of the extensiveness of modern military operations.

In connection with this procedure the prosecution accuses, among others, the German Foreign Policy and thereby Herr von Ribbentrop to have made plans to march in, in contradiction to the 5th Hague Convention concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers and persons in case of war on land. (Convention concernant les droits et les devoirs des puissances et des personnes neutres en cas de guerre sur terre.)

In this connection it was overlooked by the prosecution that this convention does not have reference to drawing a neutral into a war between other powers, but deals only with the rights and duties of neutrals and belligerents as long as the neutrality status exists. The prosecution has made the mistake to apply its erroneous interpretation of the Kellogg Pact, as I have shown, to the pact which had been made 20 years earlier. There remains no doubt that, at the time of the 2d Hague peace conference, the law did not evaluate the outbreak of war as a legal but only as an historical fact. All conventions concerning laws of war, especially the Rules of Land Warfare and the Neutrality pact for Land and Sea Warfare, are built upon the basis of an existing state of war, hence do not regulate the jus ad bellum, but the jus in bello.

This fact disposes of the prosecution's references to the 5th Convention of the Hague in all cases of the spreading of the war to the neutrals which have ratified this convention.

It is, moreover, quite doubtful whether the Locarno Treaty can be mentioned, as it was done by the prosecution in connection with drawing Belgium into the war. With Germany's renunciation in 1935 the Locarno system had collapsed, as will be shown by the defense counsel of Freiherr v. Neurath. All attempts to effect a new union which was to take its place were guided by the fact that the actual situation created by Germany must be taken as the starting point for a new agreement. This may be seen especially from the British and French plans for the intended new agreement. The attempt to create a new agreement was not successful. However, the thorough and long drawn out negotiations show very distinctly that none of the signatories considered the treaties of Locarno valid any longer. On the contrary the Western Powers proceeded to consider among themselves the effects which their obligations of guaranteeing the Western borders still held after Germany's withdrawal.

Regardless of how one may judge Germany's attitude of 1935, it remains to be stated that with it the pact system had lost its validity. Hence in 1940 German commitments to the Western Pact of 1925 did no longer exist.

I shall, on a later occasion, discuss the arbitration conventions with Belgium, Poland, and Czechoslovakia in connection with the Locarno Treaty when discussing in general Germany's obligation for a peaceful settlement of disputes. As far as Luxemburg is concerned, not even the prosecution referred to the neutralization of this country. Evidently it went on the assumption that Germany had been forced by the Treaty of Versailles to give up its rights given to her by the London agreement of 1867.

DEFENSE

Jugoslavia

When, on 24 March 1941, the Jugoslav Government joined the Tripartite Pact, Herr v. Ribbentrop could not in the light of the available news assume that, a few days after the joining, a military intervention by Germany on the Balkans would be necessary for political reasons. This situation was caused by the forcible change of government in Belgrade. The reaction to the joining of the Tripartite Pact by the government Stojadinowitsch resulted in a new political change in Jugoslavia under the leadership of Simovitch which aimed at a close cooperation with the Western Powers counter to the idea of the Tripartite Pact.

In view of this uncertain situation in the interior of Jugoslavia which, because of the mobilization of the Jugoslav army and their deployment on the German frontier, became a danger for the Reich, Hitler suddenly decided on military operations on the Balkans. He made this decision without the knowledge of Herr v. Ribbentrop, with the idea in mind to eliminate an imminent grave danger for the Italian ally.

The testimony of the witness Colonel-General Jodl has shown beyond a doubt that Herr v. Ribbentrop, after Hitler's decision and after the Simoyitch Putsch, seriously endeavored to be allowed to exhaust all diplomatic possibilities prior to the beginning of military operations. Colonel-General Jodl has confirmed there that H.v.Ribbentrop's endeavors were rejected in so rude a manner that, taking into consideration Hitler's nature and the prevailing methods, any influence on Hitler was practically out of question.

The fact that since March 4, 1941, strong British forces were pushing to the North from southern Greece made a further localization on the Italian-Greek conflict impossible. This war had begun in the autumn of 1940 against German wishes, but Hitler could, with a view to the general situation, certainly not tolerate the imminent defeat of his Italian ally.

When H.v.Ribbentrop on August 23, 1939, signed at Moscow the treaties between Germany and the Soviet Union, including a secret agreement concerning the Division of Poland and the surrender to Russia of the Baltic states, the ideological discussions, in part, of an extraordinarily vehement nature between National Socialism and Bolshevism were, for the time being, eliminated from the international sphere, where they formed elements of possible danger. This system of treaties, to be supplemented in the course of the next month, had a favorable influence on the opinion concerning Hitler's foreign policy of large circles of the German people, which were alarmed by the ideological contrasts.

Since the Reinsurance Treaty signed by Bismarck with Russia there was a general conviction in Germany that the maintenance of friendly relations with Russia must always be the goal of our foreign policy. For the just mentioned traditional reasons Herr v. Ribbentrop considered these pacts a strong pillar of the German Foreign policy. Because of this opinion he invited in the winter 1940 the Foreign Commissar of the Soviet Union, Molotov, to Berlin, to clear up problems which had arisen in the meantime. Unfortunately the conference did not bring the desired results.

Hitler became very much alarmed by this conference and by secret information, as about the future attitude of the Soviet Union towards Germany. Especially the attitude of Russia in the Baltic countries as well as the Soviet march into Bessarabia and into the Bukowina were considered by Hitler as actions which were apt to endanger the German interests in the Baltic provinces and in the Rumanian Oil district. He furthermore saw in the attitude of the USSR the possibility of taking influence on Bulgaria. He could consider the Friendship Pact with Jugoslavia on 5 April 1941 as a confirmation of his suspicion, as it occurred at a time when Jugoslavia, after a change of government, threatened to turn to the Western Powers.

In spite of these misgivings of Hitler of which he frequently informed Herr v. Ribbentrop, the defendant tried to avoid the tensions. The Tribunal has permitted me to submit an affidavit which confirms that Herr v. Ribbentrop still tried in December 1940 in an extensive discussion to induce Hitler to give him once more authority for the inclusion of Russia in the "Dreierpakt" (Tripartite Pact). This documentary evidence confirms that Herr v. Ribbentrop after his conference could have been of the opinion that he would succeed in this step through the consent of Hitler. Subsequently Hitler, however, returned again and again to his misgivings which were strengthened by the news of his own secret service about military operations on the other side of the Eastern border. In the spring of 1941 Herr von Ribbentrop tried to bring to Hitler in Berchtesgaden the then Ambassador in Moscow and one of his subordinates. Both diplomats were not admitted. This ended Herr v. Ribbentrop's possibilities in his position under the regime. He afterwards also believed that he could no longer shut his eyes to the information which was brought to his knowledge.

DEFENSE

As Colonel General Jodl had testified, he and all the Commanders in Chief who took part in the beginning of the Russian campaign were convinced that they had pushed right into the midst of an offensive concentration of troops. This is proved by, among other things, maps which were found and which covered the territory on this side of the German-Russian line of interests. Can one really believe that this conduct of the Soviet Union is in agreement with the Non-Aggression Pact?

U.S.A.

Around that time the danger of a spreading of the European war into a world war began to stand out more and more threatening. The United States proclaimed a neutrality law at the beginning of the war in which they submitted in advance to fixed rules in case of a future war. The mechanism of the neutrality law was set in motion by a proclamation of the President. It designated at the same time the danger zone within which American ships could not count upon the protection of their government.

This attitude at the beginning of the war confirms that the United States, the author of the Kellogg Pact, were not of the opinion that the traditional law of neutrality had in any way been modified by it. The USA, however, deviated during the course of the spreading and the aggravation of the European war more and more from the original line without the German Reich furnishing any cause for conflict with USA. According to the experiences of the first world war German general opinion and consequently that of Herr v. Ribbentrop was for a prevention by all means of an intervention of the USA.

Since the quarantine speech of President Roosevelt in 1937 strong contrasts could be noticed more and more in the ideological-political train of thoughts of the world's public opinion. The situation was aggravated by the incidents of November 1938 in Germany which were the reason for the recall of the Berlin Ambassador to Washington for reporting, from where he did not return to his post.

If, in spite of that, the neutrality policy was further prepared by legislative actions and became effective at the beginning of the war, the German Foreign Office and Herr v. Ribbentrop could conclude that the existing difference of opinion as to the internal political form of the state would not change the neutral attitude of the United States. Because of this expectation not only everything that could produce unfavorable effect in the USA was avoided since the outbreak of the war but we also acquiesced to quite a number of actions by the US which were weakening Germany and were not in accordance with strict neutrality.

The world public was informed of the accordance of the political aims of the neutral America and the belligerent Great Britain when the leading men of the two states proclaimed in August 1941 the Atlantic Charter as the program of the new order of the relationships between the nations. It had an obviously hostile character against the axis powers and left them no doubt that the US had sided with the other side.

There followed the incidents on the high seas which, as the evidence has shown, can be credited to the account of the material support of Great Britain by the United States.

In occupying Iceland and Greenland in summer and fall 1941 the USA took over the protection of the most important line of communication of the then severely struggling British Empire. This was a military intervention already before the outbreak of the officially declared war. The so-called shooting order of the President brought about a dangerous situation which could result any day in the outbreak of the armed conflict. Already several months before the 11 December 1941 the USA took measures which used to be taken only during a war. The outbreak of the war was only a link in a chain of successive incidents, perhaps not even the most important. It was caused by the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, which, as the evidence has shown, was neither instigated nor could have been foreseen by Germany.

According to the formal definition of the aggression the declaration of war is one of the criteria for the determination of the aggressor. As I already pointed out in connection with the spreading of the war in Europe this criterion alone without the factual background is no positive proof for an aggression. As reaction to the numerous neutrality violations by the United States, which represented already actions of war, the German Reich would have been justified for a long time to reply on her part with military actions. Whether this right was exercised after a preceding announcement, that is a declaration of war or not, is immaterial.

The Legal and Actual Aspects of Violations of International Treaties

So far I have thrown some light upon aggressive acts as enunciated by the prosecution from the beginning of the Polish Campaign to the entry into the war of the United States. It remains to take up a juridical position regarding the treaties, concluded by Germany, and which provided for a pacific settlement of political conflicts.

DEFENSE

H. v. Ribbentrop is charged not only with having been a party to aggressive acts, but also with his omission to release the mechanism of aforesaid treaties previous to armed conflict. From the fact that the ways for pacific settlement, as provided by the treaties, have not been used, the prosecution draws the conclusion that these omissions can be attributed, in a criminal sense, to H. v. Ribbentrop. This interpretation, however, would be erroneous in a legal sense.

If we begin by sharing the prosecution's point of view, we shall see that even in this case the conclusions drawn by the prosecution cannot be upheld. Even if a single minister could be made legally responsible for the nonoperating of a set of treaties, the prosecution cannot but ask whether the minister was actually in a position to insure a result of any legal consequence. According to a principle embodied by nature into any system of criminal law on earth, a defendant is punishable for an omission only if he had actually been in a position and legally liable to act. I shall demonstrate at length, within the compass of my arguments concerning the conspiracy, how small, in fact, H. v. Ribbentrop's possibilities of influence have been. The decisive point at issue is the fact that he was not legally in a position to make any declarations to foreign powers binding the German Reich, other than those he was empowered to do by the head of the state. As head of the state, Hitler was the representative of the German Reich from the point of view of international law. He only was in a position to make binding declaration to foreign powers. Any other persons could legally bind the German state only if authorized by the head of the state, unless the treaty in question explicitly provided otherwise.

It is not a characteristic of the German Fuehrer state only that the foreign minister cannot independently enter into binding commitments towards foreign powers. It is rather a general principle of international relations that only the organ empowered to represent the state is apt to act for it. The difference between German conditions and those of democratic constitutions merely lies in the fact that in the former the foreign minister usually has got a larger internal influence on the intentions of the head of the state. The defendant, therefore, could not have obtained any legal result if he had tried, against the Fuehrer's wish, to have recourse to the possibilities of settlement of conflicts as provided by the numerous treaties of arbitration and conciliation. No one but Hitler could have put in motion such a procedure. The defendant could have been in a position to do so by Hitler's order only. He had not even a claim on giving advice if Hitler chose to ignore him.

These points of view apply, e.g., to the following treaties enumerated by the prosecution: Convention for Pacific Settlement of International Disputes of 1899 and 1907; Treaty of Arbitration of 1929 between Germany and Luxemburg. It should be mentioned, moreover, that these agreements did by no means provide an obligatory settlement of political disputes.

As to treaties of arbitration and conciliation with Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, and Belgium, concluded in connection with the Locarno treaty, the additional point applies—quite besides the legal argument just mentioned—that they and the Western pact form a political unit. Even externally, this is expressed in the fact that these agreements and the Locarno pact are all of them annexes to the general final protocol of the powers participating in the Locarno conference. The question could, therefore, be asked whether the arbitration treaties share the fate of the principal treaty, i.e., the Western pact.

I should particularly like to point out that the procedure laid down in these treaties had finally led, in case of non-settlement before the League of Nations Council, wherein, at the time of the Western Pact, the four participating great powers had, or—as was the case for Germany—was to have permanent seats. The withdrawal of Italy and Germany from this political body deeply affected the principle of the political base which supported the settlement treaties. Moreover, the grouping of the powers had shifted so much that a part of the Locarno great powers, viz., Great Britain and France, had in the year 1939 gone into binding agreements with Poland, so as to take sides beforehand in the event of a possible conflict.

Concerning the treaties of arbitration and conciliation with Denmark and the Netherlands of 1926, I may be allowed to point out that the proceedings provided therein could not be applied at all, as there were no conflicts between Germany and aforesaid countries, quite to the contrary. Germany took steps which were aimed at the enemy belligerents, which were meant to be preceded in the occupation of these countries.

The prosecution mentions, moreover, a number of assurances given by Hitler to countries with which Germany waged war afterwards. As H. v. Ribbentrop did not give such assurances in person, his participation could form a point of argument only if he had given advice to Hitler in this respect. No evidence has been produced to sustain such a suggestion. A large part of these assurances is contained in speeches made by Hitler before a German public, either in mass meetings or at the Reichstag. It is doubtful indeed whether such declarations, addressed in the first place to the German public, could have any binding results in the field of international law.

DEFENSE

Actual and Legal Aspects of War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity attributed to H. von Ribbentrop

Whereas up to now I have spoken about the actions that led to the outbreak of the war and its spreading, I shall now proceed to the second large complex of the indictment, which deals with crimes committed during the war.

The Charter, in Article 6b, declares violations of the laws or customs of war to be punishable. This conception is illustrated by enumeration of a number of examples such as deportation, shooting of hostages, etc. But these examples do not limit the conception. We are therefore obliged in the same way as with Article 6a, to propose to the court a qualification, which it can use as a base for its decisions.

I agree in this conception with the procedure proposed by the French prosecution. They declared that they would be free to give a more explicit definition of punishable offenses which had not been fully defined by the Charter.

What is good for the Prosecution is good for the Defense.

The use of the expression "Laws and Usages of War" (lois et coutumes de la guerre) as well as the enumeration of examples forces one to believe that the Charter aims at violations of the classical "jus in bello". I therefore qualify war crimes as offenses against the law established between belligerents by agreement or against prescriptive law, binding and recognized generally without special agreement. The several cases, which come under the collective conception of war crimes, must therefore be each examined as to whether they are to be regarded as such according to the traditional rules applying to armed conflicts between states. Whereas, in general, classical international law holds responsible the state as a unit only, there always existed in the usage of war, the exception, that also acting individuals were liable to be held responsible. Whether this responsibility of the individual person can be followed up in a punishing prosecution after the war has been the subject of many discussions. One will be able to ascertain that in the ruling practice of states, the belligerent who was violated by a war crime may also after the war call to account the offender. If several states, which have fought shoulder to shoulder in the war, form a common court against the war criminals of the conquered adversary, this court has the collective competency of all the states that form the court or have joined its Charter.

When speaking of the liability of individuals to be punished for crimes committed during the war against the adversary, who thereafter sits in judgment upon him, one would be thinking in the first place of former members of the combating forces. Already at Versailles there were difficulties in answering the question to which degree military chiefs were to be made responsible. The idea to have a Minister of a cabinet (Ressortminister) held responsible under criminal law, so far never has appeared. Also in Versailles the war criminals committee was occupied with the question of making responsible nonmilitary personalities from only political points of view. This committee discriminated clearly between war criminals, which were to be judged by the allied court, and the guilt with regard to the outbreak of the war, for the examination and judging of which a special political international court was to be created.

By means of the traditional conception a Minister (Ressortminister) cannot therefore be held responsible for violations of the "jus in bello". The prosecution can reach this success only by going the round about way via a conspiracy. If we follow the interpretation given to this conception, the Foreign Minister of the Reich would, e.g., have to be responsible for the destruction of the village of Ouradur. He would have to stand up for actions which have not in the least to do with the Reich's foreign policy and are only single actions of some odd offices.

As the hearing of evidence has shown, the Reich Foreign Minister was not only not competent for the conduct of war, but had in fact not the slightest possibility of influencing military measures either in a curbing or furthering way. If one should want to regard the various Ministers (Fachminister) as a community of conspirators also with regard to war crimes, it would have to be proved that the military, competent to conduct the war, acted in agreement with the ministers or at least after having given them the necessary information. The compilation of military command offices and ministers to a union of will directed towards the execution of actions criminal and abominated by all decent people, is an artificial subsequent construction of the prosecution. The unity, which did not exist at the time at which it is supposed to have worked, has but now been drawn up as a conception. It is self-evident that a criminal procedure cannot be built up on such a method.

Herr von Ribbentrop can therefore not be punished without consideration for all war crimes committed during the war on the German side. Such a responsibility for the results would be outright grotesque. He could on the contrary only be responsible for individual actions, if he himself participated in certain concrete individual actions.

DEFENSE

H. v. Ribbentrop is accused by the prosecution that, according to testimony by General Lahousen, he issued "directives" to Admiral Canaris to have Ukrainian villages set afire, and to beat the Jews living there to death. First I wish to establish the fact that even a Foreign Minister cannot issue directives of any sort to a military agency. Furthermore, it would have been wholly nonsensical to issue such directives for setting afire Ukrainian villages. Ukrainians supported the German fight against the Poles. Thus, hardly anyone will believe that H. v. Ribbentrop at that time advised on the destruction of an own ally. My client further insists that not one word was mentioned about the beating to death of Jews in that particular conference, especially so, as in connection herewith no reason for it existed.

I beg the Tribunal to base their decision on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity raised on H.v.Ribbentrop, on the general attitude of the accused with respect to questions of humanity, as was proved beyond doubt by the evidence H. v. Ribbentrop saved the lives of 10,000 allied prisoners of war through vigorous, personal intervention. As I will further show—within the framework of the conspiracy—he was instrumental in the unshackling of British prisoners of war and he used his influence for the preservation of the rules of the Geneva Convention. He was opposed to branding Russian prisoners of war. These are examples whereupon the Tribunal may base their decision with respect to questions of humanity. In problems where he was not actively involved, this may appropriately gauge the remaining attitude of the accused, as concerns questions of humanity. Further his attitude in the question of treatment of terror aviators is charged as a war crime to H. v. Ribbentrop.

My client as well as the defendant Goering deny that the conference at Schloss Klessheim, mentioned in document 735-PS, ever took place. I should like to emphasize that General Warlimont, who made those notes did not personally participate in the conference. Furthermore, the expression of opinion, attributed according to the document to H. v. Ribbentrop stands in contradiction to his usual demeanor in this question. Under Secretary Steengracht deposed that H. v. Ribbentrop, after the publication of the notorious article about lynch justice in the Reich, at once vigorously protested against it.

Further evidence concerning the problem of terror aviators through examination of the witnesses General Jodl and Fieldmarshal Keitel proves that, not only the Foreign Office but H.v. Ribbentrop personally had pledged themselves in principle for the preservation of the Geneva Convention and that H.v. Ribbentrop and other leading personalities took pains to assure the retention of at least the basic human principles even in Hitler's most radical period. In spite of all that happened, it must be pronounced as a success, that in consequence of these steps the Geneva Convention was not abrogated. Hereby it must never be overlooked that especially in cases of terror fliers, where so-called terror attacks in the form of air bombardments were involved, which were characterized by an indiscriminate attack upon cities without attacking military and armament objectives, such attacks then undeniably constituted a war crime in themselves. It must be taken into account in the reaction throughout Germany towards the conduct of air warfare of the western powers, that according to established and traditional conceptions of an armed conflict between nations, the attack on the civilian population is prohibited. This thought is not only expressed in the Hague Convention on land warfare but constitutes a stipulation by contract of general international law, binding for all, which is valid not only in the theater of operations on land. Acknowledging this, the Hague rules of air warfare, although permitting air attacks of military objectives in undefended cities, do not permit the bombing of dwellings of the civilian population. Although the Hague rules were not ratified, they were in practice followed by all belligerents, and acknowledged as common law. These measures became especially acute after complete air superiority had been achieved by the Allies and the resulting constant low level attacks with weapons on board on the civilian population took place. These particular events led for the first time to the discussion, whether in the face of a warfare which was undeniably violating international law, it was still of any use to uphold the Geneva Convention in its substance. These considerations and corresponding reflections led to the drafting of documents which have become the object of evidence in the proceedings and which constituted—as was shown by the evidence—drafts, but not decisions in this question. They can therefore not form the basis of a judgment, as certainly a state is entitled to having appropriate agencies express their opinion on this question.

DEFENSE

Opinions on the Conception of Conspiracy in Relation to the Position of Herr v. Ribbentrop as a Minister

With the permission of the Tribunal I presented the role of Herr v. Ribbentrop before the war, at its outbreak, and for its duration. Beyond this the prosecution holds all defendants responsible for every crime presented here. The notion "conspiracy" is being used for motivating this common liability. If the consequences were drawn from this extravagant accusation then each defense counsel would have to deal with all details presented by the prosecution. The obvious impossibility to use up so much time of the Tribunal shows how questionable the basis of the accusation is. Therefore I have to confine myself to examining the participation in the conspiracy from the viewpoint of the actual and legal position of the Foreign Minister in the Third Reich.

Conspiracy in the sense of the Charter and of the Indictment means a sort or form of participation in a punishable act. This kind of offense was until now unknown to German and continental legal thinking. It existed only in the Anglo-Saxon law. In this legal sphere conspiracy means participation in a punishable act which requires, as a minimum symptom, an agreement (Einigung) to commit a crime. A further prerequisite is that the mutual plan causes the perpetration of a definite punishable offense.

The Charter proceeds from this form of participation in a crime in declaring punishable all offenses stated in par. 6, assuming the existence of a conspiracy or a common plan, as a special form of participation in those crimes. The Charter then stipulates in par. 6a another special form of conspiracy declaring punishable the participation in a common plan or conspiracy to carry out offensive wars or wars violating international treaties.

Under the conception "mutual plan" the Charter and Indictment obviously understand something that reaches beyond the sphere of conspiracy. Mr. Justice Jackson himself admitted that the application of the conspiracy as an offense according to Anglo Saxon law was exceeded and a conception created which is not yet juridically determinable. Both forms of conspiracy constitute a liability for all acts committed by any one person carrying out both these forms of conspiracy.

The indictment uses piracy as a pattern in order to make the participants in this alleged conspiracy appear as a whole. The conspirators are all on board of a pirate ship which, contrary to law and justice of all nations, engages in robbery and therefore is outlawed. Anyone who punishes the crew helps to restore justice. At the first glance this picture appears to be attractive.

However, on closer inspection, it becomes obvious that it is only a matter of a catchword which tries to apply the community of the ship's crew, united with the ship for better or worse, to the place of the—by no comparison—more complicated conditions of a modern state organization. The ships of all nations are according to established, commonly recognized, and uncontested conceptions authorized to combat piracy on the high seas upon encountering a pirate. The criminal jurisdiction of almost all nations knows explicit regulations for combating them. The peculiarity of this offense in distinction from other acts punishable in every country whether committed against own or foreign nationals—for example white slavery traffic, acts of forging coin and so forth—is the circumstance that the jurisdiction is carried out on the high seas. Thereby the mistaken idea may arise that a crime in the sphere of international law is concerned. This, however, is not the case. Piracy is a common offense, the prosecution of which is by international law permitted not only in coastal waters but also on the high seas belonging to all nations. The basis for this conception was laid in the United States already in the beginning of the last century by decisions rendered by Chief Justice Marshall.

The acts with which Herr von Ribbentrop is charged were committed at a time during which the German Reich and its opponents confronted one another first in peace and then in war, on the stage of international relations. An example taken from the sphere of international common penal law is not suited to convey a plastic conception of a conspiracy of an entire state apparatus. Besides the arrow hits the archer himself. In the first place, the idea of the state, which according to the conception of the traditional international law is the only carrier of rights and duties, is being destroyed so that the persons standing behind it and acting on its behalf may separately be made liable to criminal prosecution. As usually only few persons acted directly as participants in the acts charged, the multitude of these people is then again compressed into an artificial whole, in order to hold them responsible also for those acts which were not committed by them.

Here the criticism of the jurist has to set in. According to our perception of law and also to the perception of law of all civilized nations, the criminal responsibility is tied only to a few basic rules showing but few divergences. According to continental law only such person can be held responsible for a punishable act who deliberately or negligently contributes to a definite act. By unanimous conception the perpetrator therefore is supposed to know the plan to which he allegedly contributed; to foresee and approve of the acts committed in executing it.

DEFENSE

The participation in the form of conspiracy was until now known as an offense only to a limited legal circle. Therefore it is familiar only in a part of the legal systems of those nations who carry on or have joined in the present proceedings. It was completely unknown to the German idea of law and therefore to Herr von Ribbentrop at the time of his political activity. Conspiracy as a form of complicity marks a much wider range of actions as criminal than Herr von Ribbentrop could have anticipated at the time of his activities in the field of foreign policy. But even if this form of complicity is assumed as a base for legal findings according to the Charter, neither the official position as Reich Foreign Minister held by Herr von Ribbentrop nor the individual acts committed by him in this capacity made him liable of becoming a member of a conspiracy. The case von Ribbentrop shows in particular how, through the introduction of the concept of a conspiracy, responsibilities are getting interlocked, which have nothing whatever to do with each other, if we take into account the official position and authority as well as the personal attitude of the individual conspirators. The prosecution, however, compresses, in order to achieve their aim, into a unity artificially and subsequently created a number of actions and individuals, chosen at random, which do not form any natural unity and of which most of them had nothing to do with each other at all. If we followed the Charter and the Indictment, there would appear as result the fact—wholly alien to any actual and legal thought—that Herr von Ribbentrop, while personally and actually, as thoroughly proven by evidence, completely eliminated from any influence on the occupied Eastern territories, would have to bear the responsibility for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed there, whereas, for instance, the defendant Streicher although he headed his special department would be answerable for the foreign policy.

If one confirms the existence of a conspiracy to commit war crimes and crimes against humanity would practically result in making Herr von Ribbentrop and the Foreign Office responsible for such crimes, whereas evidence has shown that this very office has always tried to observe the rules of warfare, according to international law, and to adhere to the Geneva convention even if this involved a severe struggle with Hitler. The conspiracy to commit war crimes and crimes against humanity can only refer to actual offenses against rules of war, either individual actions, as the execution of escaped British Air Force officers, or certain measures incompatible with the adopted rules of war. At any rate, the unity of conspirators ought to refer to a specific action or specific groups of actions of the same nature. It is impossible to hold a defendant responsible for actions not approved by him, or which he tried to prevent.

I think that the prosecution will agree that there simply cannot exist any conspiracy to commit crimes against the usages and customs of war. This concept is so controversial and is so undetermined in practice of the states and in the theory of international law, that individual acts, which in the course of war may be considered as war crimes, could not form a part of the development of means and methods of war modifies also the contents of the concept of war crimes. Therefore, there cannot be but a conspiracy to commit specific or war crimes or war crimes of the same kind. Therefore, any one of the so-called conspirators can not be held responsible for each and every action which an objective judgment must define afterwards as a war crime. Particularly, it would not meet the purpose of the guilty if the defendant would be punished according to the general and artificial concept of conspiracy exclusively, even for such war crimes which they tried to prevent with all their efforts.

This point of view applies particularly to Herr v. Ribbentrop. Not only did the military conduct of war not belong to his sphere, but he was, as was proven by evidence, expressly excluded from it by a repeated order of Hitler. His department had only to do with war crimes insofar as they led to negotiations with foreign powers. Moreover, the fact, for instance, that after the terrible air bombardment of Dresden, the execution of 10,000 allied prisoners of war was prevented on H.v.Ribbentrop's initiative with Hitler, proves that he has done, when informed of imminent war crimes, what to do was in his power and within his influence. These arguments and the result of evidence show how unjust it would be to share the point of view held by the prosecution, e.g., to hold a Foreign Minister with reduced authority responsible for crimes against usages of war and humanity, the more so as it has been conclusively proven that he was excluded from any influence on the conduct of war.

With the court's permission, I shall now deal with the alleged conspiracy for planning and preparation of aggressive wars and of violation of treaties. Within the frame of such a conspiracy, the defendant is apparently to be held responsible in his capacity as Minister for Foreign Affairs and the office formerly held by him in the diplomatic service.

This kind of conspiracy appears to deal with any act or plan which have any connection with war, its preparation, outbreak, and course. Any individual act within this enormous complex of concepts is irrelevant in itself from the point of view of criminal law, and has had, until now, never been conceived as a crime called "outbreak of war". This kind of conspiracy does not contain any facts which come under the crimes so far known by any system of criminal law in the world.

DEFENSE

Therefore, I cannot but investigate this complex from the point of view of v. Ribbentrop's ministerial position and his relation to the German Reich which waged the various wars.

H.v.Ribbentrop, since the 4th of February 1938, held the position of a Minister of Foreign Affairs of the German Reich. As shown by evidence, H.v. Ribbentrop was called to this office at a time when the actual leadership of foreign policy had already passed to Hitler in his double capacity of Reich Chancellor and head of the state. I have submitted as a document Hitler's speech of July 19, 1940 held at the Kroll opera house, where he emphasized that H.v. Ribbentrop had had to handle for years foreign policy according to Hitler's political directives. H.v. Ribbentrop, therefore, did not possess the position of a minister, as customary in modern constitutions. As shown in above-mentioned speech, he did not possess it either in fact or in law. This is shown by an examination of the public law of the Third Reich.

According to constitutional law, as it has developed in modern states in the course of the 19th and in the beginning of the 20th Century, the department of the Minister for Foreign Affairs belongs to the executive functions. The Minister for Foreign Affairs has to share the responsibility of conducting foreign policy with the Prime Minister. This involves in a parliamentary democracy responsibility to the representatives of the people; in a nonarchical or presidential constitution to the head of the state. This responsibility is actually of political importance only, and infers the resigning of a minister from his office when he does not enjoy any longer the confidence of parliament or of the head of the state. Most constitutions make provisions for indicting a minister by the representatives of the people in case of violation of official duties. But even when convicted by a constitutional court in a kind of criminal procedure, the minister is not punished, but his actions are merely declared to have been illicit.

Both possibilities to call ministers to account were provided by the German constitution of the Weimar republic. By the way, the possibility of indicting a minister has never been made use of.

Constitutional law of the Third Reich utterly changed this state of things. A short time after Hitler had come to power, parliament was asked, with reference to existing internal difficulties, to give its consent of an "Enabling Act" (Ermaechtigungsgesetz). The German people and its representatives expected at the time that this authorization was to be used temporarily, and merely for the removal of actual distress. This law became, however, the foundation of a complete transformation of the constitution. The possibility of being responsible to a parliament did no longer exist. It changed into the responsibility towards the Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor, in whose person the authority given up by parliament now rested. Now there remained but one responsibility; that towards the head of the state. Starting from this parliamentary authorization all functions, derived from the power of the state, concentrated more and more in Hitler personally. The traditional division of power, the result of a more than century old struggle for constitutional rights, became an empty shell by joining together all means of power and thereby obsolete. The power was concentrated in the hand of the Fuehrer, who had it applied by his plenipotentiaries separately. The theory of the state law of the Third Reich designated this as change from the actual to the functional division of power.

The single Minister after this change had taken place did not act any longer under his own responsibility but only by the order (Auftrag) he had received from the head of the state. What applied to the individual, also applied to the former Reich Cabinet. It had no influence any longer on state leadership but was a common conception for various branches of administration technically separated. As the political tasks no longer existed with which normally the Ministers as a group had to deal with—and so to the cabinet—the tasks of the council of the Ministers were done automatically by the weight of the facts. Therefore, as the hearing of witnesses has shown, it never met during von Ribbentrop's period of office. Even the title "Minister" did not signify any longer the head of a department of administration (Reichsressort) but became a mere title expressing a rank.

The result of this reform was that the Minister for Foreign Affairs also did not have any longer the right to set down the directives of foreign policy. The hearing of evidence has shown this fact also in the form of speeches and utterances of Hitler, in which he, after the Rhineland occupation and the "Anschluss" of Austria, said that he brought about these, as he called them "great decisions", against the will of his advisers by his own decision and referring to his responsibility towards the German people and history. Seen from the state law point of view this means that no minister had the possibility of preventing the decisions. Also from the state law point of view he was not authorized to examine the legality of the Fuehrer's decisions. Because from the just described concentration of all functions of state power in Hitler's person followed that he was authorized to carry out legislative and executive functions. A special form of the act of legislation was no longer provided for in the Third Reich. Also there was no measure by which from the contents of the Fuehrer's decisions one could draw conclusions, whether he acted in his capacity as law-giver or as head of the executive. The conception of material law laid down in Germany as in all continental states till the assumption of power (Machtuebernahme) completely lost its meaning; also individual directives were given in the form of laws. In all constitutions the authorities whose task it is to apply laws are forbidden to examine the contents of these laws. This is even valid for jurisdiction, how much more for agencies of administration. The application of a law that was made in the correct way, provided for by the constitution, must not be refused by any office in the state. The action of examining even by the law courts is limited to the question whether the way laid down by the constitution has been followed. This is also the case in Great Britain and the United States, wherein decrees issued by the executive may be subject to examining with regard to their contents but not laws passed by parliament.

DEFENSE

In the state law of the Third Reich there was only one authority for all expressions of will of the state: the Fuehrer. It often could not be found out on account of the dissolution of the conceptions of state law in which capacity he acted. The doctrine of state law of the Third Reich, therefore, was debased to a theology of revelations of the Fuehrer. The old discriminations ceased to exist in the thinking of the Ministers. The only question that could arise in state law of the Third Reich was whether the will of the Fuehrer was expressed in a clear enough way to contain the will of the state.

This practice of constitutional law was unmistakeably the result of having transferred the pseudo-military way of thinking to the sphere of politics. The conceptions obedience and discipline were transferred into a department in which they did not belong.

In connection with the statements on the elimination of the traditional division of power we must point to a fact, which is just as characteristic for this despotia sui generis, as it speaks against the existence of a conspiracy or a common plan.

The hearing of evidence shows no kind of council giving or controlling agency to the head of the state. Neither the cabinet nor the Reich defense council nor any other advisory committee had any influence on Hitler's decisions.

The key documents and the statements of witnesses only show monologues of Hitler before an increasing audience. All, that has the appearance of a council, is in reality reception of orders. The hearing of evidence has shown it to be certain, that efforts to influence Hitler could at the most lead to reactions not to be precalculated.

Herr von Ribbentrop and several of the other defendants, without doubt, had considerable power in their own sphere which did not interest Hitler. They were, however, completely denied to participate in the great decisions on war or peace, armistice, peace offers, etc.

In the position of Foreign Minister, as held by Herr von Ribbentrop, an independent personality could not be tolerated. Herr von Ribbentrop was aware of this as Under Secretary of State v. Steengracht has testified here. He stated: "Hitler could have use for an Under Secretary for foreign affairs but not for a Minister of foreign politics." This development of practice of constitution and government can hardly be reconciled with the thought of a common plan and conspiracy. The conspiracy demands, as we have seen, a combination and agreement in aims at which the participants form their will freely. The political practice of the Third Reich only knew the acclamation.

Remarks on the Legal Significance of Political Actions

So far, my examinations have been based on the norms of actual criminal law as laid down in par. 6. I should not like to close my statement without drawing the Court's attention to the relation between politics and law. The essential contents of politics is and remains, in the life of sovereign states, the defense of the interests of one's own people. In order not to let this interpretation of politics become debased to unscrupulousness, international life has established the concept of the settlement of interests, and diplomacy as representative of this principle. It has been diplomacy which has had an essential influence in establishing the principles of international relations and, therefore, of international law. The imperfection of international legal order is caused by the co-existence of many countries which were acting on a base of equality. Its Achillean heel was the lack of any superior authority which could have been in a position to insure the existence of legal order in the same way as the authority of a state is able to do within its own borders. For all the time unrestrained display of forces has, therefore, played a far greater part in the international sphere. Statesmen are committed to take care of their people's interests. If they fail in their politics, then the countries they were acting for have to bear the consequences, and they themselves are judged by the judgment of history. But in a legal sense they were responsible only to their proper country for acts which their country was charged with, acts looked upon as infringing international law. The foreign country injured by the action in question could not hold responsible the acting individual. The partition erected by international law, respectful of national sovereignty, between the acting individual and foreign powers, was only removed in the case of war crimes whereof I have spoken.

DEFENSE

At any rate, such was, at the beginning of World War II, the conception of international law, and it was not affected by any opposing attempts.

The French chief prosecutor gave as a reason for the indictment of leading men of the late regime the fact that a German government, which might be able to take jurisdiction in these cases, was lacking. I have the fullest esteem for this most elegant argumentation, but it cannot remain hidden to a critical observer that such a sharp logic has led to a false conclusion. Any organized resistance headed by a national government came to an end when the German Wehrmacht was utterly defeated and the whole of the German territory occupied by the Allies.

The four principal victorious powers which form this Tribunal acquired, together with actual authority, a legal title recognized by international law concerning any decision as to the fate of the German national territory. They could have divided up Germany. But they chose another way. In the Berlin declaration of June 5, 1945, they assumed "supreme authority within Germany, including all the powers possessed by the German government, the High Command and any state, municipal or local government or authority." But this was all. The declaration expressly emphasized that the transfer of the said authority did not effect the annexation of Germany.¹

The exercise of the claimed powers was transferred to the Control Commission, composed of the commanders-in-chief of the four occupation zones.

Since the Berlin declaration Germany is in a transitory state still lasting at present. At the Potsdam conference held in July

¹ "The Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the Provisional Government of the French Republic hereby assume supreme authority with respect to Germany, including all the powers possessed by the German Government, the High Command and any state, municipal, or local government or authority. The assumption, for the purposes stated above, of the said authority and powers does not effect the annexation of Germany."

1945 the four powers have come, among themselves, to further agreements, made public by means of the statement of August 2, 1945. The Potsdam "Agreement for the establishing of a Council of Foreign Ministers" transfers to the said council the preparation of a peace settlement, which is to be ratified by a German government "when a government suitable for this purpose has been constituted". A second agreement provides regulations concerning Germany under allied control. Those wordings make it clear that Germany is to remain a national state, that it is being placed under allied control and that the establishment of a German government is planned. This government is to accept, at a future date, peace conditions. This involves a government which is in a position to enter into commitments towards foreign powers as an internationally qualified partner.

The victors have accordingly chosen to exercise their power for decision given to them by conquest in such a manner as not to destroy the German state. During the transition period they themselves exercise the functions of the—temporarily nonexisting—German government. We are therefore entitled to take the Potsdam Declaration as a foothold for the legal interpretation of Germany's position. The German state, accordingly, has not been annihilated. Germany is burdened with obligations which arose from her past. This is possible only when the state upon whose attitude the obligation is based and the one who must answer for it are countenanced as one and the same legal body. Though the German State, at the moment, is not in position to act according to international law through its own organs, it has not vanished from the sphere of the international legal order.

The final deductions of Mr. de Menthon cannot be accepted in view of the fact that his suppositions are wrong. Therefore, the jurisdiction of the victorious powers over German Nationals with regard to acts connected with National Socialistic policy cannot be based on current international law. Thus, the Charter deviates from the international legal order. Furthermore it contradicts fundamental principles of criminal law.

If the French prosecutor is of the opinion that the Tribunal exercises the authority of the German state to punish, a state which according to the opinion of Mr. de Menthon does not exist at this time, then he must logically apply the sentence "nullum crimen sine lege" to the criminal law existing in Germany. An act could therefore be made punishable only if at the time of its commitment it was punishable according to the German law. This does not apply to personal criminal responsibility for the violation of international treaties and assurances as well as for the participation in the conspiracy and the common plan. In recognition of this the Control Council for Germany in its proclamation No. 3 has reinstated in the system of German criminal law, two international principles, wherefrom the Hitler Regime had deviated: namely prohibiting retroaction and analogy.

DEFENSE

The political criminal concepts of the Charter create new legal principles which have to be considered as the germ of a code of world law. Herr v. Ribbentrop, at the time these incriminating events took place, lacked the perception of such a code of world law. One can dispense with the principle, that a crime can be punished only if its elements are stated in advance only in the very few cases, in which the cruelty of the act is so evident that its deserved punishment is beyond doubt. This could hold true for crimes which, in consequence of certain measures of the abnormal amorality of the Hitler Regime, were during the last years not punished in Germany.

I have heretofore presented the evidence from the point of view of the valid international law and the Charter which you, Mr. President, in the session of 20 June 1946 have again stressed as the basis for legal findings in these proceedings. Up to now, the code of international law has been unable to solve the problems which are to be decided here. On the basis of these shortcomings, the second World War broke out. The repercussions of this catastrophe—which could not be prevented by this legal order—cannot be fully evaluated today. To prevent their recurrences in the future, this is the high aim of humanity as expressed in the treaty of London of 8 August 1945. That the objectives of this treaty could not be reached is shown with alarming certainty by the fact that on the very day on which the Charter of this Court was proclaimed as a new law of the world, the war between the Soviet Union and Japan broke out. Its possibility had been predicted to the allies of the Soviet Union six months prior to that. To justify it, it was pointed out that Russia had to settle an old account with Japan. In other words, this typifies a case of an unprovoked attack.

I have illustrated that the attack and the attacker cannot be defined by a general definition inside the sphere of the phenomena of reality. The attacker can only be branded by a World authority. This supreme organ of humanity must possess not only an actual but also a moral authority. Universal trust must be put in its impartial judgment. It must be an Areopagus which stands above the conflicting parties and before which these parties can only appear searching for justice, but not to participate in it as judges. We are in a period of transition from an old law, under whose rule the ruins around us were created, to a new code of world law, which takes shape but is as yet not morally and effectively consolidated. To judge and punish the acts which were committed by the former Foreign Minister Herr von Ribbentrop, his share in the happenings, the limits of his capability, and his own personal guilt is a difficult task, taxing human endurance almost beyond strength in this period of transgressions and development.

2. FINAL PLEA by Joachim von Ribbentrop

This trial is to serve the research of historical truth. As far as the point of view of German politics is concerned, I can say the following:

This trial will go down in history as a model example, relying upon legal formulae which up to now have not been known, to show how in all fairness one can circumvent the most pressing problem of twenty five years of human history and of our history, the Treaty of Versailles. Was it really expedient, then, to inhibit the conflict about an agreement which even those who had insight among the signers counted on to bring about evil? The wisest time already predicted from which of the faults of Versailles a new world war would arise.

More than twenty years of my life I devoted to the elimination of this evil, with the result that foreign statesmen who knew about this today write down in their affidavits that they had not believed me. They should have written that in the interests of their countries they could not believe me. I am held responsible for the conduct of foreign policy, a foreign policy which was determined by another. I knew only this much of it, that it never concerned itself with plans of a world domination, but rather with the doing away with of the consequences of Versailles and with the food problems of the German people.

If I dispute the fact that this German foreign policy planned and prepared for a war of aggression, that is not an excuse on my part. This truth is proved by the strength that we showed in the course of the Second World War and how weak we were at the beginning of that war.

History will believe us when I say that we would have prepared a war of aggression much, much better even if we did not intend to carry it through. What we intended was to take note our most elementary conditions of life, in the same way that England noted her own interests in that she made one-fifth of the world subordinate to her, and in the same way that the United States and Russia brought the largest continents of the world under their hegemony. The only difference between the policies of these countries as compared with us that parcels of land such as Danzig and the Corridor were demanded of us against our rights, whereas the other powers are accustomed to thinking only in terms of continents.

DEFENSE

Before the establishment of the Charter of this Tribunal, even the signatory powers of the London Agreement must have had different opinions about international law and politics from those held by them today. When I went to Marshal Stalin in Moscow in 1939, he did not discuss with me the possibility of a peaceful settlement of the German-Polish conflict in the background of the Kellogg-Briand Pact; but rather he let me see that if in addition to half of Poland and the Baltic countries and Lithuania he did not receive the harbor of Lithuania, I might as well return back.

The conduct of war in 1939 was not considered an international crime against peace. Otherwise I could not quite explain Stalin's telegram at the end of the Polish campaign. This reads, "The friendship of Germany and the Soviet Union is based on blood which has been shed commonly, and has all prospects of being enduring and steadfast".

I should like to emphasize that even I at the time ardently wanted their friendship. Today the nuclear problem remains for Europe and Asia; who will dominate Europe and Asia, or will the influence of Russia on the Elbe, in the Adriatic or at the Dardanelles be held back.

I shall state that Great Britain and the United States today face this same dilemma as Germany faced at the time when the negotiations were being carried out by me with Russia. I hope with all my heart for my country that they will be more successful in their result.

Just what has been proved in this trial about the criminal character of German foreign policy? Out of more than 300 Defense documents, more than 150 have been turned down without cogent reasons. But the archives of the enemy and the German were inaccessible to the Defense.

Churchill's friendly hint to me that if Germany were to be too strong it would be destroyed will be declared irrelevant in order to judge the motives of the German foreign policy. The revolution cannot be understood the more if it is to be considered from the point of view of a conspiracy.

Fate made me one of the exponents of that revolution. I mourn these awful crimes which are soiling this revolution. But I cannot measure all of them according to puritanical norms, and all the less for I have seen that even the enemy even though after total victory, neither could prevent nor wanted to prevent atrocities.

Your opinion towards the theorist concept of the conspiracy may be, but from the point of view of the critical observer it is, only makeshift. Whoever stood in a decisive position in the Third Reich knows that it is an historic untruth and the author of the Charter of this Tribunal has proved with his inventions only what the background of his thinking was.

I might just as well assert that the signatory powers of this Charter developed a conspiracy for the elimination of a brave and highly developed people. When I look back upon my actions and upon my wishes, then I can conclude only this, the only thing of which I consider myself guilty, before my people but not before this Tribunal, is that my foreign political wish remained without success.

VI. WILHELM KEITEL

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Otto Nelte, Defense Counsel

"We must approach our task with so much inner deliberation and mental integrity that this trial will later appear to posterity as the fulfillment of human longing for justice."

These words of Justice Jackson's in his opening indictment speech must be the guiding principle for all those who have been entrusted with the noble task of contributing to the search for truth in this trial. That this truth cannot be absolute, the Prosecutors, Justice Jackson and Mr. Dubost have already stated. The purpose of the indictment is not to determine the historical aspect, let alone the historical development, of this short but so tragically important period, but instead to find out whether and to what extent the defendants sitting on this bench partook in the events which have affected the entire world by their consequences and which have brought such indescribable misery upon it and not least upon the German people.

In this trial the prosecution once stated through one of its qualified spokesmen that it was its task to submit material that would incriminate the defendants, and to submit only such incriminating evidence. Thus in contrast to the principle of objective accusation which dominates the German criminal proceedings, it made clear its definitely one-sided standpoint in indictment which obliges the defense to submit all circumstances and considerations which are indispensable for an objective administration of justice. For this purpose it is first necessary to clarify certain concepts which are needed for the perception of responsibility and guilt. As far as concepts of International and Constitutional Law are concerned they have been examined and presented by Professor Dr. Jahrreiss.

DEFENSE

With regard to the sphere of the soldier I should like to make some fundamental statements.

There have been repeated references here to the concepts of soldierly conduct, obedience, loyalty, performance of duty and patriotism. It is my belief that all men recognize these concepts to be good. But is it permissible to say that not all of these concepts are unequivocal. Thus are confronted:

“Best soldierly conduct” and “militarism”,
“natural obedience” and “despicably blind obedience”,
“the categoric imperative of the performance of duty” and
“the exaggerated sense of responsibility”,
“the deep love for the country” and “chauvinism”.

We see that all these concepts can run through the scale of good and evil. The origin and the essence of these concepts is everywhere the same, but the form they take on through tradition and education, and thus the effects they have, vary greatly.

However, if this is the case, who then should differentiate and decide whether the feeling is still in the realm of good or has already reached the sphere of evil?

We are all of us living in a world whose century old striving has aimed at the creation of order. Order is certainly a relative concept, too, but it is everywhere the establishment of the relationship of human beings to each other which guarantees the best possible means of living peacefully side by side in view of the intrinsic character of each country.

This holds true both for the state and for the relationship between nations.

Who should determine in this order what is right and what is wrong? The criterion for this might be, according to hitherto acquired knowledge, only a constitutional, i.e. a national one. The drawing closer of the nations in world traffic and general civilization brought with them the result that the various national concepts became adjusted to each other in spite of many differences. It must be admitted that this process of adjustment suffered a harmful set-back through certain National-Socialist doctrines and their methods. Nevertheless, the principle remains inviolable that the criterion of right or wrong must be a national one if order is not to be dissolved. The only thing worth striving for is the adjustment of nations and national fundamental concepts to each other as is now being attempted through world organization.

If the national criterion, i.e. the national judgment of good and bad, right and wrong, was well-established in any case up to now, the concepts were never deprived of their relativity, especially when national differences existed for other reasons. A convincing example of this is the opinion expressed about the resistance movement.

All countries celebrate what is considered to be the highest form of patriotism when someone risks his life for his country and exposes himself to the greatest danger. According to the Hague Rules of Land Warfare it is a fact that such a resistance movement is forbidden. We have here a clear example of the contrast between ethical and legal evaluation. This proves that there are no absolute concepts of good and bad, or right and wrong, and that above all written law there are unwritten laws which aquit the wrong doer because he obeyed higher laws. These higher laws, however, also depend on subjective and national—i.e. collectively subjective—considerations. If men believe something to be good or right this faith may come into existence out of an actually higher law, a truly, higher idea, but it may also grow out of a misled faith, out of a false idea. Who wishes to or who is able to judge whether a faith or an idea was or was not right? History has proven that usually the successful idea is recognized as right, to a certain extent because it is the judgment of God. I do not wish to decide whether that is always true. The question here, however, is whether the people whose guilt is to be judged, acted in good faith, in accordance with such an idea and such a faith. If divine judgment has shown this faith to be wrong the question remains open whether it was for comprehensible or explainable reasons that people could believe the idea to be good.

This question constitutes the problem which concerns not only defendant Keitel but also the entire German nation. According to the speech of the French prosecution not only the defendants in this trial are the really guilty ones but the entire German nation.

The extent and importance of this thesis are tremendous. Should the Tribunal—if only in the grounds for its decision—come to the conclusion that the entire German nation is guilty, every German for incalculable time will bear the brand of Cain which finally must lead to the destruction of this people, and its dissolution.

It has been stated most authoritatively that there is no intention here of accusing the entire German people. Through unconditional surrender we are left entirely to the mercy of the victorious powers. It was said however, that the verdict of this Tribunal is to be just. Here in this court it is not clemency or inclemency which are to be the guiding principle, but justice. Justice does not mean mildness. A verdict, however, will only be just if it takes into consideration all the circumstances which underlie the actions and conduct of the defendants. There is no excuse for what has happened and for what forms the subject of this indictment. I can only try to give you an analysis. The misery, the misfortune that has fallen on the entire human race is so great that words do not suffice to express it. The German people especially after having learned the catastrophe that has befallen the nations in the West and East and the Jews, is shaken with horror and pity for the victims. The German nation knows what this misfortune means; for it is stricken as hardly any other people is, not only in the military field but through the sinister consequences of air attacks, through the loss of millions of its youth in the field, through evacuations and escapes in ice and snow. We know, therefore, what it means to be in misery, to have to suffer. But while other nations are able to look upon this misery and misfortune as a chapter of the past and, in the protection of constitutional order, have the comforting hope of returning to an orderly existence and a happy future, there still rests upon this nation the gloom of despair. By affirming the guilt of the entire nation the verdict of the Tribunal would perpetuate this despair. The German people does not expect to be acquitted. It does not expect the cloak of Christian charity and oblivion to be spread over all that has happened. The German nation is ready to the last to take the consequences upon itself. It is willing to accept its fate and to do everything to participate in removing the consequences. It hopes, however, that the souls and hearts of the rest of mankind will not be so hardened that the existing tension, in fact the existing gulf between this nation and the rest of mankind will remain.

DEFENSE

Your task, your Honors, is a terribly hard one. We not only speak different languages, all of us feel with the soul of our own country. Much of what has happened in this country will seem incomprehensible to you. The feelings of the German people in its different categories are not your feelings. One of the most essential points, especially in the case of the soldiers, seems to me the way of judging what is felt to be liberty. In this country, too, the ideal of liberty was proclaimed. All of us know that the most extreme form of liberty is anarchy. No state desires anarchy because it means surrender of its own existence. If, therefore, all countries agree that the absolute concept of freedom is never worth striving for and can never be sanctioned, there results perforce relativity of the concept of freedom. No concept has been so misused as the concept of freedom and yet every political system proclaims freedom as the greatest of all blessings.

I by no means wish to say that the concept of freedom as proclaimed by National Socialism was the right solution. What I do wish to say, however, is that National Socialism also knew the concept of freedom and made it clear to the people through propaganda that its conception of freedom was the right one. National Socialism was aided in this by the fact that under the effects of the Treaty of Versailles Germany could indeed make no claim to be really free. The limitations of its sovereignty were so pronounced and so evident that it was easy for National Socialism to proclaim the fight for the freedom of the fatherland. As long as the fatherland is recognized in the world as the highest earthly possession one will have to understand endeavors to keep this possession and one will not be able to disapprove of them even when it is an adversary who makes them. One may be of a different opinion as to the method which should be used for the realization of these endeavors, and as to how freedom is to be attained. This, however, is not decided by the individual, but by that person or those persons who hold the power in a state. Every human being wants something to hold on to in life, he must have it if he is not to fall into despair or anarchy. The national order is—besides the moral order—a firm support and the foundation of his existence and this gives him a feeling of security in his life and professional activities. It is the deep longing of all civilized men for order which finds its highest fulfillment in the institutions of the state. On the other hand the citizen must have confidence that the state, i.e. its official agencies, will safeguard law and order. In this respect it should not matter which party provides the guardians of its inviolable principles. That is just where the confidence of a nation as a whole expresses itself, namely by leaving leadership to the prevailing majority. National Socialism undoubtedly aimed at and succeeded in rousing the belief in wide circles of the German people that its endeavors were supported by the majority of the people. It thereby procured for itself the alibi of legality.

Far from all political considerations, as all the generals and admirals have testified here, the leaders of the Wehrmacht believed in the legitimacy of Hitler's government. It looked upon itself as the instrument of a legal government, as it did when the Kaiser, Ebert and von Hindenburg were Germany's representatives.

Like all tendencies, all forms of expression of a feeling, the feeling of patriotism and of a soldierly attitude bears in itself a tendency to become more radical and thereby to degenerate if external circumstances create an actual basis for it. We have experienced the exaggeration of sound national ideas and their development into national chauvinism and we can observe retrospectively how the sound soldierly idea was exaggerated by influences foreign to its nature and transformed into the militaristic way of thinking.

DEFENSE

All these developments are not desultory, which makes them easily recognizable and regulated. The driving forces are mostly not apparent to those whom they concern. They are like a poison which acts slowly and unnoticed, and the effect of which finds some day a horrible eruption. It needs no special reasoning that a part of the soldierly and military person who is being geared to a possible war, is ruggedness, and in its potentiality turns into brutality. One often finds on the part of famous, and not only German war leaders, the standpoint that the brutal war is frequently the mildest one if it leads to a quick ending. This, of course, is desired by every war leader. Once the obstacles of peace are removed by the war, all that remains is brutality. It reveals the causes of total war and the source of the terrible disaster, which resulted from it.

The Defense Counsel's Task and the Evidence

The defense has a difficult task in this trial. The German people looks to Nurnberg—and with dissension in itself. Some are skeptical and partly hostile toward the defense because they believe the defense is favoring those whom they consider as war criminals and believe that the defense wishes to prevent that just punishment be meted out to the defendants. Others say this trial is just a show, at which the defense counsels act as dummies to give the trial the appearance of a judicial procedure. Accordingly, in the view of these Germans we shall make ourselves guilty of patronizing the enemy.

We have no reason to justify our actions because by our participation at this trial we are fulfilling an obligation in line with the precept of our calling, which needs no justification.

It consists of coordinating our efforts in the interest of clarifying the truth, the importance and effects of which on the German people is today incalculable, in getting to the bottom of the causes, and in answering the question of how all this could happen.

Only the clear recognition of the cause, the forces and the people that brought on the disaster over this world will create the possibility for the future of our people to find its way again to the rest of the world.

The task of this Tribunal is not to search for the political, economic and metaphysical reasons for this second World War, and not even to examine the flow of events in its entirety, but rather to determine whether and what part these defendants played in that which the victor nations made the object of these proceedings.

The task of the defense within the framework of their cooperation in finding the truth had to consist of examining which actual and legal points, if any, could be stated in favor of the defendants. It should be said here that with all the cooperation on the part of the Tribunal shown the Defense in producing their evidence, the actual possibility of bringing on defense material was extremely limited. Justice Jackson said in his basic prosecuting speech:

"The accuser and accused are obviously * * *."

[The Tribunal ruled that these statements were an attack on the trial and ordered them omitted.—Ed.]

The document governs the hearing of evidence before this Tribunal. Against that the witnesses remain in the background. The more essential it is that we examine these documents to ascertain the possibility of their utilization and their probative value. The Prosecution has submitted as evidence to a large extent official reports which are admitted according to Article 21 of the Charter. I intended to show with respect to a number of these documents that the value of such documents is only limited. But I shall limit myself to a few fundamental arguments in this connection trusting that you, Your Honors, in examining this kind of evidence will take my statements into consideration. These numerous official reports submitted contain factual statements which to a great extent are based on witnesses' testimony. These testimonies are not always related in the form of protocols but as summarizing reports. I do not want to dispute that these testimonies of witnesses are made as deposed in the reports. However, I will not do injustice to any of the witnesses who are not known by the Tribunal, whose testimony is hard to verify for lack of a personal impression, when I say that it concerns mostly very subjective attestations. There are a number of documents in which this is clearly recognizable, in fact stated and even such in which documents hatred finds its clear expression. I can understand the hatred of these hard hit people. The suffering they had to endure was so great that one cannot expect objectivity from them. I may, however, say, too, that such personal feelings are not conducive to render the testimony of these sorely afflicted a suitable basis for finding the real truth. I am thinking of the formula of oath so often heard here on the part of witnesses: "Swear that you will tell the truth without hatred or fear, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

These official reports often contain not only factual statements, but final conclusions and judgments. Insofar, the probative value of these official reports cannot be recognized. At the present these judgments go so far, that outside the sphere of those directly involved, they level reproaches against agencies, i.e. the OKW and Keitel, without it being possible to recognize from the document itself, on what the conclusion drawn rests. As long as it is a question of the indictment of an individual like the defendant Keitel, one must have recourse to documentary proof which yields concrete facts for responsibility, or which at least reveals casual coherence. Above all, it cannot suffice in order to consider Keitel's responsibility as proved, if in such reports crimes committed by soldiers and officers of the army or of the armed forces are alleged, and we derive responsibility on the part of the defendant, Keitel, from this fact alone, because he was chief of staff of the OKW.

DEFENSE

It must be added that in these reports, military agencies have often been erroneously misquoted and confused, as for example, when the defendant Keitel is spoken of as the "High Commander of the Wehrmacht", which is called "OKW" (High Command of the Armed Forces) instead of "O.K.H." (High Command of the Army), etc. It is not always possible to decide to what extent it is a question of an erroneous conception on the part of the prosecution or whether it comes from a translation which is not in accordance with the meaning. For the purpose of examining the responsibility of the defendant Keitel, I wish to make clear to the Tribunal in a manner which excludes any doubt, what were the channels of command and competence and to this end, I have submitted two affidavits to the court:

a. "The channels of command in the East" (Document book II K 10).

b. "The development of the situation in France 1940-1945 and the military authorities" (Document book II K 13).

The latter affidavit has also been signed by the co-defendant Jodl. I will refer to these affidavits and make them the contents of my argument without reading from them.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

The reading of the general Indictment and the special Indictment in the trial briefs can be omitted here since, with the exception of the Jewish problem and the persecution of the Church, there is no part of the Indictment which the Prosecution has not raised against the defendant Keitel.

I should merely wish to point out that the original general Indictment holds Keitel responsible only for the period after 1938 and that, as the first point of the Indictment, Keitel is described as Chief of the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces of Germany. According to the evidence submitted by the Prosecution, Keitel was also held responsible for the period after 1933 although the American, British and French Prosecutions seem to have dropped the allegation that Keitel was Chief of the Supreme Command of the Army and the German Armed Forces. The indictment of Field Marshal Keitel is split, therefore, between the periods 1933 to 1938 and after 4 February 1938 until the end.

Herewith the defendant is not only indicted as a member of the conspiracy but is also accused of personally participating in all the crimes. This comprehensive indictment is a result of the space which the prosecution has devoted to the defendant in its statements. The name of no other defendant has ever been mentioned so often by the prosecution, as that of the defendant Keitel. Again and again we hear the words "Keitel—order", "Keitel's decree" and just as often "order of the OKW", "directives of the OKW" etc. in connection with Keitel's name as "Chief OKW" after 4 February 1938.

From this derives the very substance of the indictment, namely, the position the defendant Keitel occupied after 4 February 1938. But from it also derives the scope of the justification. Here, it is not a question of examining to what extent the defendant participated in the individual facts of the case, which in the long run arose from the so-called "Keitel—orders" or "OKW instructions", but what matters is the position he occupied, whether he took part and what part he took in the planning and execution of those orders and instructions, and finally and most important of all, whether his part in it was casual and culpable in the sense of the law which is to be applied here. It seems of consequence to stress from the outset several points of view which are important for the treatment of the case and for its appreciation!

1. The defendant has declared, that he admits the contents of the general indictment to be proved from the objective and factual point of view (that is to say not every individual case) and this in consideration of the law of procedure governing this trial. It would be senseless, despite the possibility of refuting several documents or individual facts, to attempt to shake the indictment as a whole. Therefore, I shall mainly confine myself to the questions concerning the subjective facts and the conspiracy and I will treat only those individual points which are of special importance as regards the personal participation of the defendant Keitel. The disproportion between the happenings and the defendant's present destiny is so great, that the defendant Keitel, out of this consideration would have to wish that such an attitude would expose him to the suspicion that he is fighting for his life, because he would have to fight at any rate out of moral constraint. But the defendant has already made it quite clear in his argumentation, that he is not fighting for his head but for his face.

DEFENSE

2. The Defendant belongs to those men who came into the public eye through Adolf Hitler's death. From 1938 onwards he was in his closest circle and was his almost permanent companion. It is clear what that means for this trial. It has often been alleged by the prosecution, that by referring to the deceased the defendants desired to unload their own responsibility upon them. If the purpose of this trial be to obtain the most faithful picture possible of events and connections, it is not fair to start out by discrediting any mention of the deceased, who—as the prosecution knows—also are the major culprits. This is especially true for the defendant Keitel, whose position, influence and actions cannot possibly be correctly judged without throwing a light upon the person of Adolf Hitler and upon his relationship with Keitel.

3. As can already be seen from Mr. Justice Jackson's speech of indictment we are dealing here with an indictment against the National Socialist system. Actually, the indictment is a global indictment against this system, split into 21 individual indictments. The individual defendants are, to a certain extent more symbolic figures of the spheres of authority of the state which was ruled by this system: the Party, Cabinet and Wehrmacht. If I understand Mr. Justice Jackson correctly, he goes even further; he says: "Above all personal forces are nameless and impersonal forces; their conflict with each other makes up much of humanity's history * * * What are the real forces which are battling here in front of you?" This statement raises a problem which, Your Honors, cannot be left unmentioned at this trial, a problem which M. de Menthon also pointed out: The importance and influence of those forces which shape fate. Fate and guilt are two poles which do not exclude each other from their respective spheres; they are ranges which overlap so that there are spheres of life and spheres of effect in which the two forces are at work which make the world move. It can only be hinted at briefly here what forces are at work which shape fate, i.e. what forces cannot be considered as originating in the conscious will of the individual defendants a sense of national unity, historic events, opinions which are rooted in traditions and environment. Therefore, I will have to go into this background insofar as it is relevant to the defendant Keitel as a person and type of one of the groups under indictment because by this means only will you be given the possibility of obtaining a correct picture of the share which the defendant Keitel had in what happened.

4. I also want to state that everything I am going to say is said with the full agreement of the defendant Keitel and insofar as aspects and facts are stated which might exonerate the defendant

Keitel, it should be taken as a contribution towards the clarification of what happened and as an answer to the question of how it could happen. He does not wish to have his position or the part which he played in this drama minimized, but he would like to prevent at the same time a distortion of the picture of his character. The defendant stated already on the witness stand that he was grateful for the opportunity this trial afforded him to give an account to the world public and the German people, of what he did and why he did it. He wishes to help to ascertain the historic truth of what happened.

I consider it my obligation to make known this opinion of the defendant Keitel because such an attitude, based on such reasons, made it considerably easier for me to conduct his defense. It was and is clear to the defendant Keitel, if one considers the horrible consequences and monstrous deeds which—without raising here the question of guilt—undoubtedly were committed by German people and which can indisputably be traced back causatively to orders and directives with which Keitel came into contact in some form, then one feels guilty without thinking about whether this is a guilt in the legal sense or the tragic feeling of being linked by fate with the causes and, thereby, also with the consequences.

The Planning on the Basis of the National-Socialist Program

The prosecution has maintained: "That at one time all the defendants had banded together with the Nazi Party for a plan about which they, indeed, knew that it could be materialized only by the outbreak of a war in Europe."

With regard to the defendant Keitel, it is said that from 1933 on he took active part in this conspiracy. To prove its thesis the prosecution stated:

- a. That the National-Socialist program in itself, i.e. according to its wording and meaning could be materialized only by using force;
- b. That the defendant Keitel recognized or should have recognized it;
- c. That with this knowledge, he, together with others, especially with the co-defendants, planned and prepared aggressive wars.

As regards these statements I would like to call the Tribunal's attention, first of all, to the principal part of Mr. Justice Jackson's bill of indictment in which he deals with the program of the Party. He mentions there a number of points of the program of which points he says: "Naturally, those were all aims which were legally unimpeachable." At a different point he says: "I do not criticize this policy, I wish it were generally recognized." Naturally, this acknowledging criticism is subject to the one limitation: "As long as these aims would be achieved without an aggressive war." According to that the prosecution itself does not presume that the wording and meaning of the Party program let the normal person recognize that these party-political aims could be materialized by use of force only.

DEFENSE

I do not wish to repeat what, in this connection, was said by the individual defendants at their hearings in court; especially convincing appeared to me what Dr. Schacht stated on this subject. He concludes his critical evaluation of the Party program with the words: "That is essentially the contents of the National-Socialist Party Program and I cannot find that something criminal lies in that." I quote this statement especially because it shows how this program and its recognizable objectives effected a person who may be characterized as intelligent, realistically thinking, free from emotional impulses in politics, of economic far-sightedness and of ability to judge.

If this personality did not recognize that the Party aims were to be materialized by use of force—how was the soldier Keitel to come to such a realization?

Keitel was an active officer. As such he could not be a member of the Party. The officers were prohibited from any political and party-political activity. The Wehrmacht command was intent on keeping the influence of Party politics away from the Wehrmacht. This was true both for the time before 1933 and afterwards. Hitler himself confirmed this principle because he clearly recognized that the time was not yet ripe for giving the corps of officers, let alone the general officers, political character. According to tradition and interpretation of their profession, these higher officers had a "national attitude", as one used to say, and they welcomed the national points of the program which were put into the foreground by Hitler, they were glad about the cooperation of the Wehrmacht and without hesitation placed themselves behind the government led by Hitler when it proclaimed the fight against the treaty of Versailles, especially against its military - political clauses. An agreement going beyond these aims or possibly a union with a political object in view did not exist. The generals, among them also Keitel, thought no different from millions of Germans who were not Party members or who were opponents, but who regarded the national aims as self-evident. Now, one cannot fail to see that it is something else if millions of Germans who have no influence, support that part of the program relating to the national aims or the high general officers who led the Wehrmacht. Furthermore, it cannot be overlooked that the materialization of these national aims carried with it the danger of a war. But the state of things seems to me to be such that the generals did not see the danger of war in the fact that Hitler wanted to realize these national aims by an aggressive war, but they saw the danger rather in the fact that an assertion of these aims would bring about sanctions by the former enemy powers. The idea of an aggressive, warlike realization was far from the generals' minds for absolutely compelling reasons of military impotency. I shall later deal more in detail with this problem which is closely connected with the rearmament. Here is only important that the circles to which Keitel belonged

1. Had no contact with the Party program.
2. Had no relationship with Party circles.
3. Sympathized with a part of the Party program because it corresponded to their national attitude.
4. Did not think of materializing these national points by an aggressive war, because it would have been hopeless in military respect.

Now one could argue that although the generals themselves did not think of waging an aggressive war, they recognized or should have recognized that Hitler had the intention, if not now, but in the near future, of waging an aggressive war.

The prosecution believes to be able to presume that the defendant Keitel had this knowledge from 1933 on. The argument of the prosecution that this knowledge is the same as the knowledge of the National-Socialist program has been refuted; the same holds true of the knowledge of the book "Mein Kampf", even if one assumes he possessed the book. Therefore, the question is only whether Keitel had knowledge of Hitler's intentions regarding an aggression for other reasons. For the period up to 1938 Keitel could not have obtained knowledge from Hitler himself, because Keitel spoke with him late in January 1938 for the first time.

The speeches which Hitler made before that time, just as those of the other Party leaders were unambiguously aimed at preserving peace. Looking back one may call it propagandistic camouflage of the opposite intentions. Would that be the case, then this camouflage successfully deceived not only many millions of Germans, but also the foreign countries which were partly critical and partly hostile towards National Socialism.

Keitel believed the protestations of peaceful intentions, saw their honesty confirmed also by official proposals of disarmament and treaties with England and Poland. He believed them the more so because, as has already been said, an aggressive war had to appear to him as an impossibility.

DEFENSE

The co-defendant von Neurath, too, declared frequently that all his information and knowledge of Hitler's policy up to 5 November 1937 justified his firm conviction that Hitler did not want to realize his political aims by force or aggressive wars. It was only by the speech of 5 November 1937 that this conviction of von Neurath's was shaken.

In the arguments by Dr. Schacht's defense to which I referred, those facts were presented which show a contradiction between the former conduct of the victorious powers and the thesis which the prosecution upholds on this question. By their official relations and beyond them the victorious powers showed that, despite the knowledge of all circumstances the defendants are being accused of, which knowledge has to be assumed, they (the victorious powers) did not believe in Hitler's intentions and/or did not recognize these intentions of realizing his aims by aggressive war.

The prosecution now accuses the defendant of having known or having had to know such intentions of Hitler. This does not appear to be convincing and I can leave it to the Tribunal which—if all possibilities are taken into consideration—had better possibilities to get information on Hitler's true intentions. I believe the defendant Keitel may claim for himself the same good faith and the same ignorance—unless this knowledge or even the participation results from other circumstances. Such circumstances during the years 1933 through 1938 may have been Keitel's activity in connection with the rearmament and in the Reich Defense Committee (Reichsverteidigungsausschuss).

The Rearmament

The charge of illegal rearmament includes two facts which have been summed up by the prosecution:

1. The secret rearmament by eluding the Treaty of Versailles,
2. The rearmament with the purpose of planning wars of aggression.

For a judicial consideration however, these facts must be kept strictly apart; since they are different with respect to cause and effect they must also be evaluated legally from different points of view.

The time between 1933 and 1938 is a fateful period, a period of development and conversion. The forces of the hitherto existing order are struggling against the new powers which have not yet taken a definite shape. Everything is in fermentation. The aims remain obscure: they are camouflaged by the existing nationalistic tendencies which have been taken over. By clever propagandistic utilization of these tendencies the psychological basis for the aims pursued by the new lords is being created without being noticed by those concerned by it.

Here lies the problem of the Armed Forces leadership and of the defendant Keitel during this period, with which I am going to deal now.

The secret rearmament in violation of the Treaty of Versailles

This problem cannot be solved without duly taking into consideration Germany's military position. In judging the then Colonel Keitel another consideration enters the picture: how the special sphere to which he belonged was affected by this situation. Keitel considered the Treaty of Versailles and especially the military clauses as a humiliation of Germany. He considered it a duty towards his country to collaborate in netting an end to this situation. He was convinced that the Treaty of Versailles, because of its impossible military and territorial stipulations, would have to be revised some day. Such a revision appeared to him imperative in the interest of justice, as well as reason, if a lasting world-peace was to be preserved. On the basis of this conviction, he believed that as a German and a Soldier, he was entitled, in the official capacities in which he acted during this period, to interpret the military stipulations of the Versailles Treaty literally even if this was in contradiction with the purpose of a stipulation. He justified this before his own conscience by considering that the stipulations limited the possibilities of development in an unbearable manner, that is, in a manner completely insufficient for an effective defense.

Without having actual interests, he did not consider it wrong for Germany under the given circumstances to construct submarines in Finland not for herself but with the purpose of gathering experience and training specialists; or to operate construction offices in Amsterdam in order to observe the progress achieved in the field of aeronautics and to make herself useful without actually building planes.

As symptom of the way democratic Germany of that time thought—without consideration of position and party—was Dr. Bruening's statement, which on 15 February 1932 was broadcast over all USA radio stations on the occasion of the meeting of the disarmament conference. I am going to quote the following passages from that speech:

“The inner-political fights in Germany are very sharp in their outside forms to be sure; but this sharpness must not lead one to overlook the fact that despite many things which cause division

DEFENSE

there exist indisputably things of common possession, also. On the two decisive foreign-political questions of today, the questions of disarmament and reparations uniform opinions prevail among the German people. The demand for equal rights and equal security is shared by the entire German people. Any German cabinet will have to uphold these demands. The fact that the fight of the parties over the roads which our politics must travel is, perhaps, sharper in Germany today than in some other countries, is a result of the deep misery which presses heavily on Germany and is deeply upsetting the people's soul."

In connection with this point I also refer to the testimony which the co-defendant von Neurath gave on 22 June 1946. These words which Bruening spoke, prove that there was a demand which was upheld by the entire people irrespective of the difference in parties: The demand for equal rights and equal security.

The objection to that is: A demand even if upheld by the entire people does not in itself create the right to violate or circumvent opposing contractual regulations.

In principle, one will accept that. However, things were not as simple as that. I do not wish to presume upon a "basic right" of all countries according to which every people must have the right of creating for itself a certain state of defense. But even if one does not want to recognize such a "basic right", one will, perhaps, understand the state of emergency which actually exists if a country is so limited in its military potential that it is not only liable to military attack by any neighbor, but also politically condemned to impotency.

In the course of the hearing of evidence the Tribunal had occasion to recognize that this was true with regard to the situation in which Germany was in 1933.

I want to call your attention to the following passages of the Marshall report which was submitted to the Tribunal. The following passages written by this outstanding soldier who summarizes the experience of a patriotic and military life as regards the point discussed here under the title "Rearmament", as follows:

"Nature is inclined to pass over weak people. The law that only the strong survive, is generally recognized * * *"

"The world does not take seriously the wishes of the weak. Weakness is too great a temptation for the strong."

"Above all, it seems to me, we must correct the tragic misunderstanding that a policy directed at security is a war policy."

The best witness with regard to this question which is so important for the defendant Keitel, is the book by the English Major General A. C. Temperley (Collins Publishers 1938) "The Whispering Gallery of Europe" for which the English Foreign Secretary of the second world war, Anthony Eden, has written a very friendly, agreeing preface; it carries particular weight because Temperley reports and judges retrospectively from the year of 1938.

[The Tribunal agreed to take judicial notice of these quotations without having them read. Defense Counsel thereupon read the following paragraph but omitted several pages of quotations.—Ed.]

[Page 165]

4. "I also name the general staffs because there is no greater illusion that they (the general staffs), taken as a whole, are in favor of war. I know the general staffs of many countries very well and have never known any general staff which would have glorified war or would have wished for war. They knew too much about it. If they advocated strength, it was because they believed in the idea that armed strength can prevent war."

In this connection I want to refer also to the statements by the following statesmen: Paul Boncour, Henderson, Briand and Cecil; these statements were submitted by Dr. Schacht's defense (Document book Dr. Schacht No. 3, Schacht Exhibit No. 12) on the same subject matter and were accepted by the Tribunal; I also want to refer to the book by Viscount Rothermere: "Warnings and Predictions" (Page 100).

In examining and deciding whether the defendant Keitel guiltily violated the military clauses of the Treaty of Versailles in the meaning of the indictment the Tribunal will have to consider the facts which have been presented. Any individual charges on this point have not been made.

It is unquestionable that from 1933 on rearmament took place in the Reich. The defendant Keitel has admitted that and he stated that in the official positions he held up to 30 September 1934 and from 1 October 1935 on he participated in this rearmament in accordance with the functions incumbent on him. Like everything the Germans do, the rearmament, too, was well conceived and organized. The prosecution collected data for that: Especially Document No. 2353-PS and the transcripts of the sessions of the Reich Defense Committee (Reichsverteidigungsausschuss).

During the judicial collecting of evidence the total picture of this period from 1933 to 1938 was not clearly defined. The prosecution arranged its presentation of evidence retrospectively and drew a conclusion from the results of the war to the motive of the rearmament, but at the same time it deduced from the fact which cannot be denied and has not been denied, namely that this rearmament could not be planned and carried out by one man, that it (the rearmament) constituted a joint plot for the purpose of aggressive wars.

DEFENSE

Where is the decisive criterion in military armaments or in preparations of a different kind for the case of war from which the conclusion may be drawn that these measures have aggressive character, i.e. are aimed at aggressive war?

In principle from the armament itself nothing can be deduced for the charged intentions; it (the armament) may, in fact it must look just the same if it is carried out for security and defense as it does in case of aggressive war.

Therefore, if the intention of rearmament for the purpose of a plot is to be determined, distinction must be made between:

a. Armament and preparations of measures which must be taken for the case of a mobilization becoming necessary, in order to be ready for defense at any time,

b. Rearmament and ordering of measures which exceed quantitatively or qualitatively the volume under a to such a considerable degree that from that fact the intention of the political leadership to begin a war will become noticeable to the party concerned, in which case the political question of whether an aggressive, defensive or preventive war is intended, may be disregarded.

Therefore, in the last analysis, the decisive question will be whether in connection with these measures the intention of the planning for an aggressive war was expressed or had become noticeable by other means or whether the measures because of their nature and volume demand the conclusive deduction that an aggressive war was prepared here.

In retrospect the events are presented as the logical chain of a development according to plan. In reality, not only were Hitler's far-aiming intentions and his planning imputed to an actual happening in which, objectively viewed, a certain causality seems to be inherent, but also the knowledge and approving support of cooperating circles were imputed to it. There can be no dispute over the statement that the economic capacity of a country, which in its totality must be regarded as armament for the case of war, will eventually get to a point which must be considered of decisive importance for solving the question of when the rearmament, i.e. the status of the entire industry essential for war, exceeds the capacity of armament for defense.

In making these considerations it has to be taken into account especially for the defendant Keitel as a soldier that until he took over the office of chief of OKW on 4 February 1938, he had not held a decisive position. Now, what part did the defendant Keitel play at that date?

a. In the field of rearmament with regard to materiel and personnel.

b. In the field of administrative and—as charged by the prosecution—military-political rearmament which was dealt with under the heading of “Reichsverteidigungsamt” (Reich Defense Council).

[Defense Counsel voluntarily omitted several pages of material on historical development of the organization but asked the Tribunal to take judicial notice of it.—Ed.]

The Justification

The prerequisite of modern warfare is not so much the exploitation and organization of the manpower of a country into military formations, but it is essentially a problem of industrial capacity and of its appropriate utilization for the production of all necessary raw materials.

This process must of necessity precede any rearmament and requires expenditure of money and even more of time. (Establishment of industrial equipment stocks.)

When Germany proclaimed its equal rights as regards its need for national defense—that is, the supreme importance of its defense—it did not have the means to help its material rearmament as they had been taken away on recognition and execution of the disarmament plan. It has been confirmed here during the trial on different hands that first 10, then 7 to 8 years were reckoned on and foreseen in order to give material equipment in the hitherto prohibited modern weapons and supplies, especially munitions, to the peace time Wehrmacht which had been disclosed to the world with the proclamation of freedom in national defense in 1935. This becomes comprehensible if one considers that even the USA with its unlimited means, which were not impaired by the effects of war, required 4 to 5 years for the necessary conversion and rearmament in this war. It results from this that rearmament, if it is intended to exceed the limits of defensive armament, is only to be achieved gradually, in the case of nations which, like Germany in 1934, have no armaments.

First stage: Creation of the prerequisites with regard to industries and raw materials (capacities) for the production of the war supplies.

Second stage: Delivering of orders to the armament industry for the first equipment of the peace-time strength of the Wehrmacht and execution of these procurement orders within the framework of the means provided by the annual budgets.

Third stage: Procurement of the ammunition and weapon supplies to be stored for the equipment of a mobile Wehrmacht, which is to be developed in the case of war from the permanent peacetimé strength in accordance with the efficiency in manpower of a nation. These supplies are to include the necessary replacements during the war.

DEFENSE

If one considers that in 1934 Germany had no modern weapons, no submarines and no military aircraft at its disposal, it can well be believed that any soldier of judgment had to assume that under the given circumstances there could be no thought of a war, let alone a war of aggression.

Accordingly, the tasks which the defendant Keitel assumed in his official capacity of chief of staff of the Wehrmacht bureau, must be considered as purely preparatory and organizational. Keitel is of course responsible for General Thomas, chief of the defense economy staff. The technical details and the extent of his activity can be seen from document 2353-PS, which is correct in essence despite the fact that Thomas, in the declaration prefixed to this historical document, now wants it to look as if he had altered his original notes and given them a more favorable turn to please Hitler, this in case of the arrest he apprehended. This does not correspond to the facts. What Thomas wrote, proves according to defendant Keitel's opinion, that a "war armament" with mobilization of the industrial capacity and its conversion toward war economy began only at the beginning of October 1939. It further proves, that the statements of the defendants which were examined here, as far as they were connected with this rearmament, and especially Dr. Schacht until 1937, are in complete agreement on the following point: that it cannot be admitted that in this period wars of aggression were desired and according to the momentary state of armament they must have appeared impossible.

But the rearment in man-power also shows the same picture during this period. The evidence has demonstrated that until spring 1938 only 27 peace time divisions were poorly equipped and that 10 to 12 reserve divisions were in preparation; at that time the Wehrmacht had no other supplies nor armaments at its disposal. If, despite this fact, and without general mobilization it succeeded by the fall of 1938 in preparing an army of almost 40 divisions for the aggression against Czechoslovakia, when at that time it had the poorest protection on its western front one can see what was the maximum war potential in those days. Under such circumstances and in knowledge of the armament situation and war potentials of neighboring countries, which were mutually united by alliances and assistance pacts, none of the generals of the old school could ever think of occasioning a war. The fact, that already one year later, in 1939, the state of German armaments was substantially improved, must primarily be traced back to the occupation of Czechoslovakia.

Finally it must be pointed out, that during this period there was no strategic plan for any aggression whatsoever. General Jodl has declared on the witness stand, that when in 1935 he came to the Wehrmacht bureau, no plan nor anything similar was in existence, except what was foreseen in the case of internal unrest. The occupation of the de-militarized Rhineland zone was not planned, but was improvised by Hitler.

The "Initial Assembly and Combat Directives of June 1937" is a general instruction for eventual and possible military conflicts.

For the sake of completeness I must also call attention to document EC-194. This is an order issued by the supreme commander of the Wehrmacht, v. Blomberg, on the subject of aerial reconnaissance and the observation of submarine movements during the occupation of the Rhine. Keitel signed and forwarded this order.

The Reich Defense Council

The Reichswehr had a permanent force of 100,000 men, as had been established by the Treaty of Versailles. It is indisputable, that in view of the size of the Reich, its unprotected borders and the way East-Prussia was cut off, this figure was absolutely inadequate for creating a feeling of internal security and the possibility of defense in the face of an attack from the outside world, such as may be considered for any country and nation an elementary right. This state of insufficiency which had been provided by the military clauses of the treaty of Versailles, was discussed before 1933 already with a view to improving it without using the actual soldiers for it. An examination was made and it was found that in case of a mobilization a series of tasks could be taken over by the civil ministries. Hereby, it was a question of tasks of a purely defensive nature, which cannot in any way be considered aggressive, they were tasks of national defense, and principally the following:

1. Protection of the frontiers by reinforcement of the customs-service.
2. Postal security by Reich post agencies (Repeater Offices),
3. Railroad protection by Reichsbahn personnel,
4. Laying of cables instead of overhead telegraph lines,
5. Construction of railroad viaducts and elimination of grade crossings on important traffic roads.
6. Construction of frontier fortifications in the east, Oder-

DEFENSE

Warthe line, Pommeranian line, Oder line (Terrainexpropriation),

7. Improvement of the maritime traffic with East-Prussian and of the railroad transit through the corridor,

8. Fortifications in East-Prussia,

9. Reinforcement of the frontier protection in East-Prussia,

10. Preparation by the Reichsbahn of mobile loading ramps,

11. Reinforcement of the "Coastal" customs service.

12. Development by the Reichpost of the radio network (amplified transmitters and receivers)

13. Manning of permanent army signal stations with post office personnel.

14. Relieving the Reichswehr from the charge of detaching soldiers for duties which can be carried out by civilian personnel.

15. Protection of the frontier passages by the local authorities (Landraete).

16. Coordination of motor vehicles etc.

The advisory body for these tasks and their execution was, up to 1933, the committee of advisers (Referentenausschuss). It consisted of advisors coming from the different civil ministries, who after being recognized by the ministry of the interior (Severing up to the end of 1935) met for conferences at the Reich ministry. The Reichswehr minister charged the then Colonel Keitel to direct these meetings. At the latter the advisers received and discussed the desires of the Reich ministry as regards the aforementioned tasks which the individual ministers could take over in case of a mobilization.

During Minister Severing's time this cooperation worked without friction in order to satisfy as far as possible the wishes of the Reichswehr minister, and it went on in the same way after 30 January 1933. The scope of the tasks and the composition remained the same. When on 4 April 1933, a Reich Defense Council was established through a resolution of Hitler's new Reich government, the committee was maintained, it changed only its designation: the committee of advisers became the Reich Defense Committee, it did not change its field of action and was not charged with any new competency. It only grew in size as it went on developing, especially after the introduction of general military service. Now as before, the Reich Defense Committee was a body, which had to give advice in questions of national defense concerning the civilian sector and which had to be prepared and also partly taken over by the civil ministries. For this count of the indictment it must be made quite clear, that after 4 April 1933 Keitel's position did not change either, and especially that he did not become a member of the Reich Defense Council.

The Reich Defense Council, which has taken up a lot of room in the statements of the prosecution, may be considered as factually non-existent according to the result of the evidence produced —later on I will come back to the time after 1938—in any case, the prosecution could not prove that there was any session of the Reich Defense Council during this period. The protocols submitted dealt without exception with the sessions of the Reich Defense Committee and the members of this committee reported to their competent ministries, which in turn, had the opportunity to give, in the framework of the cabinet, the necessary concrete form to the suggestions and proposals discussed in the Reich Defense Committee. For this reason there were never any sessions of the formal legally existing Reich Defense Council, so that witnesses could rightly say that the Reich Defense Council existed only on paper.

Up to 30 September 1933, as colonel and section chief in the War ministry, and later, from October 1935, as brigadier general (Chief in the Wehrmacht bureau of the Reich war minister), Keitel was a member of the Reich Defense Committee.

Therefore, from 30 September 1933 to 30 September 1935 he was not at the war ministry, and thus had no function connected with this count of the indictment. During this time also he did not participate in sessions of the Reich Defense Council, the protocols of which have been presented by the prosecution as having a specially probative value.

The session of 22 May 1933, denoted as the 2nd session of the working committee of advisers (Referenten), was the last session in which Keitel participated before being transferred to duty with the troops. The first session after his transfer to the Reich War Ministry was held on 6 December 1935; it is put down as the 11th session of the Reich Defense Committee. And, therefore, in the examination of Keitel's responsibility, although one has to exclude the above protocols (Document EC-404 and EC-405) as well as the work done in general by the Reich Defense Committee during the two years of sessions 3 to 10, I will nevertheless make them the subject of my statements, as it is from these protocols that one can see what the Reich Defense Committee was doing.

Only the knowledge of these protocols makes it clear, why the creation of an institution, which exists in this or some other form in every country, and which serves the purpose of national defense deemed legitimate by every country has now been presented as an important argument in the evidence given of plans and preparations in view of aggression.

DEFENSE

The protocols of the sessions of the Reich Defense Committee in 1933, and 1935, reveal the character of the work as that of preparations for the event of war. But it is likewise evident, that it is a question of preparations which were intended to bring about a more perfect degree of readiness in national defense in case of mobilization.

If the "political situation" is mentioned twice, these allusions point to the fear in neighboring states of military sanctions. Reference is made to the case of Abyssinia, which led to sanctions against Italy.

Everything is rooted in the thought of overcoming that state of military impotency, which made it impossible to secure the open frontiers of the Reich.

The ever-returning necessity for secrecy can only be considered as fear deriving from the situation at the time that the publishing of measures, though of a defensive nature, would produce preventive measures on the part of the victorious powers (Italy).

That these suspicions were well grounded is shown by the intransigent attitude of certain states after the complete disarmament of Germany.

This question is important for Keitel's attitude, for he affirmed that the conclusion drawn from the prescribed secrecy was erroneous and that the secrecy was a proof of a bad conscience, and the bad conscience a proof of knowledge of illegality.

The Committee of the Reich Defense never insisted that it was an advisory body in matters of national defense insofar as the civilian sector was concerned by a mobilization. At no time did it ever indulge in discussions concerning rearmament as regards manpower or material or concerning plans of aggression.

The prosecuting authorities have tried in one instance to show proof that the Committee of Reich Defense was contemplating plans for aggression. Here we deal with the liberation of the Rhine River. This came up in Goering's testimony.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

The true nature of the Committee's activities is set out quite simply and clearly in the "Book of mobilization for the civilian administration". (Documents 1639-PS and 1639a-PS). It refers to the result of discussions between all the members of the Reich Defense Committee and is an appendix to the mobilization plan of the Wehrmacht as well as to that of armaments.

These three mobilization plans taken all together form the basis of your decision. You may see from them whether the prosecution is right in its supposition of a total planning of aggressive wars—or whether the defendant Keitel was right when he stated during his hearing: "What has been discussed and planned here is what every country is entitled to do and what the responsible agencies are bound to do, if they do not wish to violate their most sacred duty, namely the safeguarding of the security of their land".

The decision of 4 February 1938 was fateful for General Keitel as well as for the German Wehrmacht.

For Keitel who could not yet form an opinion of the newly-created office of the "Supreme commander of the Wehrmacht" with the high sounding name; for the Wehrmacht, which lost on that day its (relative) independence. Hitler broke down the last barriers between himself and the Wehrmacht—the nation in arms—by removing both the Commander in Chief of the Wehrmacht and the constitutionally responsible Reich Minister of War. This truly portentous decision became fatal for Keitel and the German nation, though at the time of its occurrence this was not realized by the participants. That they may be blamed for not realizing it, it is easy to say now in retrospect. At the time, everybody who was not an inveterate sceptic or pessimist, had to base his judgment on the development of things in general and on the strength of the personalities involved. Neither the one nor the other could be clearly seen on 4 February 1938.

For the defendant Keitel, who did not know Hitler personally in those days and who met him for the first time as man to man in the preliminary discussions, the decision was none of his own. Hitler assigned him to the newly created office of Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht and Keitel accepted it. Even if we disregard entirely the human emotions connected with such a seemingly brilliant promotion, there was no reasonable ground for the Chief of the Wehrmacht office in the Reich Ministry of War (RKM) to decline the offer, since von Blomberg himself had proposed him. The way Hitler considered this office could not be discerned by Keitel.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Dr. Lammers says the following about the origin of the Fuehrer's decree of 4 February 1938: "In the future I shall not have any Minister of War neither will I have in the future a Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht, to stand between me, the highest commander, and the other high commanders of the Wehrmacht."

Field Marshal von Blomberg declares in the affidavit I have submitted: To question 24: "He asked for a suggestion for the assignment of a "Chef du Bureau", who would direct and carry out current affairs under him and thus under Hitler's responsibility. I named Keitel, who, under me, had carried out this office very well." To question 27: I proposed Keitel as "Chef du Bureau", believing that I had put him on the right job. To question 29: Question: "Was it not Hitler's intention to create a tool for himself in the person of Keitel, whose capacity for organization and hard work seemed to him valuable, as an executive organ for his decisions and command?" Answer: "This question is emphatically confirmed by me. Hitler's original intention at that time was most certainly to have at his disposal a trustworthy subordinate organ and in no way an adviser, who claimed some responsibility."

DEFENSE

The decree of 4 February 1938 regarding leadership in the Wehrmacht is known to the Tribunal, so I do not have to read it to you. It results therefrom for the position of the defendant Keitel and the questions of his competence and responsibility as well as from the hearing of witnesses (statements of Goering and the Chief of the Reich Chancellery, Reich Minister Dr. Lammers, and affidavits of Grand Admirals Doenitz and Raeder) that:

1. Hitler did not want either a responsible minister of war, or any other person but himself to exercise the commanding authority over the entire Wehrmacht. He united in his own person both of these institutions by declaring that in regard to the commanding authority he would from now on exercise it directly and personally as well as the functions of the Reich Minister of War, which were to be administered by Keitel under his instructions.

2. Hitler also created a military staff as advisory council in military technical matters. He designated it as the High Command of the Wehrmacht. It was nothing more than the military chancellery of the Fuehrer and Highest Commander. Such chancelleries were already existing as Reich Chancellery, Chancellery of the President and Party Chancellery. The defendant Keitel was assigned to the the post of Chief of the military chancellery with the title Chief of Staff of the High Command of the Wehrmacht (named for short: Chief OKW).

3. Hence it follows that the OKW was not intended to be an intermediary agency between the supreme commander of the Wehrmacht and the three Wehrmacht sections. The contrary assumption of the prosecution, which is connected with a graphic representation, is founded upon an erroneous judgment. An intermediary level between the supreme commander and the three high commanders of the Army, Navy and Air Force as existed before the 4 February 1938, with rights of its own, no longer existed now. The OKW, in which the defendant Keitel was the Chief of Staff, was no independent military agency or authority, but exclusively Hitler's military-technical staff and his war ministry office. The OKW had no independent authority whatsoever, neither the power to issue orders nor the military authority. Therefore, the OKW could not issue its own orders. All instruction decrees, general directions or orders issued by the OKW were rather the expression of the desires of the supreme commander of the Wehrmacht. The commanders-in-chief of the three Wehrmacht branches were always aware of the fact that no intermediary level existed between them and the supreme commander. They never considered or recognized the OKW as such. This is confirmed by the affidavits of the co-defendants Grand Admirals Doenitz and Raeder as well as by the testimony of Reich Marshal Goering and Dr. Lammers. It is an entirely erroneous conception that the OKW, or in this case the defendant Keitel as chief of the OKW, would have had the authority to issue instructions or orders on his own. Every official business relation, oral or in writing, which went beyond an exchange of ideas with other military agencies or authorities was subject to the exclusive decision of supreme commander himself. The OKW was merely the executive staff of the supreme commander.

4. Therefore, when documents issued by the Supreme Commander or by the OKW show signatures or initials of the defendant Keitel (or those of a division chief or a section chief, in the OKW), one can derive therefrom the conclusion that an own, independent authority issuing orders existed. In each instance it was a case of taking notice of, forwarding or transmitting the orders of the supreme commander himself. Because of the heavy claims on Hitler's time in his position as Chief of State, Reich Chancellor, Party Leader and Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht it was impossible to obtain always the personal signature, unless it concerned matters of particular importance or fundamental significance. It has to be noted that in all cases Hitler's personal decision or approval had to be obtained.

If in this state of affairs, the prosecution advocates the conception that because of the signing of documents or because of existence of initials the defendant Keitel is co-responsible for the factual contents of the documents, this cannot be accepted. It would be going by the letter of the law to derive the responsibility of the defendant Keitel as chief of the military chancellery from his forwarding or signing of orders, instructions and such, a responsibility which, in my opinion, can be laid only upon that person who issues or brings about the order by virtue of his authority.

DEFENSE

A real responsibility for this could be laid upon the defendant Keitel only in case it would be proven that he willfully and casually participated in deciding these orders, instructions, etc.

5. In order to clarify as much as possible this question which is so decisive for the defendant Keitel I would like furthermore to point out the following:

The instructions which were of fundamental significance for the planning of military operations, are operational orders issued to the Commanders-in-Chief of the three Wehrmacht branches by the Supreme Commander in this capacity. Before these instructions were composed Hitler discussed with the competent OKW officers, also with the defendant Keitel, the military-technical aspect of the order. The instructions, without considering the opinions manifested by the individual officers, were exclusively the expression of the Supreme Commander's wishes.

They were not intended for the OKW but for the Commanders-in-Chief of the three Wehrmacht branches to whom they were forwarded through the OKW. Thereupon the three Wehrmacht branches for their part ordered, on the basis of the general instructions, the details for the carrying out of what the instructions stipulated. Therefore I shall not refer in this connection to the statement of the Charter according to which the carrying out of orders is not accepted as a legal ground for exclusion, because the transmission of the order was not an order issued by the OKW to the Wehrmacht branches but the forwarding of the expression of the wishes of the Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht. The order directed to the OKW, if one wants to express it that way, referred in all cases to the elaboration upon some desire expressed by the Supreme Commander and to the purely external act of transmitting the ready-made decision without having the authority of expressing an opinion on this decision.

6. It must be assumed that the prosecution, perhaps influenced by the defendant's rank of Field Marshal, did not recognize correctly this position of the defendant Keitel. This rank was in no proportion to the real authority of the defendant to issue military orders. One is inclined to imagine that a General Field Marshal is always a military chief. However as we have seen the defendant Keitel had no authority to issue orders, whatsoever.

Field Marshal v. Blomberg, whose testimony has been submitted to the Tribunal by the prosecution, defines the position of the defendant Keitel as Chef du Bureau (Office Chief). This definition is materially correct. A Chef du Bureau has to take care that the bureau which he directs operates orderly, that the affairs are correctly and promptly settled by the competent officials. But he does not participate in the final decisions considered by his superior, here the Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht, as being correct. While this principle holds already true in general, it is especially true here. It is known that Hitler did not accept any advice concerning military decisions. This has been proven through the hearing of evidence, particularly through the testimony of General Jodl.

7. The defendant Keitel has clearly outlined in the Affidavit K No 8 the activities of the OKW as "Coordination in the state and in the Wehrmacht". The affidavit gives an idea of the difficult and unthankful work of the defendant Keitel.

It consisted mainly of a coordination of the desires and needs of the Wehrmacht branches. It consisted furthermore of the settlement of arising divergencies and of a struggle against Hitler's negative attitude towards any orderly settlement, i.e. through the competent channels.

In any branch of the armed forces there are interests which differ from the interests of other branches and which cannot be entirely satisfied; sometimes they even oppose each other. This is true especially for the replacement of personnel but also for the supply of everything that is required for special warfare.

The point of intersection of all these factual and personal differences of opinion was the OKW. .

If one desires to rate at its true value the incontestable fact that the defendant Keitel was shown hostility, and was personally judged unfavorably by nearly all sides, one must note that this fact occurred as a necessary result of the overlapping of factual interests and personal differences of opinion which Keitel tried to settle by means of coordination or mediation, i.e. in nearly all cases by means of mutual compromising. No particular personal experience is needed in order to know that the objective mediator will always incur the ingratitude of both parties.

The same picture becomes evident in the relationship to the numerous offices which were provided with special official authorities or which had Hitler's favor and special confidence for personal, mostly party-political reasons.

One must realize these differences and overlapping interests to appreciate the heavy burden of work involved in Keitel's position.

The realization of the special relationship between the leadership of the Armed Forces and the political sector is the more difficult as the functions of the High Command of the Armed Forces, of the Reich Minister of War and of the Chief of State were embodied in the person of Hitler, since February 4th, 1938.

Therefore, since February 4th, 1938, complete accord existed between the political leadership and the leadership of the Armed Forces due to the identity of the person.

DEFENSE

The assumption suggests itself—and the Prosecution made it—that the chief of Hitler's military staff was so closely connected with its superior, Hitler, that he must be responsible for the political complexity, if not as the perpetrator, then in some form as provided in Article 6 of the Charter. This assumption is erroneous.

In this connection there is no need to enter into the hierarchy of the Fuehrerstate and the compelling character of a military order (compare Prof. Jahrreiss' presentation). The military hierarchy is older than the National Socialist ideology; at any rate, it must be said—and considered on your part—that the introduction of the absolute Fuehrer principle into the Wehrmacht signified the final elimination of all endeavors which in a sense could be considered as democratic, or in any event as curbing dictatorial designs. In this connection I wish to refer to Keitel's affidavit, Document Book II No. K9 "OKW and General Staff". The rigid enforcement of the Fuehrer principle—judged in retrospect gradually sharpened the sound military obedience principle to an exaggerated militarism. This found expression among others in the prohibition of any criticism from the lowest to the highest levels (Hitler's speech at the Kroll Opera House 1936 or 1937), in the abolition of endorsements expressing divergent opinions 1938 (Aufhebung des abweichenden Aktenvermerkes) (statement by General Winter), in the prohibition of requests by Generals to resign, and finally, in the elimination of the Commander-in-chief of the Armed Forces and of the Minister of War. It cannot and should not be denied here that the defendant Keitel was an absolute follower of the Fuehrer principle in the Wehrmacht leadership, and that the study "Basic Considerations Regarding the Organization of the German Wehrmacht", document L-52, may be looked upon as his confession concerning the leadership in a future war, however, without a concrete war having been foreseen at that time or having prompted the writing of this study.

What does this mean for the defendant Keitel?

Whoever recognizes the Fuehrer principle as militarily correct, must act accordingly. Professor Jahrreiss demonstrated that the Fuehrer principle—like another political system—is not absolutely good or bad, but that everything depends on the ways and means of carrying out the principle and on the methods of realization. Keitel has a military background and favors the Fuehrer principle for the field he knows. According to this principle the responsibility lies positively with the one who has the authority to command. While the Fuehrer principle in fact hardly underwent any change in the civilian province, where it was also applied but where it amounted to no more than superficialities, this principle necessarily made itself felt much more strongly and obviously in the military sphere, particularly in the relationship between the Commander-in-chiefs and their Chiefs of the General Staff.

Formerly the Chiefs of the General Staff had been the materially responsible Commanders, now they became the operational assistants to the Commanders. In the formulation of orders they were "collaborators", advisers in the field of strategic operations, for which these officers had been especially trained.

Keitel was—that is certain—neither a Commander nor Chief of the General Staff, he was the Chief of the Military Office (Militäerkanzlei) under Hitler, soldier and administrator of war ministerial duties; therefore minister, claims the Prosecution.

One should not refer in this trial to distinctions which turn out to be formalistic when the real functions give another picture. This is particularly important in the case of Keitel. It should be determined what he actually was and how he acted in reality.

The dual position created by the decree of February 4, 1938, leads to an erroneous understanding of Keitel's functions. To begin with Hitler dissolved the Reich Ministry of War because he no longer wished to have a Minister of War; in spite of the fact that on the 4th of February 1938 a considerable number of functions, handled up to then by the Reich Ministry of War, had been assigned to the individual Wehrmacht branches, the OKW retained a number of functions and their administration.

To do justice to the intended strict concentration of functions pertaining to the war leadership, Keitel was not at liberty to attend to these on the basis of his complete authority according to his own judgment, but he had to present the demands of the Wehrmacht and coordinate the Wehrmacht's affairs with the duties of the other ministries.

It cannot and will not be denied that this concentration of duties in the person of Hitler was in practice unfeasible. Thus, an extensive amount of preparatory and executive work rested with Hitler's military staff, (Arbeitsstab) whose Chief of Staff was Keitel. Hence also, the responsibility. But not with reference to important questions, especially those of a fundamental nature. It was, of course, a matter of judgment to what extent the defendant Keitel considered matters essential and fundamental and submitted them. But the evidence showed that when in doubt, Keitel was inclined to present matters rather than to make his own decision, after he had examined them conscientiously.

DEFENSE

The sources from which Hitler got his news were so intricate that Keitel had no way of knowing whether Hitler got the news that seemed important to him through his adjutants, through Himmler and Bormann or in some other way. To avoid afterwards the unavoidable discussions with Hitler who, being distrustful of everyone, always took it for granted that people would intentionally conceal things from him, Keitel was anxious not to leave himself open to reproaches for having omitted something. A characteristic example is the case of the mass escape of 80 RAF officers from Camp Sagan.

In this connection the point is simply to state that Keitel in his capacity as custodian of the functions of the ministry of war, which still remained in the OKW, held no position as a Minister. Here, too, he was the chef du bureau, the head of the military office, a position which is also held by the chief of a ministerial office, or even a state secretary. I wish to refer in this connection to Dr. Lammers' statement, already referred to by me (page 5358 of the German transcript), and to the affidavits of Grand Admirals Raeder and Doenitz which I have already mentioned here repeatedly.

The text of the Fuehrer decree of February 4, 1938 shows that Hitler wished to make this clear (1915-PS). If Hitler had not had the desire to exclude every third person from a responsible and perhaps to him uncomfortable function at the highest military sector, he might have given Keitel at least the authority to take part in Cabinet meetings. In the Fuehrer decree (2098-PS), in which the Commanders-in-Chief of the Army and Navy as well as Keitel had been given the "rank" of a Reichs Minister, it was explicitly stated that both Commanders-in-Chief shall be entitled to take part in Cabinet meetings. The fact that this was decreed simultaneously is a convincing argumentum e contrario. It proves that Hitler did not wish that his Chief of Staff of the OKW may perhaps have the opportunity to present his own opinions and possible doubts before the Cabinet.

That Hitler gave the defendant Keitel the "rank" of a Reich Minister had the purpose of enabling him to carry on direct negotiation with the departmental ministers (Ressortministern). Had Keitel not have had the rank of a Reich minister, he would have been limited to conferences with state secretaries and such, thus very handicapped in carrying out the Fuehrer's orders and tasks.

It is erroneous, therefore, that the Prosecution termed Keitel as Reich minister, even as Reich minister "without portfolio". He was no minister, and was no member of the Reich government. State Secretary Stuckart in a document submitted to the Prosecution has listed all members of the Reichsregierung. Keitel is not among them; he is mentioned in this document only as the holder of one of the highest offices.

Now, the Prosecution has not limited the term Reichsregierung to membership in the Reichscabinet, but considered other branches as part of the Reichsregierung, too. It would seem, therefore, as if the Prosecution looked upon the legal structure based on German Law as irrelevant. Pursuant to appendix B to the general Bill of Indictment the Reichsregierung is according to the indictment composed of:

1. Members of the regular Cabinet after the 30 January 1933, the day Hitler became Chancellor of the German Republic. The expression "regular Cabinet" used here means: Reich Minister, i.e., Head of Departments of the Central Government; Reich Minister without portfolio, Minister of State with the function of Reich Ministers and other officials entitled to participate in the Cabinet meetings.

[The Tribunal objected to the length of Dr. Nelte's speech on Keitel's position.—Ed.]

Through the hearing of evidence (testimonies by the witnesses Reich Marshal Goering, Dr. Lammers, von Neurath, Keitel, Raeder, Doenitz) it was proved that despite the Fuehrer decree of 4 February 1938 (Document 1915-PS) there never was a Secret Cabinet Council, that such council was never set up, that it never held a session and no persons involved ever received a commission. Thus, it is proved that the defendant was never a member of the Secret Cabinet Council.

It is true that Keitel was a member of the Ministerial Council for the Defense of the Reich. Witness Dr. Lammers has confirmed that becoming a member of the Ministerial Council for the Defense of the Reich did not change Keitel's official position, and especially did not make him a minister. In his affidavit of 25 November 1945, the co-defendant Dr. Frick says that Keitel worked in the Ministerial Council for the Defense of the Reich as "liaison man".

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

In order to clarify the defendant Keitel's responsibility and competence it is necessary to analyze the concept of OKW. I ask that this statement be not considered a theoretical and, therefore, superfluous discussion.

[At this point, Defense Counsel voluntarily omitted material that he would furnish in writing to Tribunal.—Ed.]

In order to see clearly what part Keitel played in reality and what share he had in the happenings, as a whole after investigating his legal competencies, I now wish to examine what actual influence he had upon the development and carrying out of the measures the effects of which constitute the subject of this trial. And from everyday experience we know that it does not matter so much what a person should be in a particular position, but what he has made of that position by virtue of his personality.

DEFENSE

I believe I may say that in the course of this trial the personality of no other defendant has been judged in such varying and contradictory ways as that of the defendant Keitel.

Keitel's material responsibility is proportionate to his actual position in the tug-of-war with and around Hitler, his effective influence upon that group, and with it on those circumstances as a whole which could prove the cause of the effects of Hitler's Headquarters in the military field.

I shall deal with this fundamental complex when taking up the charges made by the prosecution against Keitel, on the strength of the cross-examination of Dr. Gisevius, in other words after presentation of evidence has been completed.

In view of the comprehensive scope of Justice Jackson's questions and the answers given thereto by Dr. Gisevius, the testimony of Dr. Gisevius has become of tremendous importance in the case of the defendant Keitel.

Were Dr. Gisevius' statements about Keitel true, i.e. statements made by him in most instances in terms of conclusive findings, derived from information, the defendant Keitel would not have told the truth during the presentation of evidence. The importance of that fact becomes evident when it is considered that a negative opinion on truthfulness would of necessity destroy Keitel's defense, which in its essence draws on the subjective aspect of facts, as a whole. In view of this fact and the importance of the testimony of Dr. Gisevius also for other defendants, it becomes my duty not to leave anything undone to explain the contrast between Keitel's answers and the testimony of the witness Gisevius.

Experience has taught that dead witnesses are the best witnesses because the rendering of their purported utterances cannot be directly refuted. Testifying on the strength of information belongs to another group of statements which almost defy refutation.

The testimony of Gisevius combines both possibilities in that he bases his testimony primarily on information obtained from witnesses who are dead. It seems to me that Justice Jackson uses Dr. Gisevius as star-witness in his global attack on the defendant Keitel. After completion of presentation of evidence against Keitel he did not bring forward one individual circumstance but an indictment on all counts. * * *.

The counter-presentation of evidence is concerned, on the one hand and as far as possible, with proving the objective incorrectness of facts based upon information obtained from certain individuals, and, further, with establishing proof of the unreliability of the information. I call to mind the words which the defendant Keitel said under oath upon completion of his direct examination by me while in the witness box:

"One may hold it against me that I was wrong and made mistakes, that my attitude toward the Fuehrer Adolf Hitler was wrong and weak, but it should not be said of me that I was a coward, that I was untruthful and that I was disloyal".

I repeat in condensed form the charges made against the defendant Keitel, during interrogation by the Prosecution (proceedings of 26 April 1946, pages 8378 to 8385), as follows:

1. Keitel built an impenetrable ring round Hitler so that the latter could be told nothing.

2. Keitel failed to pass on to Hitler reports he had received from Canaris whenever such reports covered atrocities, crimes and the like, or he gave orders to modify them.

3. Keitel had a tremendous influence on the OKW and the army.

4. Keitel threatened his subordinates, when they made political statements that he would not protect them, he even said that he would turn them over to the Gestapo.

1. Dr. Gisevius says in one part of his statement that Keitel had no influence over Hitler. He exonerates Hitler by explaining that Keitel had formed a ring round Hitler, in order that the latter should be told nothing.

The English and American prosecution, in their indictment, called Keitel a powerful staff officer, who had exerted great influence over Hitler; the French prosecution described Keitel as a willing tool of Hitler; the German generals called him a yesman who could not carry anything through, and now Keitel grows, according to the statement of Dr. Gisevius, into a real handy-man and buffer of Hitler, who hid from the latter anything bad, who submitted to him only what he (Keitel) saw fit, and permitted no one to approach Hitler.

a. The prevention of access to Hitler by Keitel, as asserted, can only be maintained by somebody who did not know the conditions prevailing around Hitler. Before the war Keitel worked in Berlin in the Bendler Strasse, while Hitler was in the Wilhelmstrasse (Reich Chancellery). Keitel came perhaps once a week to report, or on special order. At that time, on account of space conditions it was in fact impossible for Keitel to exert any influence over access to the Fuehrer.

DEFENSE

b. It was equally impossible, when Hitler was at the Berghof near Berchtesgaden for weeks at a time whilst Keitel remained in Berlin.

c. At the beginning of operations, Keitel was with Jodl and the Supreme General Staff (W.F.St.) at the Fuehrer's Headquarters (FHQu). Here also they were separated. Keitel did not sit in Hitler's anteroom, but rather in other buildings or barracks. He came at the proper time with General Jodl to the conference on the situation, in which, besides Hitler, some 15 or 20 officers of all three branches of the Wehrmacht took part, apart from the conferences on the situation there was no physical contact. When Hitler wanted Keitel for anything he sent for him.

d. Personally and physically there was closer contact in Berlin between Hitler and his adjutants, the chief of the Party Chancellery, the chief of the Presidential Chancellery and the chief of the Reich Chancellery. Keitel not only could not decide who could see Hitler, he also could not possibly prevent anybody going to Hitler.

e. Hitler's sources of information were the responsible heads of each department; it was occasionally not clear whence Hitler obtained his information.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Gisevius did not know these conditions from his own experience; he never was himself near Keitel, who never saw or spoke to him, and whose name he did not know. If he gave his opinion here, he could only base it on information given him by Canaris, Thomas and Oster.

General Jodl has been heard regarding this question. He certainly is the best witness in this matter, since he, as well as Keitel, lived in the immediate vicinity of Hitler and therefore could form his own judgment. He stated concerning this matter:

"Unfortunately, it was impossible to keep things from Hitler. Many channels of information led to Hitler direct."

Upon my interrogation, at the suggestion of the Tribunal, Jodl confirmed that what Keitel deposed was quite correct, and that which witness Gisevius stated was in general, merely a figure of speech.

The co-defendants, Grand Admirals Raeder and Doenitz, have confirmed that the assertion of witness Gisevius that Keitel was able to keep the high commanders of the branches of the Wehrmacht away from Hitler is false. If, however, this was not the case, it follows that the way from the branches of the Wehrmacht to the Fuehrer was open at any time.

Through the hearing of witnesses it was also established that apart from Jodl, the Chief of the Supreme General Staff, and also in particular Canaris, had immediate access to Hitler.

Thus the accusation of witness Gisevius, that Keitel had formed a ring round Hitler is proved false.

2. The treatment of the statements.

The witness Gisevius has declared that reports were submitted to Keitel by Canaris about atrocities in connection with deportations, extermination of Jews, concentration camps, the persecution of the church and the killing of insane persons, which Keitel withheld from Hitler.

The same is alleged about the reports of General Thomas, Chief of the Defense Economy office, the purpose of which was to inform Hitler about the war potential of the enemy and bring him to reason. Concerning Admiral Canaris' reports, it must be said, that as chief of espionage and counter intelligence he naturally delivered regular reports which concerned the conduct of the war including the conduct of economic warfare.

It is affirmed here that reports were submitted on subjects which belonged neither to the jurisdiction of the Counter Intelligence Office nor of the Army High Command (OKW). It has been proved, that Hitler took strict care that every worker confined himself to his own special field and it was particularly forbidden to military offices to concern themselves with political affairs.

Keitel has declared under oath that he knew nothing about the atrocities and especially about the extermination of the Jews, and the concentration camps. This is in absolute contradiction to the assertion of the witness Gisevius that Canaris submitted reports to the defendant Keitel on the above mentioned subjects. One can affirm that reports of any kind whatsoever were delivered to Keitel without having to fear being contradicted, especially when one does not have to fear that these reports will be found. For if they are not delivered, neither can they be found, because they do not exist. Now Gisevius has declared that he gathered documents from the beginning which contained incriminating material. Is it not remarkable, under these circumstances, that up to now, none of these reports have been produced. If they were on hand at the Army High Command (OKW) they were to that extent an object of the accusation and the evidence. Can it be sufficient under these circumstances if a witness declares he knows from third parties that such reports were submitted to Keitel?

Canaris, because of his particular situation, which sent him constantly to foreign countries on personal, secret errands for Hitler, had access to Hitler at all times. He would thus have had an opportunity to go to Hitler immediately if he had had serious misgivings of conscience, as Gisevius has declared he did. Why did he not do so?

DEFENSE

Now Gisevius who in general has pronounced global and damning accusations, has luckily for Keitel, at one point of his deposition made a positive declaration that permits of objective verification. (Page 8379/80 of the German transcript) :

* * * I believe that I have still two examples to mention, which to me are particularly characteristic: First, the attempt was made by all possible means to induce Field Marshal Keitel to warn Hitler against the invasion of Holland and Belgium, that is, to inform Hitler that the information submitted by Keitel about alleged violations of neutrality by the Dutch and Belgians was false. The Counter Intelligence Office (Abwehr) was to prepare reports incriminating the Dutch and Belgians. Admiral Canaris at that time refused to sign these reports. I request that this be verified. He told Keitel repeatedly that this report which was ostensibly made by the Army High Command (OKW) was false. This is an instance where Mr. Keitel did not transmit to Hitler what he was supposed to have transmitted * * *."

I have submitted to Colonel General Jodl, here, on the witness stand Document 790-PS which refers to the case of the White Book about violations of neutrality by Holland and Belgium. Jodl testified, word for word:

[Page 10942/43 of the German minutes]

"* * * I understand the question and would like very briefly to state the fact, as it really was, so long as disgust does not choke me. I was present when Canaris came to the Field Marshal in the Reichs Chancellery with these report notes and laid before him the project of the Foreign Office's White Book. Field Marshal Keitel then looked through this book, above all listening to the chief remarks which Canaris made at the request of the Foreign Office, namely, that the reports were perhaps still susceptible of some improvement, that he should confirm the fact that a military operation against Holland and Belgium was absolutely necessary, and that as it is expressed here, a final really striking violation of neutrality was still lacking. Before Canaris had said a word, Field Marshal Keitel threw the book on the table and said; 'I refuse to do this, how does it happen that I should take any responsibility for a political decision. In this White Book appear word for word, true and correct, the very same reports that you, yourself, Canaris, brought to me.' To this Canaris said: 'I am entirely of the same idea. It is, in my opinion too, entirely superfluous to have this document signed on the part of the Wehrmacht and the reports that we have here, are in their totality completely sufficient to prove the violations of neutrality which have taken place in Holland and Belgium.' And he advised Field Marshal Keitel not to sign it at all. That is the way it happened. The Field Marshal then took the book with him and I do not know what happened subsequently * * *." Keitel did not sign the White Book. Therefore in the only verifiable case a clear proof is obtained of the inexactitude of Gisevius' testimony.

3. According to the statement of the witness Gisevius, Keitel exerted a tremendous influence on the Army High Command (OKW) and the Army. These words, without any presentation of concrete facts are only a phrase in the mouth of a man who had no contact whatsoever with Keitel. They are refuted by the statements of Goering, Doenitz and Raeder. Jodl has qualified this statement as merely a figure of speech. Insofar as the witness speaks of his tremendous influence on the OKW, it must appear questionable what the witness really means.

Naturally, Keitel as Chief of Staff had influence in the Army High Command, that the influence which resulted from his position which I have already discussed. How he stood with his subordinates will be taken up later.

The important thing, however, is to know whether Keitel had a decisive and culpable influence on what happened. This influence, however, could only take effect on Hitler or the branches of the German Armed Forces. That Keitel had no decisive influence on Hitler has even been confirmed by Gisevius and his being without decisive influence on the branches of the Armed Forces, has been established by the results of the testimony.

4. An especially damaging reproach against the defendant Keitel was "that instead of placing himself in front of his subordinate officers to protect them, he threatened to hand them over to the Gestapo".

In contradiction to this, it has been established that no Chief of Office in the Army High Command was dismissed in the years up to 1944; furthermore, until 20 July 1944, the day of the attempt on Hitler's life and the transfer of the judicial power in the home-army to Himmler, no officer of the Army High Command was turned over to the Police. Grand Admiral Doenitz has confirmed that the branches of the Armed Forces and the Army High Command were very scrupulous in maintaining the privileges of the Armed Forces as opposed to the police.

The Court has also seen here, how General Jodl spoke about his relation to the defendant Keitel. I think this remark has a special importance. Not only because Keitel lived on companionable and friendly terms with his official subordinate, General Jodl, during their long years of cooperation. As natural as that may appear, the less natural it is, if one reflects that Jodl in spite of his officially subordinate position, in reality became more and more Hitler's only strategic adviser. What this means, considering the preponderance of the operational tasks in the war, has been convincingly demonstrated here by General Jodl.

DEFENSE

If Keitel took this without jealousy, freely acknowledging the superiority of his subaltern Jodl in this domain, this proves in Keitel a trait of character which refutes the information derived from obscure sources by the witness Gisevius.

The proven fact that Keitel lived on friendly and companionable terms with his subordinate Chief of Office, Canaris, also is incompatible with the contrary assertion of witness Gisevius.

In this connection it is necessary to refer to the fact not submitted by Keitel but testified to by Jodl without Keitel's consent, that the latter supported and helped Canaris' family after his arrest. I only refer to this to refute the perhaps most serious personal reproach, according to which Keitel did not behave decently towards his subordinates and abused his superior position—which was especially powerful in military life—even to the point of threatening violence.

According to Gisevius' evidence, Admiral Canaris not only played a double role in the service, but also with respect to the defendant Keitel, while exploiting the friendship shown to him, he expressed a similar attitude, whereas in the midst of his own group he openly spoke in a spiteful way about Keitel.

Finally in this connection reference must still be made to the evidence of the witnesses v. Buttler and Brandenfels (session of 8 May 1946, page 11119 of the German transcript), from which it is clear that Keitel always treated the officers of the German Armed Forces Operational Staff kindly.

The witness mentions a quarrel between himself, Lieutenant-Colonel v. Ziervogel on the one hand and Himmler on the other, in which Keitel, to whom the incident was reported, immediately and energetically intervened in writings to protect his subordinates against Himmler. The affidavit of the Chief of Office in Canaris' office, Admiral Buerkner, to which I refer also testifies in the same way to Keitel's kindly attitude towards his subordinates.

At any rate, it must be said in clarification that Keitel many times had occasion to speak energetically to his office and department chiefs.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

I shall then continue by explaining that officers and officials did not generally concern themselves with politics, and that when the situation deteriorated, they made political information the subject of their argumentation. And in explanation I state that Keitel has, in fact, defined his attitude with words which were based on his assumption that the soldier in war would have to testify to his faith and obedience, and that if Keitel ever heard anything, he would reprimand these officers.

Keitel did this with "words". That does not mean that this was mere camouflage which did not correspond to his inner attitude; but it does mean, that the form, perhaps often rough and harsh, in which the defendant Keitel spoke to his officers did not—even in a single case—lead to an officer being punished or disciplined. Dr. Gisevius, however, perhaps wanted to say that Keitel, had dealt with his subordinates in the Army High Command in a morally reprehensible way.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

From an impartial estimation of the facts verified by the presentation of evidence it is shown that the accusations arising from the testimony of the witness Gisevius are not correct.

But the picture would not be complete if the personality of the witness Gisevius would not be illuminated according to his own evidence. This judgment is made from two factors:

1. The career and the position of the witness.
2. The trustworthiness of his information.

To 1.

- a. He evaded the military service through falsified papers put at his disposal by Oster.
- b. He lived in Germany during the whole time since 1933 without restriction of liberty and remained in office up to 20 July 1944.
- c. He was an official of the German Reich and was in its pay from the middle 1937 to the beginning of 1939 with the exception of leave.
- d. He was Vice-Consul of the Reich in Switzerland since 1943 in the Consulate General at Zurich placed through Canaris as intelligence agent and was naturally paid for it. At the same time he was in connection with the enemy's intelligence service.
- e. He had since 1933, when he worked in the Gestapo, the exact knowledge of all horrible happenings and the perception what consequences could arise from it for the German people.

DEFENSE

f. A special circumstance, which shows the witness Dr. Gisevius in his true light, is the advice or the suggestion which he gave to the experienced bank specialist Dr. Schacht: He should allow the inflation and thus get the control of affairs into his own hands. This suggestion leaves only two possibilities: A complete ignorance of the national economical importance and social effect of an inflation or a boundless unscrupulousness which completely disregards the fate of the employees and workmen who are specially threatened by the inflation. An inflation brought about knowingly can be described only as a crime against the people. Schacht described it as a catastrophe. It is characteristic that Dr. Gisevius proposed such a catastrophe without any restraint, in order to achieve a goal for which he was not prepared to risk his life for an instant.

To 2.

In order to judge the reliability of the statements by the witness Gisevius before this tribunal, I must refer to the book submitted by the witness as evidence: "To the Bitter End". This book is also a "statement" of the witness Gisevius.

To err is human, but when in the year 1945—after the collapse of Germany—a book appears in which facts and occurrences are communicated of historical and for those personally involved of moral and even criminal importance, the incorrectness of which has become obvious in the meantime, then the mistake is unfor-giveable and there is no longer an excuse for referring to false informations.

I will refer only slightly to the many inaccuracies contained in this book which were established before this Tribunal through the cross-examination by Dr. Kubuschok: (page 8413 of the German transcript 26 April 1946)

1. Dr. Gisevius has asserted in his book that von Papen has not resigned notwithstanding the events of 30 June 1934. It is estab-lished that von Papen has resigned and that the public announce-ment was simply contemplated to be made at a later date.

2. Dr. Gisevius asserted further that von Papen took part in the Cabinet Meeting which he describes with exacts details and when the law was resolved that the measures taken on 30 June 1934 were correct in the interest of the state.

Actually von Papen has never taken part in this Meeting.

3. Dr. Gisevius asserted finally that von Papen travelled to Hindenburg, but had not raised a sufficient protest against the measures. Actually it was that the attempts of von Papen to visit Hindenburg were frustrated, therefore he could not visit him.

4. Also the assertion in the book of Dr. Gisevius that von Papen took part in the Meeting of the Reichstag, in which the measures of 30 June were approved, must be admitted as incorrect information.

One would not define it as an unfounded reproach if such a statement is described dubious and the author not reliable.

It is difficult for me as a German defense counsel to deal calmly with this problem. The statement of Gisevius contains the entire tragedy of the German people, it is for me a proof of the weakness and of the decadence of the German circles who played with the idea of revolt and high treason, without apprehending intimately the distress of the people. They were a top level of the future ministers and generals without support from the large masses of our people, working classes, as Reich Minister Severing has declared here with all clearness.

Mr. Justice Jackson has used the word "resistance movement" in connection with the examination of the witness Gisevius. We have often heard during the progress of this trial about unfrightened, brave men and women, who fought for their country, have suffered and died. They were our enemies. But nobody would deny the acknowledgment of their heroism, who tried to judge these things objectively. But where will you find this heroism in the group around Gisevius?

If one reads his book "To the Bitter End" and one has heard him here, one looks in vain for a self-sacrificing man. Even the late deed of a Stauffenberg lacks heroism, as it lacked the decision of the self-sacrifice. Gisevius speaks in the time up to 1938—as if there was time—to hold back the wheel of the fate successfully, always about negotiations, conferences, but all these men wish that the others—that is the generals—should negotiate. If one considers the knowledge of affairs, which Gisevius had as member of the Gestapo and all his friends, if one takes into account the perception of the great danger in which the people were suspended, then the decision for action should not be doubtful for an instant for the patriotic men, as the members of the group claimed themselves to be. But what did they do? As the leaders of the army hesitated or refused, they did not think about their own action, but turned to the foreign countries.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

I should not like to leave any doubt that the fact of the conspiracy in itself is of no importance in the question of trustworthiness to be discussed here. Wherever is a conspirator out of pure motives, who, in the realization of the danger which threatens his country, risks his life, is not only clean, but also deserves the gratitude of the fatherland.

DEFENSE

If Gisevius and his friends, who, in their positions were informed about everything which, in its entire frightfulness, most Germans have only learned through this trial, had served their country in unselfish sacrifice, then perhaps we and the world would have been spared much distress and suffering.

Grand Admiral Doenitz, who knew Admiral Canaris well, said: "During the time that he was in the Navy, Admiral Canaris was an officer in whom little trust was placed. He was an altogether different person from us. We said that he had seven souls in his breast". (Transcript page 9201) Dr. Gisevius himself said of Canaris, "The successor was Canaris at that time captain in the Navy quite clever and more cunning than Himmler and Heydrich together." (Page 319 of the book "To the Bitter End" which was presented in the Schacht case as documentary evidence).

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Reference to Canaris, I only want to say that he was living in the closest touch with Himmler, Heydrich and the Gestapo although he was their sworn enemy as he admitted. Thomas, who had been a member of the Gestapo, was an excellent General staff officer, and he was an untiring worker in the Army Command Staff under Keitel. Reference is also made to that in document 2353-PS. That man was the spirit and the driving power of rearmament which he, Keitel, and others considered necessary to the extent which he energetically pursued. But it is the same man who worked on the Barbarossa Plan and who later, under the Four Year Plan became the head of the economic staff of the Plan Oldenburg. The results of that plan need not be explained here by me. General Thomas who, according to his very convincing exterior appearances used all his powers for the economic situation of the war, and who after leaving Speer was by no means dismissed but was given the task of writing the book which is the main evidence of the Prosecution. (2353-PS)

If it is true that what Gisevius has said about Thomas that he, in 1933, had played a double game, then he was an opportunist and not a man who can be expected to give objective information.

According to the statements by Dr. Gisevius, Nebe had been his friend since 1933 and was thoroughly familiar with the trend of thought of the witness. He remained in RSHA—discussed numerous times here—until 20 July 1944, and in the year 1944 he had power to issue orders to headquarters of the Special Service Office (Sonderdienst) in charge of prevention of escape of prisoners of war. This is shown by enclosure to document USSR 413, submitted by the prosecution, testimony of the witness Wielen also heard here.

To characterize this witness—from whom Dr. Gisevius after leaving the Gestapo claims to have received information currently—it should be pointed out that from 1933 to July, 1944, Nebe served in RSHA, evidently to the satisfaction of his superiors Himmler, Heydrich and Kaltenbrunner; otherwise he would not have stayed in office that long and would not have been promoted to the rank of Police General and SS Gruppenfuehrer (SS Major General). While thus, on the one hand he fulfilled the tasks incumbent upon him by reason of his position, for 11 years, with the well known methods of the Gestapo and later the Kripo (criminal police) which were under Himmler, Dr. Gisevius refers to him as his friend and political associate. Now, it might be assumed, perhaps, that in the position he held he was able to prevent disaster, possibly even to hold up execution of orders. Document USSR 413, just referred to, shows that this is not what Nebe did; rather did he work as a loyal Himmler police general. In the deposition by Wielen—forming part of the document—the horrible case of the 50 escaped RAF fliers in which case General Nebe and Dr. Gisevius were involved is dealt with.

On this Wielen states the following:

“One day during that time I received an order around noontime, by telegraph, from General Nebe to proceed to Berlin immediately, to become acquainted with a confidential order. Arriving in Berlin on the evening of that day, I reported to General Nebe at his office, Wendischer Markt 5 to 7. I gave him a condensed report on the status of the matter at that time. He then showed me a teletype order, signed by Kaltenbrunner, to the effect that, in conformity with the Fuehrer’s explicit and personal order, more than half of the officers who escaped from Sagan were to be shot when recaptured. * * * I said this violates martial law and undoubtedly was bound to result in retaliatory measures against those of our own officers who were in English camps, as prisoners of war, and that I simply refuse to take any responsibility. General Nebe declared that in this instance I am not at all responsible, since the state police was to act entirely on its own and that, after all, orders given by the Fuehrer had to be executed without protest. Nebe added furthermore that, naturally, it was my duty to keep the matter in deepest secrecy and that the reason for his showing me the original order was so that I would make no trouble for the state police.”

DEFENSE

Any comment seems superfluous. This is significant for Nebe's personality. The trustworthiness of a person is an inseparable part of his entire personality. Information obtained from a person who, for more than a decade, was able to play such an abominable double role can have no claim to faith.

I believe that this analysis of the statements of the witness Dr. Gisevius and of the men belonging to the Gisevius group gives me the right to say that the charges made against the defendant Keitel by the witness can be no suitable foundation for the argument of the prosecution, that the defendant Keitel:

1. Formed a circle around Hitler,
2. His influence on the OKW and the armed forces was tremendous.
3. He did not submit reports on atrocities and crimes to Hitler.
4. That he did not protect his subordinates, even threatened them with the Gestapo.

On the other hand it is true that the effective position of Keitel, however, important it may have seemed to outsiders, was neither decisive nor of determinating importance, whether for the total sum of event or also for the basic and important decisions of Hitler. Justice can be done to the actual importance of this activity if one says that it was tremendous, because physically and spiritually it went beyond human strength; because it placed the defendant permanently in a dilemma between his military point of view and the unbending will of Hitler, to whom he was faithfully, far too faithfully devoted. Physically, because it was nearly insoluble, because it had no sharply defined, clear outlines, but consisted in the eternal equalizing of factual differences, the adjustment of personal sensitiveness, the "self-protection" against encroachments of the individual offices among themselves or against the OKW (questions of competence); in clever manoeuvering when Hitler, in explosive reaction to disagreeable news, wished to issue extravagant orders, in the settlement of all disagreeable matters which Hitler did not wish to attend to himself. (For instance refusal to listen to complaints which had reached him directly through the adjutant's office, meeting out of reprimands, dismissals from service, etc.) It was a tremendously thankless task, which found only very slight compensation in the brilliant situation in the immediate proximity to the head of the State, in the decorative participation in all events of what is called world history, in the representative duties of a Field Marshal.

Keitel, a political General?

The defendant Keitel is accused of having taken part in, helping and promoting the planning, preparing of and inciting to aggressive wars with violations of international treaties and agreements. The defendant stated in the witness box in this connection: In so far as knowledge or having cognizance of the intention to attack is concerned, I shall come back to the subject in connection with other things. The facts as such are set forth by the defendant Keitel.

In so far as the initiating and carrying out of strategic measures are concerned, the defense counsel for General Jodl will deal with these questions.

I would like to mention here a single event which gained historical and for the defendant Keitel a personal importance during this trial: the conversation between Hitler and von Schuschnigg on the Obersalzberg on February 12th, 1938. This was the sheet-lightning that could have revealed the coming of the storm to clear-sighted peoples. Keitel, chief of the German High Command for only a week, so far without any contact with high political events, did not perceive these signs of approaching stormy weather. Hitler, who after the sudden change of 4 February 1938 had immediately gone to the Obersalzberg, called Keitel for the first time, without giving any explanation. Keitel came, without knowing what Hitler wanted or what was to happen in Obersalzberg. Only in the course of the day did he realize that his presence could have any connection with the presence of Schuschnigg and the discussion of the Austrian evidence proved, in any of the conversations, especially with Schuschnigg or Dr. Schmidt. He however realized that his presence, together with that of generals von Reichenau and Sperrle should have a significance for the conversations with Schuschnigg; for, since Hitler did not speak to him at all about military matters, he was forced to the conclusion that the representatives of the Supreme Command of the Wehrmacht, the Army and the Air Force had been invited to demonstrate the power of the Wehrmacht in Schuschnigg's eyes.

The situation was therefore such that Hitler had the intention of using the representatives of the Wehrmacht as a means of pressure for the realization of his political plans, that they had no knowledge of this beforehand, and that they realized this intention only later on.

This meeting at the Obersalzberg is now being used by the prosecution as a basis for the accusation that Keitel was a political general. The prosecution introduced the conversations between

DEFENSE

Hitler and Hacha and Tiso, at which the defendant Keitel also was present as a further symptomatic event. This evidence does not appear convincing, if it is intended to prove that Keitel was also an active party in the political conversations.

When the defendant Keitel took part in State visits and conversations with foreign statesmen, he did not participate in the conversations, but he was present. Hitler liked to have Keitel in his entourage as representative of the Wehrmacht. Thus Keitel was also present at Godesberg when Prime Minister Chamberlain went there, also at Munich on September 30th 1938 and at the visit of Molotov in November 1940. He was also present at the meetings of Hitler with Marshall Petain, with General Franco, King Boris, with Regent von Horthy and with Mussolini.

This function of Keitel is however insufficient to make the defendant into a General who would have taken a determinative part in the political evolution. How little this assertion is justified is seen from the fact testified to by admiral Buerckner, that Keitel was extremely careful not to intrude himself into the affairs of the Foreign Office and gave his officers the order not to engage in matters of foreign policy (e.g. the military attaches).

In internal politics the exclusion of the chief of the OKW resulted from the removal of the Reich Minister for War, already dealt with, and the elimination thereby aimed at and achieved of the political representation of the Wehrmacht in the Cabinet.

It is self-evident, and has already been pointed out, that the position of the defendant Keitel as Chief of the OKW implied and in time of war must have implied to an increased extent his coming into some kind of contract of with all the Ministries and highest Offices, and his dealing with them as the representative of the OKW, that is to say of Hitler.

That did not make Keitel a politician, i.e. a man who took part in an advisory capacity in the determination of Governmental aims and had an influence on the same.

In his high office he naturally worked to carry out these aims and thus far bears a responsibility, but not as a political General.

1. The idea of war against Russia was rejected by Keitel. This found visible expression in the memorandum which Field Marshal Keitel drew up, discussed with von Ribbentrop, and handed over to Hitler. According to his sworn statements the reasons were as follows:

- a. military considerations,
 - b. the non-aggression pact with the Soviet Union, dated 23 August 1939.
- In spite of personal presentation the memorandum had no success.

Hitler, as usual in questions of strategic nature, rejected Keitel's point of view as unconvincing.

In this connection and due to Hitler's strict refusal, Keitel asked for release and transfer to the front. This is the case which Reich Marshal Goering confirmed in his interrogation. Hitler refused, sharply criticizing the habit of Generals asking to be released or tendering their resignation whenever he (Hitler) did not approve their opinions or suggestions. That settled it for Keitel: he remained in his post, did his duty, and fulfilled his obligations in carrying out the tasks falling to him within the frame work of further preparations. Here, too, in keeping with his conception of duty, Keitel did not make known to the outside world his basically negative attitude towards the war with Russia, after Hitler had made his decision.

This case is in several respects typical of Keitel and his judgment by others. We know—and it has been proved by the evidence—that other Generals were also opposed to war with the Soviet Union. Their objections, too, were dispersed or rejected by Hitler. They, too, accepted the decision of the Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht, continued to do their duty and carried out the orders given to them.

But there was one basic difference: these other Generals went back to their Headquarters after the discussion. There, in their own circle of officers they spoke about the decision made by Hitler. Of course, it was disputed, but they acted in accordance with it.

Since Field Marshal Keitel, due to his military conceptions as already depicted did not make public to the generals, when they appeared in the Fuehrer Headquarters for discussions, his own attitude, although it too was at variance, the impression was bound to be created that Field Marshal Keitel completely agreed with Hitler and did not support the scruples of Wehrmacht branches.

Thus the opinion was created in the course of time and disseminated through the entire army that Field Marshal Keitel was a "Yes man", a tool of Hitler, that he was betraying the interests of the Wehrmacht. These generals did not see and were not interested in the fact that this man maintained a constant battle day after day over all possible problems with Hitler and the forces which influenced him from all sides.

This picture which definitely did not apply to Keitel, especially not in the sphere of strategic operations—planning and execution—as has been stated here in detail, became a distorted picture which has maintained its effect up to and in these trials. Maybe not without the fault of the defendant Keitel. About the justification of his conception of duty there can basically be no argument, it has been confirmed here by the witness Admiral Schulte-Moenting to be true for the defendant Grand Admiral Raeder, too. There can be no doubt that the other Admirals and Generals took basically the same point of view, that it is impossible in the military sphere to criticize before subordinates the decision of a superior as expressed in an order, even if one has scruples against the order oneself.

DEFENSE

One may say that every principle, every basic rule must be interpreted and used in a reasonable way, that every exaggeration of a good principle means its devaluation. In the case of Keitel this objection touches the problem of his responsibility and guilt altogether.

Does the non-recognition of the point where a principle in itself correct is being exaggerated and in this way endangers the goods for the protection of which it has been established constitute guilt?

In the case of Keitel we must consider the root of this soldierly principle: the thoughts and ideas which the defendant Keitel had in this connection were the following:

It is undeniable that the principle of obedience is necessary for all armed forces; one may say that obedience—a virtue in civilian life and therefore more or less unstable in its application—must be the essential element of the military character, because without this principle of obedience the aim which is to be accomplished by the armed forces could not be accomplished.

This aim, the security of the country, the protection of the people, the maintenance of the most valuable national possessions, is so sacred that the importance of the principle of obedience cannot be evaluated high enough. From this springs the duty for those who are called upon to preserve that national instrument, the Wehrmacht, within the scope of its higher task, to emphasize the importance of obedience. But what the General demands of the soldier, because it is indispensable, must remain in force for himself, too. The same applies to the principle of obedience.

It would now be dangerous to relax an order or even an essential principle by from the beginning pointing out exaggerations and taking them into consideration. Such relaxation would leave the principle of decision to the individual, which means to his judgment. There might be such cases, where the decision depends or must be made dependent on actual circumstances. In principle, such relaxation would lead to devaluation, even to the abrogation of the principle. In order to prevent this danger and to eliminate any doubt as to its absolute importance, the principle of obedience has been changed in military life into one of "absolute obedience" and embodied in the military oath. This, too, is valid for the General as well as for the common soldier. The defendant Keitel has not only grown up in these ways of thinking, but in the 37 years of his military service (up to 1938), among it in the first World War, he had also come to the conviction that this principle of obedience is the strongest pillar upon which the Wehrmacht rests and with it the security of the country.

Deeply imbued with the importance of his profession, he had served the Kaiser, Ebert, and von Hindenburg in accordance with this principle. But while they, as the representatives of the State, had in some way an impersonal and symbolic effect on Keitel, Hitler, from 1934, at first appeared the same to him, i.e. without any personal touch, in spite of the fact that his name was mentioned in the military oath, but only as representative of the State. In 1938, Keitel, as Chief of the OKW came into the immediate circle and the personal sphere of activity of Hitler. It would appear to be important for the further development and for the judging of Keitel, to realize that Keitel was now exposed to the direct effects of Hitler's personality, due to the soldierly conception of duty which was especially developed in him, and due to the pronounced feeling for soldierly obedience. I incline to the assumption that Hitler had clearly realized, in the preliminary discussions with Keitel which led to the Fuehrer order of 4 February 1938, that Keitel was a personality, such as he had included in his calculations:

A man upon whom he could rely as soldier at any time, who was devoted to him in convinced soldierly faithfulness; who could by his appearance, worthily appear for the Wehrmacht in his environment, i.e. for purposes of representation, who by reason of his power of judgment, was an extraordinary organizer, (according to the report of Field Marshal v. Blomberg).

That Hitler consequently strongly influenced this man who really admired him, and that he brought him completely under his charm is a fact which Keitel himself has admitted.

It must be remembered, if one wishes to understand, how it could happen that Keitel made out and forwarded orders of Hitler which were incompatible with the traditional conception of a German officer, as for instance the orders C-50 and 447-PS which were submitted by the Soviet Russian Prosecution. By the exploitation of the readiness for action for Germany, which was presumed to be a matter of course for all Generals, Hitler understood how to camouflage his Party-political aims with the defense of national interests, and to present the pending fight against the Soviet Union as an inevitable dispute, even as a defensive war, imposed by positive news reports, in which it was a question of to be or not to be for Germany. (Speech of 24 June 1941, statement of Raeder.)

DEFENSE

Therewith Hitler asked the fateful question.

That the conscience of the old officer nevertheless pricked him (Keitel) and that he repeatedly raised objections to the drafts of the orders, although without success, that has been confirmed by General Jodl here in the witness box.

During the cross-examination by the representative of the American Prosecution, the defendant Keitel has openly stated that he was conscious of the criminal nature of these orders, but that he had believed himself to be unable to evade the instructions of the Supreme Commander of the Army and of the Head of the State whose final word against all objections was:

"I do not know why you are worrying; after all, you have no responsibility. Only I have it towards the German people."

This is the analysis of Keitel's attitude towards the so-called ideologically qualified orders of Hitler.

Keitel's last, and in many cases justified hope, was that the commanders-in-chief and subordinate commanders of the Wehrmacht would in practice either not apply at all or only moderately, these hard and even inhuman orders within the framework of their judgment and their responsibility. In his position, Keitel had only the choice of military disobedience by refusing to forward the orders or of carrying out the instruction to forward the orders. Whether and what else he could or should have done, I shall examine in another connection. The question here is to make clear how it happened that Keitel forwarded orders which undeniably violated the regulations of land warfare and humanity, and that he did not recognize the point at which even the strict duty of the soldier to obey must end, by reason of his duty to obey, of his sworn faithfulness to the Supreme Commander, and of the fact that he saw in the order of the Head of the State the absolution of his own responsibility.

All soldiers who appear here as defendants or as witnesses have referred to the duty of allegiance. They all, even so far as they sooner or later recognized that Hitler had drawn them and the Wehrmacht into his egocentric and risky game, have considered the oath of allegiance as given to their country, and have believed that they must continue their duty under circumstances which must appear inconceivable to us and to them themselves, after realizing the resulting disaster. Not only soldiers like Raeder, Doenitz and Jodl, but also Paulus have kept their positions and have remained in their posts, and we have heard the same from other defendants, too. The statements of the defendants Speer and Jodl in this connection were deeply moving.

It must be examined as to whether these facts relieve the defendant Keitel of a punishable responsibility. Keitel does not deny that his is a heavy moral responsibility. He has recognized that whoever played even the smallest part in this terrible drama, cannot feel himself free from a moral guilt in which he was entangled.

If I nevertheless emphasize the legal point of view, I am so doing, because Justice Jackson has expressly referred, in his speech for the Prosecution, to the law as basis for your verdict—to international law, the law of the individual states, and to the law which the victorious powers have embodied in the Statute.

I herewith state that the defendant Keitel has recognized that some of Hitler's orders violated international law. The Statute has determined that a soldier cannot refer to an order of a superior or of a Government in order to clear himself. At the beginning of my statement I have asked you to examine whether, independent of the terms of the Statute, the principle is unimpeachable that the standard for what is right or wrong can be settled on a national basis only.

[The Tribunal called Dr. Nelte's attention to the extreme length of his speech, and at this point he omitted some material.—Ed.]

Hitler was the exponent of an idea. He was not only the representative of a party political program, but also of a philosophy which divided him and the German people from the ideology of the rest of the world. All toleration and all compromise was unknown to him as a convinced enemy of the parliamentary democracy, possessed by the idea of the correctness of his ideology. This led to an egocentric ideology which recognized only his own ideas and his own decisions as right. It led to the "Fuehrer State", in which he was enthroned on a lonely height as incarnation of this faith, unapproachable by all scruples and pretexts, distrustful of all whom he suspected as potential dangers to his power, and brutal, if something crossed his ideological course.

This character picture which has been verified by the evidence, is incompatible with the assumption of the prosecution that a partnership of interests could have existed between Hitler and the defendant. There was no partnership of interests and no common planning between Hitler and the men who were supposed to be his advisers. The hierarchy of the Fuehrer State, in association with the Fuehrer order No. 1, which expresses the separation of work in its most flagrant form, admits only the conclusion that the so-called co-workers were only executive mouthpieces or tools of an overwhelming will, but not men who translated their own will into deeds. The only question therefore, which can be raised, is whether these men were guilty in that they put themselves at the disposal of such a system, and that they submitted to the will for power of a man like Hitler.

DEFENSE

This problem needs a special examination, as far as soldiers are concerned; because this "submitting to somebody's will", which is remote from the existence of a free man, is for the soldier the basic element of his profession: Obedience and the duty of allegiance which exist for the soldier in all political systems.

The legal problem of the conspiracy in the sense of the indictment is dealt with by my colleague Dr. Stahmer. In the individual case of the defendant Keitel I should only like to point out two sentences of the speech as starting point of my statements:

1. "It is not sufficient that the plan is common to them all, they must know about it being common to all of them, and each one of them must accept voluntarily the plan as his own."

2. "That is why a conspiracy with a dictator at the head is a contradiction in itself. The dictator does not conspire with his followers, he does not conclude an agreement with them, but he dictates."

Dr. Stahmer has pointed out that no one acting under or on account of pressure can therefore be a conspirator. I should like to modify this for the circle, to which the defendant Keitel belonged. It would not conclusively represent the real circumstances if it were said that the defendants belonging to the military branch have acted on account of or under pressure. It is correct to say that soldiers do not act voluntarily i.e. of their own free will. They must do what they are ordered, without it mattering whether or not they approve of it. The training of will power or in any case consideration of the training of will power is accordingly eliminated in connection with soldiers' duties; it will always and everywhere be eliminated on account of the nature of the military profession, and it cannot appear as a determinative factor in the genesis and execution of orders, if the absolute Fuehrer principle is not in force in the Wehrmacht. The question, therefore, in this military sphere is not one of an abstract and with it theoretical deduction, but of a compelling conclusion resulting from the nature and from the practice of the military profession, when I say:

"The activity of the defendant Keitel was founded on the basis of military orders. The activity of the defendant Keitel concerning the genesis of orders, decrees and other measures of Hitler, even in so far as they are criminal, cannot therefore be considered as partnership work, i.e. as the result of a common planning within the meaning of conspiracy. Keitel's activity concerning the execution of orders consists in the due transmission of orders in the Operations Sector and in the due carrying out of orders in the administration of war, i.e. the so-called Administrative Sector."

These activities however could be juridically qualified, the prosecution has, as I think, so far submitted nothing which could possibly refute this consideration.

This is the principle of any soldier and is adopted in every place where the system of orders holds good. The significance of this assertion is particularly important in the case of the defendant Keitel. It would be possible to oppose such a presentation of evidence by considering that Keitel did not act as a soldier or in any case as soldier only and that therefore he cannot be considered responsible for the consequences of what is merely a system of orders. The unfortunate structure of his position and the manifold tasks, of a chief of the OKW, sometimes even not systematically conceivable, dim the recognition of the primary conceptions regarding the defendant Keitel, namely that whatever he, Keitel, did, with which authority or organization he dealt or was in contact with, he always acted as a soldier, and it was always the general—or particular order of Hitler, which placed him in the foreground and sent him into action. The facts of conspiracy seem to me comprehensibly and logically incompatible with the tasks of a soldier and with Keitel's position as head of the OKW.

In all the cases where the statements of the prosecution have claimed conspiracy to be prejudice, the purpose of this conspiracy is an activity, performed by members of a gang departing from their normal and private activity. The result of this is—on the contrary—that any activity practiced by somebody on the strength of his vocation or employment cannot be called conspiracy. In the case of a soldier it may be added that he does not act on his own initiative but in accordance with orders. A soldier might therefore well take part in a conspiracy, directed against the duties he has undertaken as a soldier but never can his activity within the framework of his military functions be designated as a conspiracy.

The conduct of the war in the East affected relatively little the OKW, the WFSt included. When I say the OKW I mean the Staff OKW. It is well known that Hitler as OKW, i.e. Supreme Chief of the Wehrmacht dealt himself with all matters concerning the conduct of this ideological war of his own and interfered in it. The army led, but Hitler was in steady and close collaboration with the Supreme chief of the Army and with its Chief of the General Staff, until December 1941 when, after having taken over the supreme command of the Army he also took over the direct leadership.

DEFENSE

This personal union of a German High Commander of the Wehrmacht and Commander in Chief of the Army evidently led to many mistakes which resulted in the severe charges against the German High Command as Staff of the General High Command and its Chief of Staff General Keitel.

Keitel himself feels heavily enough the guilt of the whole complex of the war against Russia which he has frankly stated in the witness box. It is therefore not only understandable but also the duty of the defense to clarify Keitel's responsibility for all these facts of the most terrible atrocities and incredible degeneration.

For the purpose of an easier understanding of these matters, which are often most complicated, I handed the affidavit of defendant Keitel to the Tribunal (Document book II Exhibit No K 10). I refer to it without reading its contents.

It seems to me of importance to emphasize that from the very beginning the war against the Soviet Union has been subject to three factors for its execution:

1. Military operations and orders: Commander in Chief of the Army.
2. Economics: Four Year Plan.
3. Ideology: SS-organizations.

The German High Command (Keitel) had no competent influence upon these three factors and no authoritative power. Neither can it be contested that in the course of his aforementioned truly anarchistic methods of work, Hitler, when all is said and done held all the strings in his hands and used sometimes the German High Command for forwarding of his (Hitler's) orders, nor is it qualified to change the principal responsibility.

Considering the wide extent of the material produced by the Soviet Prosecution, I can refer within the compass of my statement only to a comparatively small number of the documents. These documents however are symptomatic of many others. To begin with I will discuss the documents USSR 90, 386, 364, 366, 106, 407, all of which have been produced by the Prosecution for the purpose of proving Keitel's responsibility.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

If in this connection I discuss the official reports of the Investigating Commissions, then I do so because they have been presented in order to incriminate Keitel, but actually of themselves give proof that the accusation against Keitel and the OKW (Staff) are not based on any reasoning in these very weighty prosecution charges.

From the large number of documents in this connection I have dealt with USSR 9, 35 and 38. In these official reports, which implicate the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces, any concrete facts are lacking which might refer to the staff of the OKW—that is, Keitel—as the perpetrator or initiator of these atrocities.

As to the actual contents or statements of the documents, I am merely pointing out that Keitel, in his position, had neither the authority nor the possibility to give orders which led to the crimes asserted.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

In the documents previously cited either Keitel or the OKW has been mentioned as at least responsible. There are many such official reports, however, which have been cited in the presentation of the prosecution as proof of Keitel's guilt and in which neither the defendant nor the OKW is even mentioned.

This is true of Documents USSR 29, 39, 45, 46 and 63. * * *

I can only request the Tribunal to examine the remaining documents equally carefully to that effect and to ascertain whether, if they are submitted in connection with Keitel and the OKW, they allow any final conclusion regarding Keitel's guilt or whether that is not the case in the documents which have been presented.

The Economic Spoliation of the Occupied Territories
(The Economic Armament Office—OKW in the war)

In the war against Poland, as well as later in the West (further extended on the basis of experiences in Poland) expert personnel trained in military economy were attached from the Armed Forces Economic Office (Wehrmachts-Wirtschaft) in the form of small staffs and detachments to the army groups and army high commands, as expert advisers and assistants in all military economic questions which resulted from the conquest and occupation of economically and industrially valuable territories.

The Economic-Armament Office, together with the OKW, prepared the organization of these expert groups and the technical detachments in advance organizationally. By and large, they consisted of:

- a. Expert advisers with the unit staffs (first called liaison officers of the OKW/Economic-Armament-Office)

DEFENSE

b. Reconnaissance Staffs for war economic important factories and raw materials.

c. Technical detachments and formations for security, repairs, and protection from destruction of war essential and vital plants and supply installations.

This organization was prepared by the OKW (Economic-Armanent Office) for the reason because it depended on expert research personnel from all three branches of the Wehrmacht and the civilian economy, as well as the "technical emergency aid" (Technische Nothilfe). The army completed the setting-up itself.

The organization was subordinated to the senior troop commanders in charge. Their employment takes place exclusively on the orders of the troop command, for which the expert adviser submitted suggestions from time to time to the unit staffs (the General Staff Ib or the Chief Quartermaster).

The missions of these technical detachments were:

a. Advising the leadership concerning the importance and significance of industrial plants and supply installations (power, water, electrical current, repair plants, mines etc.),

b. Protection of these installations from destruction by the enemy and our own forces, for example, stripping of the most valuable parts, plundering,

c. Utilization for the purpose of our own conduct of war for our own troops and population,

d. Examination of the war essential and vital plants and establishment of their productive capacity for our own use,

e. Establishment of the raw material supplies of metals, ores, coal, fuels, etc. for the reindustrialization or our own use for our own conduct of war.

All functions with the exception of those mentioned under d and e served exclusively for the supplying of the fighting troops, the occupational troops, and the native population. The statistical collections d and e were reported through military channels to the competent offices at home (General Plenipotentiary for Economy, Four Year Plan, Minister of Armaments), which had to make disposition concerning use and utilization. The Wehrmacht itself had no independent right of action.

It is correct that (according to the Thomas Book 2353-PS) raw materials and also machines were removed to Germany, for the production of the implements of war as the prosecution charges, since both had served the enemy conduct of war and had to stop production.

A military agency could not order the removal to Germany, because it had no right at all to dispose of "booty" of this sort. The three highest Reich authorities mentioned alone could instigate the removal on the basis of a general authority by the Fuehrer or a special order by Hitler to the Supreme Commander of the army. The OKW and the Chief of the OKW, as well as the Economic-Armament-Office, had no right of disposition and command outside of their own fields, as little as there existed an individual chain of command from the OKW/Economic-Armament-Office to these detachments. The message and report chain went over the unit staffs to the OKH Quartermaster General, with whom the highest Reich authorities (Food, Economy, Armament Ministry, Four Year Plan) had representatives and reported to their departmental chiefs. Orders by the defendant Keitel as Chief of the OKW concerning utilization, use or seizures of economic goods have not been given; this follows from Document 2353-PS.

The unified leadership of the entire war economy in France and Belgium was then delegated to Reich Marshal Goering as Commissioner of the Four Year Plan, by the Fuehrer Decree of 16 June 1940:

For the judgment of the responsibility, it is of significance that the staff of the Economic-Armament office examined the problems which concerned the armament economy and utilization of economy in the occupied territories. The legal opinions, which were regarded for this as decisive, are assembled in document EC-344, and namely of the Foreign Department in the OKW (Department Chief Admiral Canaris).

Referring to Articles 52, 53, 54, and 56 of the Hague Convention of Land Warfare, it is explained in connection with total warfare that the "economic rearment" must be regarded as belonging to the "war effort" (Kriegsunternehmung) and accordingly all industrial supplies of raw materials, half and finished manufactured goods as well as machinery, etc. are to be regarded as serving the war effort. Therefore, according to the viewpoint of the author, of this opinion, all these goods are liable to be seized and used—against compensation after the conclusion of peace.

Furthermore, the problem of the necessity of war is examined and Germany's state of economic emergency of that time is already affirmed. For the judgment of the defendant Keitel this opinion is of significance insofar as the well-known foreign department under the responsible leadership of Admiral Canaris still in November 1941 practically proved an opinion which justified the economic utilization of the occupied countries. That was the office which concerned itself with problems of international law and on which the defendant Keitel based his confidence.

An organization for all economic requirements, for surpassing the former organization, was created on the basis of the experiences in the West by Reich Marshal Goering, through a General delegation of authority by the Fuehrer.

DEFENSE

The chief of the Economic-Armament office with State Secretary Koerner prepared this organization for Reich Marshal Goering—without participation by the Chief of the OKW.

The Chief of the OKW has for this purpose put General Thomas at the disposal of Reich Marshal Goering. The Chief of the OKW did not acquire any influence at all on this organization and severed his own and the OKW's connection with it after Reich Marshal Goering had received full powers and the OKW had put General Thomas at his disposal.

General Thomas thus acted alone in this connection, commissioned by Reich Marshal Goering. The OKW and defendant Keitel were neither under Reich Marshal Goering's orders nor bound by his instructions. Defendant Keitel was not represented in Goering's Economic Staff and had nothing to do with the Eastern Economic Staff. (See Thomas Book Page 366).

The execution of the work was centrally directed by the Economic Operations Staff in Berlin as part of the Four Year Plan. The local higher command in the Eastern district was under the Eastern Economic Staff.

To this organization was also attached the Troops' Supply Department.

The OKW, and defendant Keitel as chief of the OKW, never issued orders concerning the exploitation, administration or confiscation of economic property in occupied territory. This is revealed by the book submitted by the prosecution, Document 2353-PS. On page 386 of this document, Thomas, in summarizing correctly stated as follows:

"The Eastern Economic Operations Staff under the Reich Marshal or State Secretary Koerner, was responsible for the whole economic direction of the Eastern area; the State Secretaries were responsible for departmental instructions; the Economic Armament Office was responsible for the reconstruction of the economic organization; the Eastern Economic Operations Staff was responsible for the execution of all measures."

The same is shown by Document USSR 10: "Directives (of Reich Marshal Goering) for the unified conduct of economic management in the zone of operations and in political administrative areas to be subsequently established."

This ought to prove that the OKW and Keitel are clear of any responsibility for the consequences attendant upon carrying out the measures within the scope of the Barbarossa-Oldenburg operation.

The French prosecution have charged defendant Keitel personally with war crimes and crimes against humanity. The accusation concerns putting to death French civilians without judicial decision. In this connection, the cases of Oradour and Tulle were particularly emphasized. They are recorded in a report by the French Government (Doc. F. 236). The French prosecution declared: "Keitel's guilt in all these things is undoubted". (Page 3659 of the transcript).

In this connection, it is not my business to discuss the frightful happenings of Oradour and Tulle. As defense counsel for defendant Keitel, I have to examine whether the assertion of the prosecution that defendant Keitel bears any guilt or responsibility in these atrocious occurrences is founded.

You will understand that defendant Keitel is particularly intent on producing evidence to the effect that he is not responsible for these terrible occurrences and furthermore that when such things came to his knowledge, he was anxious to have them cleared up in order that the actual offenders might be brought to account.

It is incontestable that Keitel had no direct participation in these crimes. Any responsibility and guilt of the defendant can therefore be derived only from his official position. No orders of any kind bearing Keitel's signature have been submitted by the prosecution, so that whoever is guilty, Keitel does not, at any rate, belong to the circle of those directly responsible.

The horrible wrongs suffered by a large number of French villages are recorded in the Notes of General Berard dated 6 July and 3 August 1944 (included in Collective Document F 673). I already pointed out, when this document was submitted, that by the submission of these notes of complaint alone, that is without simultaneous production of the replies, which are also in the possession of the prosecution, no objective picture can be presented of the facts as they are for a pronouncement on the guilt of defendant Keitel. As defendant Keitel, owing to his lack of authority to issue orders in the matter, cannot possibly be taken into consideration as the author of the orders which led to the complaint any responsibility and guilt of Keitel's can therefore be proved only by the fact that he did not cause the necessary steps to be taken after being informed by the German Armistice Commission. Whatever Keitel did or failed to do can be gathered only from the reply notes and from the stipulations of the OKW to the German Armistice Commission. [Sentence omitted.—Ed.] Counterevidence would indeed be impossible for defendant Keitel even in this case, had not the French prosecution themselves submitted a document (F 673—Letter of the OKW dated 5 March 1945, signed Keitel) which was to serve as proof of Keitel's individual guilt. This document is worded as follows and was read by the French prosecution at the session of 31 January 1946. (Pages 3660/3661 of the transcript.)

DEFENSE

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

This document shows:

1. Upon receipt of the French memorandum of complaint of 26 September 1944, OKW issued orders to the German Armistice Commission to investigate and handle this matter.
2. Thereupon the German Armistice Commission instructed Commander-in-Chief West to investigate the incidents.
3. Upon receipt of a letter from Army Group B, OKW expressed itself as follows:

"It was in the German interest to answer these charges at the earliest possible moment."

"The manner in which this case was handled indicates that perhaps there still exists a great deal of ignorance as to the importance to be attached to all reproaches against the German Wehrmacht, to counteract any enemy propaganda and to refute immediately any purported German acts of atrocity. The German Armistice Commission is hereby instructed to continue giving this matter attention with all possible emphasis. It is requested to render any assistance possible and especially to take all steps for expeditious handling of the matter as far as it regards your own sphere of action. The fact that Pz. AOK 6 (Armoured Unit AOK) no longer forms part of the forces of Colonel West is no reason to prevent continuation of the needed investigation so as to bring light into and refute the French charges."

It may therefore be safe to say that it has been proved that the defendant Keitel, upon receipt of information, undertook with due energy such steps as were within the scope of his authority and ability as chief of OKW.

This eliminates the prosecution's contention in so far as it has assumed the guilt of the defendant Keitel. At the same time, however, the handling of this case by the defendant Keitel points to the conclusion that he acted in like manner in other cases.

Nacht und Nebel

It may be said that there is hardly any order which during the proceedings of this Tribunal made a deeper impression on people's minds than the order "Nacht und Nebel". By this is meant an order which originated during the fight waged against acts of sabotage and the Resistance Movement in France. As a result of the departure of the troops in connection with the march against the Soviet Union, plots against the security of the German troops remaining in France, especially acts of sabotage against all means of communication increased from day to day. From this resulted the need for increased activity of counter-espionage offices, which led to proceedings and verdicts of military courts against members of the Resistance Movement and its accomplices. These sentences were very severe—in addition to capital punishment imprisonment also. During meetings for discussion of the situation, reports which arrived daily caused violent disputes with Hitler who, as always, was trying to find someone on whom to fix the blame and who, according to Hitler was in this instance to be found in the far too cumbersome handling of military justice. True to his spontaneously explosive temperament, he ordered the working out of directives to create a quick effective and lasting spirit of intimidation. He declared that confinement could not be considered an effective means of intimidation. When Keitel objected that not everyone could possibly be sentenced to death and that Military Courts would, furthermore, refuse to comply, he replied that he didn't mind about that. Cases, where the offense has been established to be so serious as to impose capital punishment without lengthy court proceedings, should continue to be dealt with as heretofore; that in other cases, however, where this was not the case, he ordered the suspected persons to be brought secretly to Germany while withholding all news as to what had happened to them, it being a fact that promulgation of sentences for penal servitude in occupied territory failed to have an intimidating effect in view of the amnesty at the end of the war.

Thereupon the defendant Keitel proceeded to consult with the chief of the Judge Advocate's Office of the Wehrmacht and with the chief of the Foreign Counter-Intelligence Office (Canaris), from whom also came the letter of 2 February 1942 (UK-35) on deliberations as to what should be done. When repeated remonstrances with Hitler to refrain from this system, or at least to relax the demand for complete secrecy failed to have any effect, a draft was finally submitted which became the Decree of 7 December 1941 (UK-35), which we have before us here.

The staff of experts and the defendant Keitel had succeeded in establishing the competency of the Reich Administration of Justice for the persons removed to Germany (see last paragraph of directives of 7 December 1941). Keitel had guaranteed this stipulation by means of the first Enactment-Decree governing the directives, in that he made the clarifying statement (last sentence in par. 1 of IV) that unless otherwise ordered by OKW, the case would be referred to civilian judicial authorities according to section 3, paragraph 2, second sentence. The defendant believed that in such manner he had at least insured that the person involved would have the benefit of regular court proceedings and that according to German provisions for accommodating and treating prisoners upon trial and prisoners serving a sentence, there could be no danger to life and limb. Keitel and his staff of experts believed that they could find comfort in the fact that however cruel the suffering and the uncertainty endured by those concerned might be, nevertheless the life of the departed persons had at least been saved.

DEFENSE

In this connection allusion is also made to the version of the cover letter of 12 December 1941. As already stated by the co-defendant General Jodl during his examination, there had been adopted a certain wording when the signatory wished to express his dissent with the order submitted. The cover letter begins with the words:

"It is the well-considered desire of the Fuehrer * * *."

The closing sentence runs:

"The attached directives * * * comply with the Fuehrer's interpretation."

Persons who received such letters knew from that wording that once again this was an order of the Fuehrer which could not be evaded, and they concluded therefrom that this order should be applied as mildly as possible.

The letter of 2 February 1942 comes from Foreign Counter-Espionage Office III (Amt Ausland/Abwehr) the original of which must have been signed by Canaris. At that time the defendant was not in Berlin where, after promulgation of the decree of 7 December 1941, the matter was dealt with further. Keitel, at the Fuehrer Headquarters, was not informed of the contents of that letter. In the light of the above remarks, the wording of the letter justified the assumption that a milder carrying out would be made possible through the provision that Counter-Espionage Offices were directed "to see to it that before an arrest is made evidence will be at hand fully sufficient to warrant the transfer of the perpetrator." It was also provided that before the arrest took place the competent military court must be approached in order to establish whether the evidence was adequate.

In Germany the transfer was to be made to the Reich Administration of Justice. Sufficient proof for the correctness of the assumption of the defendant Keitel is found in the fact that in view of the attitude of this Admiral which is sufficiently known to the Tribunal, Canaris would never have ordered the transfer to the Gestapo.

As already stated, the defendant Keitel did not know of the letter of 2 February 1942.

Although the defendant Keitel believed that he had achieved everything possible to safeguard those involved, the "Nacht und Nebel" decree—as it came to be termed later—caused him great mental anguish. Keitel does not deny that this decree is not compatible with international law, and this was known to him.

What Keitel denies, however, is that he knew, or that prior to the Nurnberg trial he knew, that after arrival in the Reich the persons involved were imprisoned by the police and then transferred to concentration camps. This was contrary to the meaning and purpose of that decree. The defendant Keitel could not learn anything about it because after the persons involved were turned over by the competent Law Lords of the Military Courts to the competent judicial authority for transfer to Germany—to be turned over to the Administration of Justice—the competency of the Wehrmacht ceased, unless the case involved proceedings by a Military Court. The defendant Keitel is unable to explain from personal information how it happened that such a great number of persons were brought into concentration camps to experience a treatment described as "N N" such as was described by witnesses who appeared here. Results obtained through evidence presented to this Tribunal lead to the assumption that without so informing military authorities, police authorities indicated as "N N" prisoners all politically suspicious persons who, on the basis of political measures, were removed from occupied territories to Germany to be placed in concentration camps. According to evidence, persons held in "N N" camps were primarily people who had not been sentenced, after formal proceedings by Military Courts in occupied territories, to be brought to Germany.

It therefore becomes evident that the police authorities in occupied territories made use of this decree as a general and unrestricted charter for deportation, exceeding every imaginable measure and regardless of the prerogatives of the military authorities alone, and the rules of procedure imposed upon them.

The fact that such a situation was at all possible in occupied territories without the knowledge of the Wehrmacht authorities can only be explained by the fact that as a result of the appointment of Senior SS and police chiefs, the carrying out of police duties was withdrawn from the military authorities, and that these higher SS and police chiefs received their orders from the Reich leader SS.

DEFENSE

At no time were the Reich leader SS and Senior SS and police chiefs given the right by OKW to make use of the decree, intended to be used as a police executive measure by the Wehrmacht alone. The decree was valid only for the offices of the Wehrmacht in whom judicial authority had been vested, and its wording was explicit and restricted along that line.

The letter of the German Armistice Commission of 10 August 1944 (843-PS) proves that OKW had indeed no knowledge of this improper application of the decree of 7 December 1941. It says therein:

“* * * that the basis for arrests seems to have undergone a change in that, in the beginning, individual incidents and violations of law or attacks on the Occupation Power were involved; in other words it meant the apprehension of elements who had been definitely active in certain cases and who were liable to punishment according to the Hague Convention (Hague LKO) while, at present, there are also numerous persons being deported to Germany who because of their anti-German sentiments are being removed from France as a precautionary measure.”

Under Figure 4 that letter reads as follows:

“A prerequisite for application of the above-mentioned decree is that the persons arrested will be made the subject of judicial proceedings. There seems to be reason for assuming that because of the number of cases, especially within the compass of precautionary measures, such proceedings are now frequently being dispensed with and the prisoners are no longer held confined in investigation or penal institutions of the German legal authorities but in concentration camps. Also in that respect an essential change has taken place as compared with the original provisions of the decree.”

In the reply of OKW dated 2 September 1944, signed by Dr. Lehmann, (chief of the OKW Judicial Department) explicit reference is made to the directives for the Fuehrer decree of 7 December 1941, the so-called NN decree. In it nothing is said that the original presuppositions for deportation to Germany were changed.

This reply, however, was sent from Berlin without the knowledge of the defendant Keitel; the letter also of the Armistice Commission was evidently sent to Berlin. The We Re office was in Berlin. Keitel himself was at the Fuehrer Headquarters and learned nothing of the exchange of correspondence.

It should be pointed out that it was a grave sin of omission not to have immediately replied to the letter of the German Armistice Commission of 10 August 1944 and to explain that this was a case of improper application of the decree of 7 December 1941 and the directives issued relative thereto. An investigation should have been initiated at once so as to take to task those responsible for this abuse.

Insofar as the Tribunal regards Hitler's military staff as guilty, the defendant Keitel takes the responsibility within the extent of his responsibility as chief of the OKW.

The defendant Keitel is accused by the prosecution of having participated in the deportations for the purpose of labor commitment. In this connection, Keitel declares, that in conformity with his jurisdiction he did not have anything to do with the procurement, recruiting, and conscription of people in the occupied territories, nor with the assignment of the labor forces thus procured, for the armament industry. Codefendant Sauckel gave the following testimony as a witness on 29 May 1946 (Page 10484 of German Transcript) :

Q. You mean by that, that the OKW and the defendant Keitel had no functions whatsoever appertaining to the matter of procurement, recruiting, and conscription of labor forces in the occupied territories?

A. He had no function whatsoever appertaining to this matter. I got in touch with Field Marshal Keitel because the Fuehrer frequently charged me to ask Field Marshal Keitel to transmit his orders by phone or by instructions to the Army groups.

Q. (Excerpts) Did the OKW and in particular Keitel as chief of the OKW have any function appertaining to the question of labor commitment in the homeland?

A. No; because the commitment of workers took place in the economic branches for which they had been requested. They had nothing to do with the OKW.

During the cross-examination by General Alexandrov, documents were presented which according to the opinion of the prosecution are to prove the participation of Keitel and the OKW. In this connection it must be examined whether and in what way the OKW and Keitel had participated in the sphere of duty of defendant Sauckel as General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment (GBA). Document USSR-365 presented by the prosecution contains the basic provisions concerning spheres of tasks and powers of the GBA, the decree of 21 March 1942 about the appointment of Sauckel as GBA, the order of Goering as commissioner for the 4-year Plan dated 27 March 1942, the program for labor commitment, and the task and solution, as imagined by Sauckel.

DEFENSE

These documents give expression to the relationships and contacts of the GBA with many offices. These relationships and contacts vary qualitatively.

Clear is the jurisdiction and the official channels in the sphere of tasks of the GBA. He is the spokesman for the 4-year Plan (No. 3 order of 27 March 1942) and he was therefore subordinate to Reichmarshal Goering and Hitler, who was identical with the 4-year Plan. The relationships and contacts of the OKW, or Keitel with the GBA and his sphere of tasks according to the outcome of the evidence (testimony of Keitel, Sauckel, and the documents) were as follows:

The replacement system for the whole Wehrmacht was under the jurisdiction of defendant Keitel in his capacity as Chief of the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces (OKW). Losses at the front were reported to the OKW by each individual branch of the Wehrmacht and at the same time replacements were requested.

On the basis of these requests, Keitel submitted a report to the Fuehrer, according to which replacements had to be procured for the troops of the various branches of the Wehrmacht at certain designated times by the service commands through their replacement inspectorates.

The replacement inspectorates consequently called the recruit year group or beyond its drafties who had been deferred up to that time. With the war progressing, the result was almost invariably for instance that the Armament Ministry (for the deferred employees of the armament industry), the Ministry for agriculture (for the deferred employees of agriculture), the Transportation Ministry (for the deferred employes working for the Railroad), etc., made the greatest difficulties for the demands of the replacement authorities, and protested against them.

They pointed out that the tasks of the various departments would have to suffer dangerously if the deferred employees were removed without further ado. The competent Minister requested that, before the release of deferred employes, new workers should be procured to make up for those released.

Therefore, the matter was referred by way of the labor offices to the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment (GBA), whose task it was to procure the necessary manpower for the domestic labor commitment required. The defendant Sauckel as GBA, who personally did not have at his disposal, except for special deputies, an independent organization of his own for the recruiting, procurement, and possible conscription of labor forces was therefore forced to get in touch with the competent authorities in the occupied territories for the execution of his task.

a. In the occupied territories of the civil administration, Holland, Norway, (East), it was the Reich Commissioner who had to assist Sauckel.

b. In the territories under military commanders (France, Belgium to the Balkans) it was the General Quartermaster of the Army.

c. In Italy it was in highest instance the accredited Ambassador Rahn.

This is obvious from the decree of 27 March 1942.

GBA Sauckel, before he became active in the execution of his task in the various territories, turned invariably to Hitler, whose subordinate he was with respect to the 4-year Plan, in order to obtain through his instructions the necessary backing by the local authorities. This was done in such a way that the order was issued to the local authorities to give Sauckel the assistance which he considered necessary for the execution of his task. The defendant Keitel was not present at such discussions between Hitler and Sauckel. The defendant Keitel had no jurisdiction or competence in these questions. However, somebody had to inform the local authorities about Hitler's orders, and the result was that Hitler who did not recognize any difficulties of jurisdiction, told the next best man to inform the local authorities about Sauckel and to point out Hitler's wish to grant him all the necessary assistance. These "next best" were either Keitel for the military administration of the occupied territories or Dr. Lammers for the territories under civilian administration.

This was the contact which existed between Keitel and Sauckel in this matter. How in detail the recruiting or other procurement of labor was carried out was not within the competence of the OKW. The latter did not receive any reports on the matter either. The interest of the OKW was exclusively limited to the fact that the required number of soldiers were placed at his disposal through induction by the replacement authorities. In particular, the OKW and the defendant Keitel had nothing to do with the commitment of labor of the workers procured by the Plenipotentiary General for Labor Commitment into the war economy, but rather this was solely the business of the labor offices where the firms requiring labor of the economy requested the workers deemed necessary.

1. The name of Keitel stands at the beginning of Sauckel's activity, as submitted by the prosecution, because Keitel was co-signor of the Fuehrer decree concerning the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment (Doc. USSR-365). From the repeated reference of the prosecution to this fact the conclusion must be drawn that it apparently sees in this co-signatory act of the defendant Keitel the beginning of a chain of causes, at the end of which stood frightful happenings as were presented here.

DEFENSE

To this I refer to the significance expounded in another place of the co-signature by Keitel as chief of the OKW of such decrees of the Fuehrer. This fact, which penally cannot be considered as determinative, is also not a guilt, because of the lack of conception of the events occurring during the further course of events.

2. If the Fuehrer's decree of March 1942 provides the legal origin of the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment (GBA), the first step in the participation of this official is also connected with the name of Keitel as head of the OKW, as the personnel replacement matters were subordinated to him and he made his requests for replacement of losses at the front to the subordinate military replacement offices. Here also the same applies as in paragraph 1, as neither an appreciable determinative effect nor a penal fault are involved.

3. Owing to the situation resulting from the shortage of manpower, there came into being a purely factual connection between the military personnel requirements and the requirements of the economic replacement of workers without Keitel coming thereby in contact with the GBA either as regards competence or orders.

Sauckel confirmed the statement of Keitel that the OKW had nothing to do with the recruiting, levying, or otherwise procuring of labor, nor with the commitment of the labor procured to German economy (German Minutes of May 29, 1946).

Now the French prosecution, during the cross-examination of Sauckel, has submitted four documents tending to prove the active participation of the OKW and of the defendant Keitel in the deportations. These are Documents 1292-PS, 3819-PS, 814-PS, and 824-PS.

The first document is a report of the chief of the Reich Chancellery Dr. Lammers regarding a conference with Hitler, during which the question of procurement of labor for 1944 was discussed. The defendant Keitel took part in this discussion. Annexed to this report a letter from the defendant Sauckel of 5 January 1944 is reproduced in which the latter summed up the results of the conference of January 4th and proposed a decree of the Fuehrer. I quote the following parts therefrom:

"5. The Fuehrer pointed out that it was necessary to persuade all the German offices in the occupied territories and in the allied countries of the necessity of taking in foreign labor, in order to be able to support unanimously the General Plenipotentiary for labor commitment in carrying out the required organization, propaganda and police measures."

* * * * *

"2. The penultimate paragraph:

The following offices should in my opinion receive the decree in the first place:

* * * * *

"1.

"2.

"3. The Chief of the OKW, General Field Marshal Keitel for instructions to the military commanders in France and Belgium, to the military commander South-East, the Plenipotentiary General accredited to the Fascist Republican Government of Italy, the chiefs of the Army Groups in the East."

The document therefore proves (a) that Field Marshal Keitel took part in a conference, without stating his point of view on the problem of labor procurement, (b) that the Fuehrer decree was to be brought to the knowledge of Field Marshal Keitel for the purpose of instructing the military commanders. What defendant Keitel admitted as to his points of contact with this question is thereby confirmed.

The 2d and 3d documents refer to a conference in the Reich Chancellery on July 11, 1944, in which Field Marshal Keitel took no part.

Now the French Prosecutor made the statement that the teletype (Doc. 814-PS, 1516-PS) is an order of Field Marshal Keitel to the military commanders to carry out the decisions of the conference of July 11th. Mr. Herzog has said in this connection that Keitel's order was dated July 15, 1944. A cursory examination of the document—a photostat—shows that the document concerned is a teletype of July 9th containing an invitation from the chief of the Reich Chancellery Dr. Lammers to a conference on July 11th, which Keitel transmits to the military commanders. The conclusions of the Prosecution, based on this document, are therefore also invalid, but the document is also interesting from another point of view. It states therein verbatim:

"The following directives are for the instruction of the military commanders or their representatives:

Present situation requires using every possible means towards procuring additional labor, as all armament measures benefit in first place the fighting troops. On the other hand any apprehension regarding internal troubles, increasing resistance movement and so on must be set aside. Every help and assistance is to be given the GBA. I refer to my directives for the collaboration of the Wehrmacht in the procurement of labor from France (OKW/West/Qu (Verw.1)/2 West No. 05201/44 secret.)"

The defendant Keitel requested me to call the attention of the Court to this method of expression for the following reasons. Numerous documents bearing the signature "Keitel" have been submitted here. According to Keitel's attitude, already explained, which excluded any show of authority; he never used the "I" form in his communications or transmission of orders. The prosecution only submitted one other teletype of the defendant, apart from this document, in which the "I" form occurs. Considering the many documents which confirm this admission of Keitel, his statement that here the transmission of an order of the Fuehrer was in question must be believed, also that the style of wording which I quoted corresponds to an order from the Fuehrer.

DEFENSE

General Warlimont (Doc. 3819-PS) refers, during the conference of 11 July, expressly to a "recently issued Fuehrer order", the contents of which he reproduces exactly as contained in the teletype directive with the signature "Keitel".

Important as confirming this evidence of the defendant Keitel is likewise the newly submitted document 824-PS, RF 1515. This is a letter of July 25, 1944, from the Commander-in-Chief West (von Rundstedt), who in the meantime had become the Chief of the military commanders in France and Belgium. It is said therein that: "by order of the Fuehrer the demands of the GBA and of Speer are to be fulfilled", further that in the event of evacuation of the battle area, measures must be taken towards securing fugitives, etc., for labor; finally that reports must be sent in to the OKW regarding the measures taken. The reference to the Fuehrer's order shortly after July 11th shows as well as Warlimont's statement, that there exists no directives from Keitel or the OKW.

It can be considered therefore as proved that neither Keitel himself nor the OKW had any part in measures to levy or recruit labor. The OKW was the office in charge of transmitting the orders which Hitler, as the superior of Sauckel wished to forward to the military commanders; it had no competence and no legal responsibility.

It is not the same in this complex as in the spheres that are within the administrative competence of the OKW, as there existed in this sphere at least a specialized function which included the possibility of voicing doubts.

In the sphere of labor procurement and labor commitment, the points of contact with Sauckel's activities are the following:

1. Keitel was co-signatory of the Fuehrer's decree of March 21, 1942, concerning the appointment of the GBA.

2. He has transmitted Hitler's orders to support the activities of the GBA on the basis of special instructions to the local military authorities of the occupied territories.

Now, at the session of 2 February 1946 (Page 3761 of the German minutes) the French prosecution has, in the matter of the deportation of the Jews within the scope of defendant Keitel's responsibility, stated the following:

"I shall subsequently speak about the order for the deportation of the Jews and I shall prove that this order came from a joint action of the military government, the diplomatic authorities, and the security police in the case of France. It results from this that—

1. The Commander-in-Chief,
2. The Reich Foreign Minister and
3. The Chief of the Security Police and Reich Security Head Office (RSHA), these three persons, were bound to be informed of and bound to have agreed to this action, for it is clear that by their function they must have known that similar measures, which concerned important affairs, were taken and also that the decisions were taken jointly every time by the staffs of three different administrations.

These three persons are therefore responsible and guilty.
* * *

If you examine the very thorough individual handling of this item indictment (on page 3910 of the German minutes), you will establish that the OKW is not mentioned and that no document is produced which originates either from the OKW or from the defendant Keitel. It follows from the Keitel affidavit, Document Book 2, that the military commander for France, who is mentioned several times, was not placed under the OKW.

Now, the prosecution has, in the handling of this question, attempted to prove the cooperation of the "Army" as Mr. Jaure says, with the Foreign Office and the Police. They believe they can put this cooperation to the account of the highest authorities, i.e., the OKW, in the case of the Army, and therefore Keitel. This production of evidence is erroneous. In order to make that clear, I must point out that there was a military commander in France. This military commander was invested with civil and military power; he represented the nonexistent state power and therefore had police and political functions besides military tasks. The military commanders were appointed by the OKH and received their orders from the latter. As it follows from this, there existed no direct relations with the OKW on this question. Since defendant Keitel, as chief of the OKW, was not placed above the OKH, there exist likewise no indirect relations of either subordination or authority.

What Mr. Faure has said at this point is unfortunately true: "In France, a plurality of jurisdictions manifested themselves, with mutually divergent and even contradictory tendencies which overlapped each other or went counter to their own authority."

DEFENSE

Actually, the OKW and defendant Keitel have nothing to do with the Jewish question in France, with the deportation to Auschwitz and other camps; they had neither commanding nor controlling authority and therefore no responsibility.

The fact that the letter K in the telegram, dated 13 May 1942 (Doc. 1215 F) was completed to mean Keitel is indicative of the contention adopted by all prosecuting parties, concerning the presumptive implication of the defendant Keitel. Fortunately, the French prosecutor has corrected this and cleared up the error. (Page 3922 of the German transcript).

The Prisoner of War Question

The fate of prisoners of war has always stirred the feelings of men.

It has been the endeavor of all civilized nations to give the soldiers who fell in the hands of the enemy those reliefs which could be made compatible with the interests of warfare. It has been considered as one of the most important advances of civilization to have achieved an agreement in that case in which the nations were opposed in a mortal clash. The distressing incertitude over the fate of these soldiers seemed to be bridged over, their humane treatment guaranteed, the dignity of the disarmed opponent assured.

Like so many things, our belief in this advance of human society has begun to waiver. Although this belief is still formally upheld—as it has been once and for all by the solid resistance of the general officers—we must nevertheless admit that a brutal policy, oblivious to the Nation's own sons and of anything but its own striving for power has in many cases disregarded the sanctity of the Red Cross and the unwritten laws of humanity.

The treatment of the responsibility of the defendant Keitel in the general complex of the prisoners of war system comprises the following individual problems:

1. The general adjustment of the treatment of prisoners of war, the German legislation on the prisoner of war system.
2. The authority over the prisoner of war camps, divided into Oflag (officers' camps), Stalag (enlisted men's camps), and Dulag (transit camps).
3. The supervision and control of the legislation and its administration.
4. The individual cases which have been brought before the court in the course of the indictment.

As the organization of the prisoner of war system has been set forth in the course of presentation of argument, I can restrict myself to setting forth that the Wehrmacht High Command (Keitel), within the scope of his tasks as War Minister in accordance with the decree of 4 February 1938 by order of Hitler was competent and to that extent responsible—

a. For the ministerial right to issue ordinances within the entire local and professional range, particularly restricted by co-work and co-responsibility in the matter of using the prisoners of war as laborers.

b. Not authorized to have command over prisoner of war camps and the prisoners of war themselves, competent to allocate on a large scale to the corps area commanders the prisoners of war arriving within Germany proper.

c. For the general supervision of the camps within the range of the Wehrmacht High Command (except for those within the range of the zone of operations the rear army area, the area of the military commanders, the Navy, and Luftwaffe prisoner of war camps).

The competent office for this in the Army High Command was the "Chief of the prisoner of war system", who was several times made personally responsible by the prosecution. The defendant Keitel attaches importance to the fact that the Chief of the prisoner of war system was his subordinate over the General Wehrmacht Office (ueber das Allgemeine Wahrmachtsamt). This proves the self-evident responsibility of the defendant Keitel in this domain even in those cases in which he supposedly did not sign orders and decrees personally.

The basic provisions for the treatment of prisoners of war were—

1. The service regulations issued by the Chief of the Wehrmacht High Command within the scope of the normal mobilization preparations and set down in a number of Army, Navy, and Luftwaffe publications.

2. The stipulations of the Geneva Convention special mention of which was made in the service regulations.

3. The general decrees and orders which became currently necessary.

Regardless of the treatment of Soviet-Russian prisoners of war, who were subject to regulations which were different on principle and to which I shall return in particular, the provisions of the service regulations which corresponded to international law, that is the Geneva Convention, were authoritative. The Wehrmacht High Command exercised supervision over the strict observance of these Army service regulations through an inspector for the prisoner of war system and after 1943 through a further inspectory board, the inspector general for the prisoner of war system.

DEFENSE

As further inspectory bodies may be counted the representatives of the protecting powers and the International Red Cross, which no doubt submitted to the various governments reports on the results of their inspections of and visits to the camps, in accordance with the provisions of the Geneva Convention. No such reports have been submitted here by the prosecution; I shall come back to the charges brought in by the French prosecutor. The fact, however, that the British and the American Prosecutions, for example, have not submitted such reports may well permit the conclusion that the protecting powers did not determine serious violations with regard to the treatment of the prisoners of war in camps.

The treatment of prisoners of war, which during the first few years of the war did not lead to complaints of a serious nature with the western powers—I except individual cases like the Dieppe case—became increasingly difficult for the OKW from year to year, because political and economic considerations gained the strongest influence in this sector. The Reichsfuehrer-SS tried to get the prisoner of war system into his hands. The struggles for power which were caused by this from October 1944 on had the result, that Hitler turned over the prisoner of war system to him ostensibly because the Wehrmacht had shown itself too weak, and that it had let itself be influenced by considerations based on international law.

Another important factor was the constantly increasing influence caused by a rising labor shortage, which was exercised by the Mobilization of Labor and the armament sector on Hitler and which was exercised over him in the OKW.

The Party-Chancellery, the German Labor Front and the Ministry of Propaganda likewise were included in this actually purely military question. The OKW was engaged in a constant struggle with all these agencies, which for the most part had more influence on Hitler than the OKW.

All these circumstances must be taken into consideration, if one wishes to understand and value the involvement of the defendant Keitel correctly. Since he personally had to carry out the functions "by order of" since Hitler always kept the problem of the prisoner of war system under his personal control because of the previously described reasons, the defendant Keitel was almost never in a position to voice his own, i.e., military misgivings against instructions and orders.

Treatment of French prisoners of war

As the result of the agreement of Montoire, the key word for the French prisoners of war was "collaboration!" Their treatment moved in the direction outlined by it, which through discussions with Ambassador Scapini led to considerable improvements for them. In this connection I refer to the answers to the questionnaire given by Ambassador Scapini, who states among other things:

"It is correct that General Reinecke examined the questions at hand objectively and without hostility, and that he attempted to regulate them understandingly, when they depended on his authority alone. He maintained a different attitude when the pressure exercised on the OKW by the Labor Service and sometimes by the Party made itself felt."

The prisoners of war used for labor were scarcely guarded. French prisoners of war used in the country had almost complete freedom of movement. By virtue of the direct understanding with the Vichy Government, considerable mitigations existed to the rules of the Geneva Convention, after their repatriation by virtue of the armistice provisions had very considerably lowered the number of the original prisoners of war.

[The Tribunal suggested the elimination of the next five pages but Dr. Neite went on as follows so as to include the Sagan Case.—Ed.]

It touches us Germans to a particular extent, because the unrestrained and boundless ruthlessness of the orders and of the character of Hitler, who did not for a single instant let himself be influenced in his explosive decisions by the thought of the German Wehrmacht's honor, is shown here. The cross-examination of the defendant Keitel by the representative of the British prosecution has clarified in how far his name has become implicated in this shocking state of affairs. Although it has been clearly established by evidence that Keitel has neither heard nor transmitted Hitler's murderous order, or that he and the Wehrmacht are not associated with the execution of this order, finally that he opposed by all means in his power the transfer of the escaped officers to Himmler, and at least obtained that the officers who had been taken back to the camp were saved; he has, however, the distressing feeling of consciousness of guilt, not to have known what terrible blow German military prestige was bound to suffer throughout the world by such a measure.

In connection with the treatment of the Sagan case the French Prosecution laid before the defendant Keitel Document 1650-PS which deals with the treatment of escaped prisoners of war.

[At this point, Dr. Nelte announced that he would summarize the remainder of his prepared speech.—Ed.]

During his examination, Keitel made the following statement.

DEFENSE

"This document 1650-PS, opens like a document which has been seized at a police station, with the words "The OKW has decreed the following."

Keitel says:

"I have certainly neither signed this order of the OKW nor seen it; there can be no doubt about that. I cannot explain it; I can only state a presumption as to how this order came about."

Then he mentions in his examination the various possibilities as to how such an order could have come to the office which issued the order. Then he refers to another document, 1544-PS, a document which contains all the orders and directives concerning escaped prisoners of war, but not that one order referring to the escaped officers and noncommissioned officers in question.

The witness Westhoff confirmed that the concept "Stufe roman III" and its meaning were unknown to him and to the office of the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces/Prisoner of war affairs; he also stated that, on entering office on 1 April 1944, he did not find an order of this nature, thus also no file notice.

It was absolutely unclear what was meant by that Bullet Decree. I believe evidence presented here has cleared that up, evidence by co-defendant Kaltenbrunner, who on his part had never spoken to the defendant Keitel about that matter.

We find that Kaltenbrunner said, "I had not heard of the Bullet Decree. It was an entirely new concept for me." Therefore, I asked what it meant. He answered that it was a Fuehrer Order; he did not know any more. I was not satisfied with this information, and on the same day I sent a teletype message to Himmler asking him to please permit my reading an order of the Fuehrer which was called Bullet Decree. A few days later, Mueller came to see me by order of Himmler and submitted to me a decree which, however did not originate from Hitler but from Himmler, and in which Himmler stated that he was passing on to me a verbal Fuehrer Order."

. From this it is safe to assume that without speaking to Keitel and without the latter's knowledge, Hitler must really have given such an order to Himmler as it is stated in Document 1650-PS which was submitted here. For the subjective judgment of the facts of the implied crimes the elementary importance lies in the knowledge of them, not only for the conception of guilt, but also for the Prosecution's ultimate resolution, the concurrence, the toleration as well as the omitted counter action. The knowledge of facts comprises:

- (1) The knowledge of the facts.
- (2) The perception of the establishment of a goal.

- (3) The perception of the methods.
- (4) The conception and faculty for conception of the consequences.

During discussion of the question as to how far the defendant Keitel could have possibly drawn any conclusions from the textual knowledge of the National Socialist Party Program and from Hitler's book "Mein Kampf" I have already stated the reasons for which Keitel had no perception of a realization by force.

As confirmed by Grand Admiral Raeder, Keitel denied the knowledge of an intended war of aggression until the war against Poland broke out. This opinion is certainly a subjective truth, because of Keitel's honest disbelief in a war with Poland, not to talk of any intervention by France and England. This perception, shared by Keitel and other high-ranking officers, was based on the fact that the military potential was too insufficient to risk a war and possibly expect a victory; the more so as it would evidently develop into a war on two fronts. This belief was also supported by the Non-Aggression Pact with USSR of 23 August 1939.

However, that is not the core of the problem. The speeches by Hitler before the generals, beginning with the conference of 5 November 1937, in which Keitel did not take part, permit from time to time the clearer recognition that Hitler did not wish to attain his aims so or so, that is, if not through friendly negotiation, then through war, or in any case, through employment of the Wehrmacht as an agent of pressure. There can be no doubt about that. One may argue over whether the context of the speeches of Hitler, concerning which there are no official notes or records of minutes reproduce more or less the text of the conference correctly.. But on what there can be no doubt about is that they permit Hitler's point of view to be clearly recognized.

Accordingly, one must differentiate whether one could believe that a definite plan would come to its execution or whether one had to win the recognition that the general intention for aggression existed. If this recognition did not exist, then this can only be explained by the fact that the generals did not take the question war or peace into their consideration from the basic attitude assumed. According to their point of view, this was a political question, for which they did not hold themselves competent, since, as has been said here, the bases for such a resolution were not known to them and, as the defendant Keitel has testified, the generals had to have confidence in the leadership of the State, that the latter would only undertake war for pressing reasons. This is the result of the traditional principle that the Wehrmacht is probably an instrument of politics, but may not participate in politics by itself. A principle which was taken over by Hitler in all its severity. The court may decide whether this is to be valued as an excuse. Keitel explained on the witness stand that he recognized the orders, directives, and instructions which had such terrible consequences, and that he drew them up and signed them, without allowing himself to be disconcerted by the possible consequences.

DEFENSE

This testimony leaves three questions open:

1. The question of the methods in the execution of the orders.
2. The question of conception of the consequences which actually occurred.
3. The question of the dolus eventialis.

The defendant Keitel in his affidavit (Doc. Book II, No. 12) presented the influence of the SS Police Organizations on the conduct of the war and the involving of the Wehrmacht in the occurrences, for the complex of the so-called "ideological orders." The record of evidence has shown that numerous Wehrmacht commanders applied such terrible orders partly not at all, partly in a milder form, on their own responsibility. The methods of the SS, which gave these orders their terrible effect, were strange and therefore unimaginable to the soldier Keitel, grown old in fixed concepts. According to his testimony, these effects also did not become known in their terrible extent.

The same holds true for the Fuehrer Decree "Nacht und Nebel." If he did not allow himself to be disconcerted by the "possible" results, as he forwarded these orders, the dolus eventialis in regard to the results taking place can still not be affirmed. It is much more to be assumed that if he had not been able to recognize the horrible effects, he could have accepted the consequence, in spite of the prohibition of requests for resignation, which would have freed him from the hard necessity of knowing and would not have pulled him into the whirlpool of events ever more from month to month.

There may be an hypothesis to this. The testimony, however, has furnished certain pertinent facts for the correctness of this. The five-time attempt to leave his position and the resolve to end his life, which was witnessed by Colonel General Jodl, give you the opportunity to attribute the sincere desires of Keitel.

If he did not succeed, then this lies in the circumstances which I have already presented, the unequivocal and, as Keitel says, unconditional duty of the soldier true to his military oath, to do his duty obediently to the bitter end.

This concept is false then, if it is accordingly so exaggerated, that it lead to crime. It must also be considered, however, that with a soldier, he is accustomed to measure by other standards in war. If all high officers, Field Marshal Paulus as well, represented the same point of view, one may thus not understand that perhaps, but no one will deny them the honesty of their convictions.

The defendant Keitel replied to the question which was put so often during this trial why he did not—

- . a. Refuse to obey, or
- b. Revolt against Hitler that these questions were not taken by him into consideration, even for an instant. According to his words and his behavior, he is an absolute soldier. Did he place the guilt on himself with this conduct?

It is entirely a general problem whether a general may or must commit high treason if he realizes that the execution of an order or of a measure violates the international law and/or the laws of humanity.

The solution of this problem presumes the reply to the previous question, which is the "authority" which "allows or orders" criminal high treason. This question appears to me of significance for the reason, because the legitimization is to be established who can allow or order the general to commit high treason, who can "bind and absolve."

As the present state power, which in this case was represented by the Chief of the State, identical with the Supreme Commander of the Wehrmacht, does not come into the question, the question is merely whether there is an authority which is above or outside of the individual State Authority, which could "bind or absolve."

Since the struggle for power between Pope and Emperor which dominated the middle ages has no longer an actual importance in the sense of constitutional law, this power can be impersonal and moral only; the highest command of the unwritten, eternal right is put by the German poet Schiller into these words: "The power of tyranny has a limit. * * *" It is only one of the so manifold poetical revelations of world literature, which expresses the deepest yearning for freedom by all peoples.

If there is an unwritten law which corresponds to the unquestionable conviction of all men, it is this that with due consideration for order in the state, there is a limit for the restriction of freedom. Should this be overstepped the state of war of national order against the international power of world conscience will result. It is important to establish that up till now there did not exist a statute of international law of this kind. It is understandable; for the relativity of the conception of freedom, in various states and the anxiety of all states about their sovereignty stand in incompatible opposition against the recognition of an international authority.

DEFENSE

The authority which "binds and absolves," which absolves us of guilt before God and the people, is the universal conscience which becomes alive in every individual. He must act accordingly. The defendant Keitel did not hear the warning voice of the universal conscience. The principles of his soldierly life were so deeply rooted, governed his thinking and actions so exclusively, that he was deaf against all considerations which would lead him away from the path of obedience and faithfulness, as he understood them. This is the really tragic role which the defendant Keitel played in this most terrible drama of all times.

2. FINAL PLEA by Wilhelm Keitel

I acknowledged my responsibility on the witness stand within the framework of my position. The substance and significance of this position was presented in the presentation of evidence and in the final plea of my defense counsel.

It is not my intention to minimize my part in what took place. In the interest of historical truth, however, it seems advisable to correct a few errors in the final speeches of the Prosecution.

The American Chief Prosecutor said in his final speech, and I quote: "Keitel, a weak, submissive tool, turned the Wehrmacht, the instrument of aggression, over to the Party." A "turning over" of the Wehrmacht to the Party by me cannot be reconciled with my functions, either up to 4 February 1938 or after that time, a period when Hitler made himself the immediate supreme commander of the Wehrmacht, and thus ruled the Party and the Wehrmacht absolutely. I do not recall that in the course of this trial a single piece of evidence was presented which could justify this grave contention of the Prosecution.

The presentation of evidence, however, has also shown that the contention "that Keitel led the Wehrmacht in the execution of its criminal intentions" is wrong. This contention is also in contradiction to the English-American trial brief, which says expressly that I had no authority to issue orders.

Consequently, the British Chief Prosecutor is also mistaken when he speaks of me as, and I quote, "a field marshal who issued orders to the Wehrmacht." And when he accuses me of having said that I "had no idea what practical results were intended," that is the quotation, I believe that this is something quite different from what I said on the witness stand, which was, and I quote the words I spoke on the witness stand: "But when an order was given, I acted according to my duty as I saw it, without permitting myself to be confused by the possible but not always foreseeable consequences".

Also, the contention that, and I quote, "Keitel and Jodl cannot deny the responsibility for the operations of the Einsatzkommandos, with which their own commanders cooperated closely and cordially", that contention cannot be reconciled with the result of the taking of evidence. The OKW was eliminated from the Soviet-Russian theater of war. There were no troop commanders under its orders.

The French Chief Prosecutor said in his final speech: "Is it necessary to recall the terrible words of the defendant Keitel that 'human life was worth less than nothing in the occupied territories'". These terrible words are not my words. I did not think them up and did not make them the contents of any order. The consciousness that my name is connected with the transmission of this Fuehrer order weighs heavily enough upon me.

At another point M. Champetier de Ribes says, and I quote, "This order was executed—it concerned anti-Partisan activities—on the basis of instructions from the commander of the army group, who, in his turn, acted on more general instructions of the defendant Keitel".

Here again "instructions of Keitel" are mentioned, although the French indictment itself states that I, as chief of the OKW, could not give any direct orders to the branches of the Wehrmacht.

In the final speech of the Soviet-Russian Prosecutor, it says, and I quote, "Beginning with the documents on the executions of political persons, Keitel, this 'soldier', as he likes to call himself, lied shamelessly to the American Prosecution in the preliminary examination—disregarding his oath—by saying that this decree was in the nature of a reprisal and that political persons had been kept separate from the other prisoners of war at the request of the latter. He was exposed before the Court".

The document in question is 884-PS.

The accusation that I lied is unfounded. The Soviet-Russian Prosecution overlooked the fact that the transcript of my preliminary examination on this question was not the subject of the presentation of evidence before this Tribunal. Therefore, its use in the final speech of the prosecution should not have been allowed. I did not see the transcript of the preliminary interrogation and do not know the wording. If it is complete, it will clarify the error which arose because the document in question was not shown to me. In the examination by my defense counsel I presented the state of affairs correctly.

In the last stage of the trial, the Prosecution attempted once more to incriminate me severely by connecting my name with an order for the preparation of bacteriological warfare. A witness, the former Generalarzt Dr. Schreiber, had said in his report: "The chief of the OKW, Field Marshal Keitel, had issued the order to prepare bacteriological warfare against the Soviet Union." On the witness stand here this witness did speak of a "Fuehrer order." But this is not true either.

DEFENSE

The introduction of the testimony of Colonel Buerker, which was approved by the Tribunal in all agreement with the Prosecution, indicates that in the fall of 1943 I, in Buerker's own words, sharply and categorically rejected the suggestion of the Army Medical Inspectorate and the Army Weapons Office to activate the bacteria experiments, saying that that was out of the question, that it was forbidden, and that is true. Colonel General Jodl as well can confirm that no order of the type alleged by the witness was ever issued, and, moreover, that Hitler prohibited bacteriological warfare, which was suggested by some authorities. Thus the assertion to the contrary of the witness Dr. Schreiber is proved to be untrue.

I claim to have told the truth in all things, even if they incriminated me; at least to have endeavored, in spite of the great extent of my field of activity, to contribute to the best of my knowledge to the clarification of the true state of affairs.

Thus, at the end of this trial, I want to present frankly the knowledge that I have today and my acknowledgement.

In the course of the trial my defense counsel presented to me two basic questions. The first was put to me months ago. It was, "In case of a victory, would you have refused a share in the success?"

I answered: "No, I should no doubt have been proud of it."

The second question was "How would you act if you were in the same position again once more?"

My answer: "Then I would choose death rather than to let myself be drawn into the meshes of such ruinous methods."

From these two answers of mine, the High Tribunal may see my viewpoint. I believed I erred, and I was not in a position to prevent what should have been prevented. That is my guilt.

It is tragic to have to realize that the best I had to give as a soldier, obedience and loyalty, was exploited for intentions which could not be recognized, and that I did not see the limit which is set even for a soldier's performance of his duty. That is my fate.

From the clear recognition of the causes, the ruinous methods, and the terrible consequences of this occurrence of war, may there arise for the German People hope for a new future in the community of nations.

VII. ERNST KALTENBRUNNER

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Kurt Kauffmann, Defense Counsel

The present trial in the torrent of a revolution

May it please the Tribunal:

The present trial is world history, but world history full of revolutionary tensions. The ghosts which were called are stronger than the cry of the suffering peoples for justice and peace. Ever since deification of man and humiliation of God chaos as an inevitable consequence and punishment is afflicting mankind with wars, revolutions, famine and despair. If my country was culpable of the greatest guilt, then permanently, it does the greatest penance a people has ever done.

The means for restoring the so much longed-for prosperity are erroneous, because they are second-rate. And no one of my listeners is in a position to call me a liar, when I assert that the present trial does not begin at the end of a period of wrong, to make an end to it, but is being surrounded by the surge of the waves of a furious torrent, on the surface of which the wreckage of a civilization, guarded through the centuries, is floating hopelessly, and on whose deep demoniacal bottom the foes of the true God, of Christian religion and, therefore of any Justice, are lurking.

The European commonwealth of peoples, whereof my country has been the heart piece, is seriously ill. It suffers from the spirit of negation and from the humiliation of the dignity of human nature. Rousseau would curse his own maxims if he had lived to see the radical refutation of his theories in these years of the 20th century. The peoples had announced the "liberty" of the Great Revolution, but in the course of but 150 years they have in the name of the same liberty created a monster of cruel slavery and ungodliness, which was able to escape earthly justice, but not to elude the living God.

The Tribunal before history

This Tribunal conscious of its task and its mission will some day have to pass before the probing eye of history. I do not doubt that the selected judges are striving to serve justice as they see it. But will not this problem indeed be beyond solution? The American chief prosecutor stated that in his country important trials seldom begin before one or two years have elapsed. I do not need to throw light upon the deeper core of truth contained in this practice. Would it be possible for human beings, torn between love and hate, justice and revenge, to conduct a trial immediately after the greatest human catastrophe ever known and constantly driven by the statutory demand asking for time-saving, swift proceedings, in such a way that they are entitled to the thanks of mankind at a time when the waters of this second deluge will have receded into their former bed?

DEFENSE

Would it not have been better if the above-mentioned distance between crime and atonement would have been adhered to in the course of the present proceedings?

Law can be shaped only when the court possesses inner liberty and independence of such nature as to feel subject to no other considerations than to conscience and to God himself.

Such an august activity had sunk into oblivion in my country, in the first place in the mind of the governing class of the nation, Hitler had humiliated law to the rank of a prostitute of purpose. But this Tribunal intends to furnish proof to the world that all profit for the people is based on law alone. And no other thought than unselfish justice could arouse more joy and hope within the heart of people of good will.

I am not criticizing—it would serve no purpose—the provisions of the Charter, but I am asking whether any justice on earth has and indeed could have been found, if Might acknowledged Reason so far as to grant the enemies a regular trial, but could not make up its mind to crown this tribute to Reason by appointing a truly international tribunal; 19 nations appear to have approved of the legal basis of the Charter—we do not know this, but Mr. Justice Jackson indicated it—it is far more difficult to apply the written law.

The American chief prosecutor has emphatically declared that he did not intend to hold the entire German nation guilty, but the records of this Tribunal, which History will someday scrutinize attentively, contain nevertheless many things which, to us Germans, appear to be false and therefore, embittering; they unfortunately also contain repeatedly explicit questions of the French prosecution, to what extent, for example, certain crimes against humanity both in and outside Germany have become known to the German people; indeed, the French prosecution has asked explicitly: "Could those atrocities remain, on the whole, unknown to the entire German nation, or have they come to its knowledge?" Those and similar questions are not suitable for solving such a difficult and tragic problem with even the slightest regard for the truth. To the extent that evil, which always grows and manifests itself organically, gets the upper hand among a nation, to that extent every individual who has reached the age of reason bears some guilt for the catastrophes of his country. But even this guilt, lying in the sphere of metaphysics, never could become a collective guilt of a nation, unless every individual also in this nation had incurred an individual guilt. But who would be entitled to establish such an individual guilt without examining thousands of individual circumstances?

The problem, however, becomes even more difficult should one try, and this is aimed at, to establish the so-called national guilt for any crimes actually committed against peace, humanity, etc., during the past years on the part of the omnipotent state in whatever possible form. One should bear in mind most carefully the condition of the Reich before 1933. This has been done sufficiently here and I do not speak about it. Hitler monopolized such deep-reaching concepts as the proverbial German diligence, homeliness, sense of family, willingness to make sacrifices, aristocracy of work and hundreds of other things. Millions believed it; millions did not. The best people did not abandon hope, that they would be able to avert the tragedy foreboded by them. They flung themselves into the stream of events, collected the virtuous ones and fought, visibly or invisibly, against the bad ones. Can a plain, uneducated man in the street be blamed for not being ready to deny Hitler offhand every credibility, as a man who knew how to pass as a seeker of truth, and who every time showed to peace lovers the highly extolled palm of peace? After the assumption of power large sectors of the German people could feel themselves at unison with many other peoples on earth. Therefore, it is not astonishing that gradually, with the approval or the tolerance of other countries, Hitler acquired the nimbus of a man, unique in the century. Only the German who lived during the past years in Germany and did not scour from abroad, as with a telescope, the German space, is finally authorized to give information concerning the historical facts of an almost impenetrable method of secrecy, the psychosis of fear and the actual impossibility of changing the regime, and herewith to comply with Ranke's demand to historians, to establish "how it came to pass".

[The Tribunal objected to this material as irrelevant and Defense Counsel proceeded to summarize it.—Ed.]

The Defense has been established by the Charter, and I deal with the question of how, in the face of such excesses, a Defense can still realize its task. I say further that in this trial, error and truth are mysteriously mixed, probably more so than they ever were in a great trial of law. To try to establish the truth makes the Defense Counsel an assistant of the Court, and justification exists for the Defense to doubt not only the credibility of the witnesses but also the documents. It justifies the Defense Counsel to state that such reports, although they may be admitted by the Charter in evidence, can only be accepted with serious objections, because none of the defendants or defendants' Counsel or neutral observers could have any information on the way they were brought about.

DEFENSE

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

These statements were made, certainly, within the framework of the law, but I believe also within the framework of power.

The people, or a large part of the people, in their aspiration for peace and happiness, elevate the representative of a terrible heresy to the position of their Fuehrer, I might say to a demigod; this Fuehrer abusing the faith of his followers in the grossest imaginable way; this people then in the bondage of a slave not being able to find the strength for a timely open resistance and tumbling into the huge abyss of annihilation of its entire racial, political, spiritual and economic existence. All of this, in the truest sense of the word, is tragic. Had the individual man in the street, the mother in the home, and her sons and daughters, been asked to choose between peace or war, never voluntarily would they have drawn the lot of war.

[The Tribunal suggested the omission of other material under this topic heading due to its irrelevancy.—Ed.]

Development of the history of intellectual pursuits in Europe

The rise of Hitler and his downfall, unique in its extent and consequences, may be viewed from, regardless what side: From the perspective of the historic spectacle of German history, or of the supposedly constrained course of economic forces; of the sociological separation of its people, of the racial and character conditionabilities of the German; or of the mistakes which the other brothers and sisters of the family of nations, living in the same house, committed in the political sphere. All this does certainly round out the picture of the analysis but always it brings to light only partial knowledge and partial truth. The deepest and at the same time the most fatal reason for the phenomenon Hitler lies in the metaphysical domain. In the final result the second world war was unavoidable. Anyone, however, who looks at the world and its aspects only from the view point of economic problems may arrive at the belief that the war, the first as well as the second world war, could have been avoided through a reasonable distribution of the wealth of this earth. Regarded by itself alone, economic reasons are never able to change the face of the earth; therefore, the change of the standards of living of the German people, their deterioration, the demoralization of the national soul by the Treaty of Versailles, inflation, enormous unemployment, and others became rather the outward cause for Hitler. Still it is possible that catastrophes might be delayed by years or decades, if certain outward living conditions make the mutual relationship of the nations and people apparently happy. At no time, however, can a wrong idea be extinguished through economic disposition alone, and be deprived of its destructiveness for the individual and for the nations, unless the people overcome and replace these ideas by spiritually better ones. In the manner in which the name of God is used by the people and nations, says the famous Donoso Cortes, lies the solution of the most feared problem.

Here we have the explanation for the providential mission of the nations, of the races, for the great changes in history, for the rise and downfall of empires, for conquests and wars, for the different characteristics of the nations, for the physiognomies of the nations, yes, even for their changing fortunes.

Monsieur de Menthon has tried to analyze National Socialism intellectually. He spoke of the "sin against the spirit" from which all crimes originated, he called National Socialism a coarser Darwinism.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

I wish to say something here: Hitler was not a meteor, the fall of which was incalculable and unpredictable. He was the exponent of an ideology which was atheistic and materialistic, to the last degree.

There is every reason to reflect that although National Socialism is eliminated through the complete defeat of Germany and although the world is now free of the German threat, proclaimed by all nations, there has been no change for the better. No peace has filled our hearts, no rest has come to any corner of human existence.

It is true, the collapse of a powerful state with all its physical and spiritual forces will send out waves for a long time, as the sea is stirred into motion when a large stone is thrown into the calm water. But what happens at present in Europe and in the world is much more, indeed it is something quite different from the mere ebbing away of such an occurrence.

To continue the comparison the waves rise anew from the deep; they are fed by mysterious and constantly emerging forces. These are those restless ideas, aiming at the disaster of nations, of which I spoke and nothing could give me the lie when I maintain that everybody, victor and vanquished, is living in the middle of a crisis which disturbs the conscience of the individual and the nations as a monstrous, apparently inevitable nightmare and which, beyond the punishment of guilty individuals, causes us to look out for those means and ways which can spare humanity from an even greater catastrophe.

DEFENSE

In his "Confessions of a Revolutionary", Proudhon, the clear-sighted socialist wrote the memorable words: "Every great political problem also always has within itself a theological one." He coined this phrase 100 years ago. It is most timely that the American General MacArthur, at the signing of the Japanese surrender agreement is said to have repeated these deep words in their essential meaning, by saying: "If we do not create a better and greater system death will be at our door. The problem is fundamentally speaking, a religious one."

The changes in religious values determine history. They are the strongest motive powers in the cultural process of humanity. Permit me to show you in a few, rather large strokes the intellectual and historical forbears of National Socialism.

Renaissance, Subjectivism, French Revolution, Liberalism, National Socialism

[The Tribunal stated that this entire topic was irrelevant and therefore Dr. Kauffmann made only the following statement.—Ed.]

The contents of this can be summarized in two or three sentences, and I merely beg you to take cognizance of it. I have pointed out that the causes in all these unfortunate movements were the spiritual attitude such as that of anthropocentric humanism as described by Jacques Maritain.

* * * * *

Is Kaltenbrunner guilty?

In the midst of this spiritual situation in general stands the figure of the defendant Dr. Kaltenbrunner. The fatherland was already bleeding from a thousand wounds of its sensitive soul and of its gigantic power. Is this man guilty? He has pleaded not guilty and yet guilty. Let us see which is the truth.

As I emphasized at the beginning Kaltenbrunner, until the year 1943, was, in comparison with the other defendants at this trial, a man who was hardly known in Germany, at any rate the one who had hardly any association with either the German public or the high officials of the regime. In those days when the military, economic, and political fate of the German people had begun to roll with crazy velocity towards the abyss, hate and abhorrence of the executive were at their climax, the more so, as the paralyzing sensation of the hopelessness of any resistance against the terror of the regime had disappeared; people had then definitely turned away from the legend of invincibility preached by propaganda. Suddenly, so to speak, and without the existence of any special ability nor of any application, Kaltenbrunner was drawn into the net of the greatest accomplice of the greatest murderer, from his secluded, and, notwithstanding the Austrian Anschluss, from the viewpoint of international criminal law, untainted life. Not voluntarily, on the contrary, against his repeated resistance, and against his exertions to be ordered to the fighting front.

I can well understand that I will be answered, that I should in view of the sea of blood and tears, refrain from illuminating the physiognomy of this man's soul and character. But deep in my heart—and I beg not to be misunderstood—I am, while exercising my profession as a counsel, even of such a man, moved by the universal thesis of the great Augustine hardly intelligible for the present godless generation: "Hate error, but love man." Love? Indeed, in so far as it should pervade justice; because justice without this nobility of love becomes plain revenge, which the prosecution explicitly contends to disavow. Therefore, for the sake of this justice, I am to show you that Kaltenbrunner is not the type as repeatedly described by the prosecution, namely the "little Hitler", his "confidant", the "second Heydrich."

I do not believe that he is the ice cold being as the witness Dr. Gisevius has made him out to be here in such an altogether negative manner, in fact, from hearsay only. The defendant Jodl has testified before you that Kaltenbrunner did not belong to Hitler's confidants who always got together with him after the daily situation conferences in the Fuehrer headquarters. And the witness Dr. Mildner has stated on the basis of direct observation, without his testimony having been doubted by the prosecution:

"From my own observation I can confirm: I know the defendant Kaltenbrunner personally. In his private life he was an irreproachable man. In my opinion he was promoted from Higher SS and Police Chief to Chief of the Security Police and of the SD, because Himmler, after the death of his principal rival Heydrich in June 1942, did not want any man anymore or did not tolerate anybody under him who could have endangered him in his position! The defendant Kaltenbrunner was no doubt the least dangerous man for Himmler. Kaltenbrunner was not ambitious to bring his influence to bear through special deeds and to push finally Himmler aside. He was not hungry for power. It is wrong to call him the "little Himmler". The witnesses Eberstein, Waldeck, and Dr. Hoettl have expressed themselves in the same manner.

And yet this man took over the office of the Reichssicherheits-hauptamt, yes, he did indeed take it over to the fullest extent. I know that today this man suffers a great deal under the catastrophe of his people and under the uneasiness of his conscience; nothing is more understandable than that Dr. Kaltenbrunner, knowingly or unknowingly, can no longer face the fact that he actually was in charge of an agency under the burden of which rocks would talk if that could have been possible; personality and character of this man will have to be judged differently from the way the prosecution has been doing this.

DEFENSE

For the psychologist the question arises how a man, let us say, with normal civil virtues, could take an office under his control, which became the very sum total of human slavery of the 20th century, as far as Germany is concerned. There may be two reasons for taking over this office nevertheless: One is based on the fact that Dr. Kaltenbrunner, although closely connected with the political and cultural interests of his Austrian homeland, supported National Socialism in its large scope. Because before he turned into the sidepath with his secrets, he marched with thousands and hundreds of thousands of other Germans, who desired nothing else than a solution from the unstable conditions prevailing at that time, on that wide road into which the eye of the entire world had insight. Therefore, he was, without a doubt a follower of anti-semitism, however, only in the sense of the necessity for retrograding the flooding of the German race with alien elements, he condemned just as harshly the mad crimes of physical annihilation of the Jewish race, as Dr. Hoettl definitely stated. Kaltenbrunner surely affirmed also Hitler's personality as far as it did not, by and by become apparent in its absolutely misanthropic and thereby un-German nature. Also fundamentally he approved, as he himself admitted during his interrogation, measures which implied, more or less severe compulsion, as for example, the organization of labor education camps. Therefore, no sensible person will want to question the fact that he deemed the establishment of concentration camps quite proper, at least a provisional measure especially during the war as this had been the case for a long time on the other side of the German border. The establishment of concentration camps, or however one wishes to call those places, at mentioning of which the listener involuntarily is reminded of words by Dante, is unfortunately not unknown to many states. History knows of them from South Africa for some decades, from Russia, England and America during this war, for the admission among others, of persons who for reasons of conscience do not want to serve with arms. In Bavaria, in the land in which the Tribunal presently sits, these sort of camps are also known; known is also the so-called "automatic" arrest for certain groups of Germans. Under the heading: "Political Fundamentals" in item B 5 of the text of mutual declaration of the three leading statesmen about the Potsdam Conference of 17 July 1945, the statement is contained that, among others, all persons who are dangerous for the occupation or its aims shall be arrested or interned.

The necessity of camps of this sort is thereby recognized. I myself hate the organization of human slavery, but I state openly, that these institutions lie on the way which when followed to the end can and will bring suffering to persons of a different opinion, than desired by the state. By this the crimes in the German concentration camps shall not in the least be diminished. As far as Kaltenbrunner is concerned this man, according to my conviction and as far as it can be affirmed by many witnesses, is in his character and his attitude, apparent since 1943, basically a National Socialist leading personality who only with disgust took notice of the general trend of the continually growing wave of terror and enslavement in Germany.

For this reason I deem it important to point to the statement of the witness Eigruber, according to which the statement of the prosecution is wrong, that Kaltenbrunner established Mauthausen (Doc. Kr. 6, question 1 and 2).

The second motive lies in the subject of the two conversations with Himmler, about which he testified. Thereby Kaltenbrunner was but prepared to take over the agencies of the domestic and foreign intelligence service within the Reichssicherheitshauptamt, resting on Himmler's promise that he would be allowed to centralize this intelligence service, namely in the direction of absorbing and connecting the political intelligence service with the hitherto military one of Admiral Canaris. The witnesses Waldeck, Dr. Hoettl, Dr. Mildner, and Ohlendorf and also the defendant himself are indubitably correct in testifying that Himmler, making allowance for Kaltenbrunner's wishes, from the murder of Heydrich, interpolated himself into the executive body, so that nothing of some importance took place in any executive field in Germany without Himmler having had the final word and thus issuing the decisive order.

The witness Waldeck confirmed to the subject of those two conversations of Kaltenbrunner with Himmler in the following words, which I shall quote because of their importance: "When material problems arose Kaltenbrunner frequently remarked that he had come to an understanding with Himmler to work rather in the field of the foreign political intelligence service and that Himmler himself wanted to take more influence in the executive functions. To my knowledge Himmler agreed to these adjustments, the more so as he believed that he could depend on Kaltenbrunner's political instinct in foreign affairs, this would follow from various remarks made by Himmler."

Various witnesses testified that Kaltenbrunner predominantly and from inner necessity actually made himself over to the intelligence service in domestic and foreign countries and more and more approached an influence on domestic and foreign politics he was hoping for. I am calling attention to Waldeck, Dr. Hoettl, but then also to the defendants Jodl and Seyss-Inquart and Fritzsche. Dr. Hoettl testified: "In my opinion Kaltenbrunner never completely mastered the large agency of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt and, from lack of interest for police and executive problems, occupied himself far more with the intelligence service and with the influence on the entire policy. This he considered his real domain." From the testimony by Generaloberst Jodl I am stressing the following sentences: "Before Kaltenbrunner took over the intelligence service from Canaris he sent to me, from time to time, very good reports from the Southeastern territory, whereby I first noticed his experience in the intelligence service. . . . I had the impression, this man knows his business; I now received continuous reports from Kaltenbrunner, the same as before from Canaris; not only the actual reports from agents but from time to time he sent to me a, I almost want to say, political survey on the basis of his individual reports from agents. I noticed especially these condensed reports on the entire political situation abroad because they revealed, as never before under Canaris, a frank sobriety, and the seriousness of our entire military position."

DEFENSE

On the basis of the evidence I am therefore arriving, without any constraint, at the following result: Kaltenbrunner on the basis of the separation of the intelligence service from the executive police functions desired by him actually held a position in the Reichssicherheitshauptamt which was principally aimed at the intelligence service and its continuous development. This was the lifework of this man as he himself wished it to be for the duration of the war. Personally he lived in small economic circumstances and it is the truth when I say, that he steps off the stage of political life just as poor as he ascended it. The witness Waneck once made the statement, characteristic for Kaltenbrunner, that he, Kaltenbrunner, will retire completely from office after the war and return to the land as a peasant.

Only with deep regret the spectator will state that under the pressure of the political and military events this man did not observe the border-line, as desired by himself. His obedience toward Hitler and therefore also toward Himmler had submitted to the apparent necessity in the years 1943/45, to guarantee the stability of the inner-German relations through police compulsion. Thereby he became involved in guilt; it is clear, that he can count on a milder judgment of his guilt before the world conscience only if he could have produced evidence that he actually undertook a strict separation from section (Amt) IV of the Secret State Police rightly called demoniacal, if he had in no way participated in the ideas and methods which, as I believe, eventually led to the institution of this trial. I cannot deny that he did not undertake this separation. Nothing is clearly proven in this direction, even his own testimony speaks against him. Thus his statement before the Tribunal at the beginning of his interrogation may be explained, which I should like to define this as the thesis of his guilt.

Question: "Do you realize that very special accusations have been brought against you? The prosecution accuses you of crimes against the peace as well as of your role of an intellectual principal or of a participator in committing crimes against humanity and against the laws of war. Finally the prosecution has connected your name with the terrorism of the Gestapo and with the cruelties in the concentration camps? I now ask you: Do you assume the responsibility for these points of accusation in such manner as they are outlined and familiar to you?"

Answer: "First of all I should like to state to the court that I am fully aware of the serious nature of the accusations brought against me. I know that the hatred of the world is directed against me, since I am the only one here, because a Himmler, a Mueller, a Pohl are no longer alive, to answer to the world and to the court. . . . I want to state at the very beginning, that from the time of my appointment as chief of the Central Reich Security Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt) I assume the responsibility for every wrong committed within the jurisdiction of this agency as far as it occurred under my actual command, and I thus knew or should have known of these occurrences."

Thus the duty of the defense is automatically divided by asking the questions:

1. What did Kaltenbrunner do, good and evil, from his appointment as chief of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt on 1 February 1943 on?

2. To what extent can it justly be said that in the essential points he did not possess sufficient knowledge about all the crimes against humanity and against the laws of war?

3. In how far can his guilt be established from the viewpoint that he should have known about the serious crimes against international law in which Section (Amt) IV of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt (Secret State Police) was directly or indirectly involved?

1. What has Kaltenbrunner done? In this connection I am passing over the accusation brought against him by the prosecution, for his participation in the events of the occupation of Austria and Czechoslovakia; no matter with what energy he followed his goal to see his Austrian homeland incorporated into the German Reich, and to the end of this realization use the SS forces under his command: this aim can not have been a criminal one according to the world-conscience. Just as little could one, because of the forcible means at that time employed to accomplish the annexation of Austria which was historically due and desired by millions, reach a verdict of guilt. Kaltenbrunner was still much too insignificant a man for that. Economic distress, Anschluss movement, National Socialism: This was the way of the majority of the Austrian people, not the National-Socialist ideology; for Hitler himself was from the standpoint of Austrianism a spiritual and political renegade. Yet the Austrian Anschluss movement was a people's movement before National Socialism had reached any importance in Germany. Austria wanted to protest against the Versailles and St. Germain ruling which forbade the Anschluss, by holding a plebiscite in each "Land". After 90 percent had voted in Tyrol and Salzburg, the victorious powers threatened to discontinue the shipment of food supplies. Hitler's seizure of power paralyzed the desire for Anchluss among those not of the party, but the distress in Austria became still more acute and isolated the Dollfuss-Schuschnigg regime. The incorporation into the Greater-German sphere of economics, where the removal of mass unemployment seemed to be the source of hope, appeared to the greatly distressed Austrian people as the only way out. The wave of enthusiasm which on 10 October 1938 went through all of Austria was real. To want to deny this today would be to falsify history. The Anschluss, and not the Dollfuss-Schuschnigg government, was based on democracy. Just as little can one, I believe, according to the reasons mentioned above, reach a verdict of guilty for Kaltenbrunner because of his alleged activity in the question of Czechoslovakia. In my opinion the question of guilt and expiation becomes acute only for the time after 1 February 1943. The indignation of the German people over one of the most infamous terroristic measures, the taking into protective custody, had already before this date become immense. Is it correct to say that Kaltenbrunner himself, of whom many orders for protective custody bearing his signature are in evidence before the court, inwardly abhorred this type of suppression of human liberties?

DEFENSE

May I refer to just a few sentences from his interrogations?

Question: "Did you know that protective custody was at all permissible and was used frequently?"

Answer: "As I have related, I discussed the idea of 'Protective Custody' with Himmler, already in 1942. But I believe, already before this time to have corresponded quite extensively on this subject with him as well as once also with Thierack. I consider protective custody as applied in Germany only in a smaller number of cases a necessity of state, or better said as a measure such as is justified by war. For the rest I often, and well founded, according to the history of law voiced my opinion and turned against this conception and against the application of any protective custody in principle. I had several discussions about it with Himmler and with Hitler also: I had publicly taken my stand against it at a meeting of prosecutors, in 1944 I believe, because I have always been of the opinion that a man's freedom is one of his highest possessions, and only the lawful sentence of a regular court of justice, rooted in the constitution may limit or take away this freedom."

Here the same man expresses the right principles. The observance of which would have spared the German people and the world from untold suffering, and the nonobservance of which constitutes the guilt of this man who in spite of his right perception suited his actions to the so-called necessity of the State. He thereby, against his own will and knowledge, became subject to the principle of hatred, which sooner or later will always shake or shatter the foundations of the strongest state. "Right is what benefits the people," Hitler had proclaimed. I well believe that Kaltenbrunner today deeply regrets to have adhered too long to this maxim.

Although the prosecution has not been able to produce even one single original signature of Kaltenbrunner in connection with order for protective custody and I do not think it incredible when Kaltenbrunner deposes, that never did he himself put into effect such an order for protective custody by his signature; nevertheless in view of the tragical results due to so many of these orders I do not need to say even one word as to whether he is entirely blameless or is much less to blame because these orders had perhaps been signed without his knowledge; then of course the question arises immediately how such an occurrence could be possible in, it is true, an extraordinarily large office. Be that as it may: In affairs of such depth and such tragic outcome one does not feel inclined to make any difference between knowledge and ignorance due to negligence because one wants to hold everyone occupying a post in an office responsible for what happens there. This recognition is also the meaning of Kaltenbrunner's statement regarding his fundamental responsibility as cited above. Where the happiness and fate of living men are involved it is impossible to retreat under the pretext of ignorance in order to avoid punishment, at best for the purpose of mitigation of sentence. The defendant knows this too. Orders for protective custody were the ominous harbingers of the concentration camps. And I am not giving out a secret when I say that the responsibility for issuing orders for protective custody includes already the beginning of responsibility for the fate of those held in the concentration camps. I could never admit that Dr. Kaltenbrunner may have known of the excesses of suffering of the thousands who languished in the camps; for, as soon as the gates of the concentration camps were closed there began the exclusive influence of that other office, the frequently mentioned central for economy and administration (Wirtschafts- und Verwaltungshauptamt). Instead of referring to many statements of witnesses to this point I refer to the one of the witness Dr. Hoettl who, when asked about subordination in rank, replied: "The concentration camps were exclusively under the command of the SS-Central office for economy and administration, hence not under the central Reich-Security Main Office and therefore not under Kaltenbrunner. In this sphere he had no authority of command and no competency." Other witnesses have said that of necessity Kaltenbrunner should have had knowledge of the sad conditions in the concentration camps, but there is no doubt that the commanders of the concentration camps themselves deliberately concealed penal excesses of the guards from their superiors. It is furthermore a fact, that the conditions found by the Allies upon their arrival were almost exclusively the results of the catastrophic military and economic situation during the last weeks of the war and which the world mistakenly took for general conditions of former times. The above statement is fully verified by the statements of the camp commander of Auschwitz, Hoess, who, because of his later activity in the system of concentration camps of the central office for economy and administration, had made an accurate survey. For Hoess there exists no inward reason whatsoever to give a false testimony. A person like him, who has sent millions of men to their deaths, comes no longer under the authority of human judges and considerations. Hoess stated: "The so-called mistreatment and tortures in the concentration camps * * * were not, as assumed, a method. They were rather excesses of individual leaders, sub-leaders and men who laid violent hands upon the inmates." These elements themselves were, according to the statement of Hoess, taken to task for that. I believe I need not go into anymore details of how, according to various witnesses, visitors of the concentration camps were impressed and surprised by the good conditions, cleanliness and order in the camps and therefore no suspicion was aroused as to special sufferings of the inmates. But it would be worse than bad taste if I contested the fact, that a chief of the intelligence service, if only on the basis of foreign news of atrocities, should not have felt the responsibility in the interest of humanity to clear up any doubts arising along that line. This seems to be confirmed by the statement of Dr. Meyer of the International Red Cross (Doc. Kr. 4, Question 7), for the permission to have the International Red Cross visit the Jewish Camp at Theresienstadt and to allow food and medical supplies to be sent in, seems to be proof of the bad conditions in the camps during the last months of the war; nobody would allow neutral or foreign observers to have insight into the camps if it had been known that crimes against humanity occurred regularly in the camps, as is asserted by the prosecution. In any case I do not come to the result that Kaltenbrunner had full knowledge of the "conditions" in the concentration camps, but that it was his duty to investigate into the fate of those who were imprisoned. Kaltenbrunner might have found out then, that a considerable number of the inmates was sent to the camps because they were criminals, a much smaller portion was there because of their political or ideological viewpoints or because of their race etc; but that he would have found out about those primitive offenses against humanity, about those excesses and all the distress of these people, I do contest in agreement with Kaltenbrunner.

DEFENSE

The way to arrive at the truth was immensely complicated in Germany, and even the chief of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt found nearly unconquerable obstacles in the hierarchy of jurisdiction and authority of other offices and persons. The improvement of the sad lot of the internees was from 1943 a problem which could have been solved only through the dissolution of such camps. A Germany of the last 12 years without any concentration camps would, indeed, have been an utopia. On the whole, Kaltenbrunner was but a small wheel of this machinery. In the preceding, paragraph, I spoke about the subject of the orders for protective custody and of their effect.

Dr. Kaltenbrunner has affirmed the necessity for work education camps, owing to, as stated by him during his examination, the conditions then prevailing in the Reich, to the shortcomings of the labor market, and to other reasons. And, if I am not mistaken, no convincing proof was submitted of mistreatment and cruelties in such camps. The reason may well lie in the fact that these camps were in some respects only related to, but not on equal footing with concentration camps. With all available means of evidence, Kaltenbrunner has opposed the accusation of having covered orders of execution with his signature. The witnesses Hoess and Zutter state that they saw such orders in isolated cases. The prosecution, however, does not seem to have proved that any such orders were issued without judicial sentence or without reasons justifying the death, with the exception, though, of a particularly serious case reported from hearsay by the witness Zutter, adjutant of the camp commander of Mauthausen. Thereby, a teletype signed by Kaltenbrunner is said to have authorized, in the spring of 1945, the execution of parachutists. An original signature by Kaltenbrunner is entirely lacking. I think I may assert that he did not sign any such orders concerning life and death, because he was not authorized to do so. Dr. Hoettl as a witness stated: "No, Kaltenbrunner did not issue such orders and could not in my opinion give such orders (for killing Jews) on his own accord." And Waneck explicitly confirmed as follows: "It is known to me that Himmler personally decided over life and death and other punishment of inmates of concentration camps."

DEFENSE

Thus the exclusive authority of Himmler in this sad field may be considered proved.

It would however be presumptuous if I were to deny the guilt of Kaltenbrunner completely on this point. If such orders were executed on members of foreign powers, for example an order based on the so-called "Commando-Order" of Hitler of 18 October 1942, then there arises the question of the responsibility of that person, whose signature was affixed to these orders, because the misuse of his name by subalterns was possible. It is certain that Kaltenbrunner had exerted not the least influence in originating the "Commando-Order." It can, however, hardly be doubted that this decree in itself constituted a violation of international law. The development of the second World War into a total war by necessity created an abundance of new stratagems. Even where bona fide soldiers were employed in their execution a motive of bitterness, humanly quite understandable, over the perhaps gangsterlike conduct of command troops concerned and other things could not justify the order. Fortunately but very few people fell victim to this order of Hitler. Perhaps one would ask me, whether it is my duty or whether I am only permitted to reiterate such points of incrimination as I have just done, since this seems to be the task of the prosecution. To this I reply: If the defense is so liberal as to admit the negative side of a personality, it surely is apt to be heard more readily when it approaches the Tribunal with the request to appraise the positive side in its full significance.

However, is there a positive side at all in the present case? I believe, I may answer in the affirmative. I already pointed out several facts, which are connected with the time of the assumption of office by Kaltenbrunner. During the short time of 2 years of activity, this man has made himself a bearer of happy and humane ideas. I wish to remind of his attitude toward the lynch-order of Hitler with respect to downed enemy aviators. The witness, General of the Air Force, Koller portrayed the decent conduct of Kaltenbrunner which led to a total sabotage of this order. After first describing the contents of Hitler's order and Hitler's threat then pronounced during the discussion of the situation, namely that all and any saboteurs of this order shall be shot dead, Koller continues to repeat the assertions of Kaltenbrunner.

Permit me to quote a few sentences of the statements of Koller. "Kaltenbrunner said: The tasks of the S.D. are continuously given a wrong interpretation. Such matters are not the concern of the S.D. Moreover, no German soldier will do what the Fuehrer demands. He does not kill prisoners and if a few fanatic partisans of Mr. Bormann try to do so, the German soldier will interfere. * * * Furthermore, I myself will do nothing in this matter. * * *" Koller and Kaltenbrunner, in other words, were fully agreed on that matter. This positive action of Kaltenbrunner, important for the judgment of the actual nature of his personality, does not stand alone. Witness Dr. Hoettl confirmed the fact, that in questions of the future fate of Germany, Kaltenbrunner went if not beyond so at least up to the borderline of high treason. This witness for example confirms that Kaltenbrunner in March 1944 caused Hitler to moderate the Plans concerning the Hungarian question, and that he succeeded in preventing the entry of Rumanian units into Hungary. It was by the exertion of his influence that the planned regime by an Hungarian National Socialist Government did not materialize for some time.

Dr. Hoettl then says literally: "Since 1943, I advocated towards Kaltenbrunner, that Germany must attempt at all cost to end the war. I informed him of my connections with an American authority in Lisbon. I also informed him, that by way of the Austrian resistance movement I had taken up new contacts with an American authority abroad. He declared to be prepared to go to Switzerland with me and there to take up personally negotiations with the American representative, in order to prevent further useless bloodshed."

The depositions of witness Dr. Neubacher run along the same lines. This witness testified to an important positive human action of Kaltenbrunner. Upon the question whether Kaltenbrunner had assisted the witness in moderating as much as possible terror policies in Serbia, Dr. Neubacher answered, and I quote, "Yes, in this field I owe much to the assistance of Kaltenbrunner. The German police agencies in Serbia knew of me and of Kaltenbrunner that he, in his capacity as Chief of the foreign intelligence service (Auslandsnachrichtendienst), uncompromisingly assisted my policies in the southeastern territory. Thereby my ability to influence the police office was accomplished. Kaltenbrunner's assistance was of value in my aspirations to overthrow the then prevailing system of collective responsibility and repression with the aid of judicious officers."

DEFENSE

I am further mentioning the relief work of the Geneva Red Cross, which is due to the initiative of Kaltenbrunner. The activity of the defendant with respect to this, was portrayed by the witness Prof. Burckhardt, Dr. Bachmann and Dr. Meyer. As a consequence many thousands were able to exchange their captivity for liberty. I should like to point your attention to a few words, submitted by the defendant Seyss-Inquart on two points. He mentioned that Kaltenbrunner worked for a complete autonomy of the Polish state as well as for the reintroduction of the independence of both Christian Churches.

Kaltenbrunner tried to realize his human intentions not only in this field. Therefore it seems to me to be of significance; to point out his efforts to make Austrian Gauleiters understand, that any resistance against troops of the Western powers would be senseless and that in view of this, irresponsible orders for resistance were not to be issued. This was confirmed by the witness Waldeck. The prosecution held Kaltenbrunner responsible for the evacuation and planned destruction of certain concentration camps. I believe this proof may not only be considered as unsuccessful, but rather as a proof for the contrary. Upon the question addressed to Dr. Hoettl, whether Kaltenbrunner had instructed the Commandant of the concentration camp Mauthausen to surrender the camp to the advancing troops, Dr. Hoettl answered: "It is correct, that Kaltenbrunner issued such an order. He dictated it in my presence for transmission to the Camp Commandant."

As a supplement, Kaltenbrunner during his personal examination, declared very logically:

Even if, according to his orders, the camp Mauthausen, filled with professional criminals, was not to be evacuated, an order to evacuate Dachau was devoid of any basis by reason of its, compared with Mauthausen, harmless inmates. According to the testimony of Freiherr von Eberstein, the destruction of the concentration camp Dachau with its two secondary camps was the wish dream of the then Gauleiter of Munich, Giessler.

Finally the witness Waldeck confirmed the fact that such an order of Kaltenbrunner had not become known to him; that, however, due to his position with Kaltenbrunner he would have known it, had such an order been issued by the latter or even if the issuance of such an order had been taken into consideration.

Who actually issued these orders, can no longer be established with certainty. The witness Hoess in his examination, mentioned an order of evacuation by Himmler as well as directly by Hitler. In this connection it seems appropriate to me to point to Kaltenbrunner's participation in the sad case of Sagan as charged by the prosecution. With reference to Kaltenbrunner's statement, confirmed by the examination of the witness Wielen, it appears to me to be a proven fact, that this matter came for the first time before Kaltenbrunner only several weeks later, after the conclusion of this tragedy.

It also appears to me doubtful whether the so-called task units (Einsatzgruppen), deployed upon the basis of Hitler's "Commissar Order" of 1941, were still in existence and functioning after the appointment of Kaltenbrunner. Some facts speak for it, others against it. Kaltenbrunner denied the existence of these groups for the period of his office as Chief of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt. I do not want to lose myself in details but I should like to point the attention of the Tribunal to these doubts. The same applies, for example, to the bullet decree (Kugelerlass). Document 1650-PS, USA 246, confirms that it was not Kaltenbrunner but Mueller, the Chief of Amt IV who signed the instructions involved, while document 3844-PS, USA 801, deals with personal signatures of the defendant. It appears to me, that the first document deserves preference. May I draw your attention to such documents, which are rather inconclusive, insofar as they are based upon indirect observation.

I trust that the Tribunal possesses sufficient experience in evaluating evidence so that I do not have to argue about this any further.

I have thus far voluntarily conceded the negative in order to be the more justified in emphasizing the positive in Kaltenbrunner's personality. In how far, however, will I be justified in stating that Kaltenbrunner had actually insufficient knowledge of many war crimes and crimes against humanity which in the course of the last 2 years of war were committed with some kind of participation of the Section IV (Gestapo) ?

Would such a defense offer the prospect of essentially exculpating the Chief of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt? Kaltenbrunner admitted during his examination that he received knowledge of orders, instructions and directives—unmindful of their originating long before, in some instances even several years before his assumption of office—only very late, sometimes as late as 1944 or 1945.

DEFENSE

I will not at this moment try to prove in detail these statements of Kaltenbrunner's. The prosecution is out to find exclusively whether such orders, decrees, directives, etc. were also executed during the period of time in which the defendant was in office as head of the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheits-hauptamt). It is also often very difficult for the defense counsel to follow up the secret channels of knowing or not knowing of a defendant. Perhaps the defense counsel lacks sometimes the necessary distance for a free judging in view of the hecatombes of victims spread out across a whole continent and he is unjust.

At his interrogation at court, Kaltenbrunner once explained the difficult position he was in when he took over his office on 1 February 1943 and I hope that nobody will misjudge this situation. The Reich was still fighting and even in 1943 still dangerous for any adversary colliding with it. But it was already clear that it was a fight for a goal in the infinitely far away and out of reach. Who tries to hold back the spokes of the wheels of a carriage rolling into an abyss at top speed will perish. Coupled with these conditions from which there was no way of escaping, there was an officiousness uncreative and caused by nervous insecurity in all areas of private and public life. Kaltenbrunner said with regard to this situation: "I beg you to put yourself into my situation. I came to Berlin in the beginning of February 1943. I began my work in May 1943 except for a few visits of introduction. In the fourth year of the war the orders and decrees of the Reich had piled up also in the executive sector already to many thousands on the table and in the filing cabinets of the civil service. It was impossible for a human being to read all that through even in the course of a year. Even if I had felt it to be my duty I could never possibly have made myself acquainted with all these orders."

In connection with this I remind you respectfully that according to the evidence given by the witness Dr. Hoettl and others the Reich Security Main Office in Berlin had 3000 employees of all categories when Kaltenbrunner was in office and that according to the statement of the same witness, Kaltenbrunner never dominated this office completely.

Nobody will be able to deny justification of the question, whether it was Kaltenbrunner's duty to have himself informed in the shortest possible time about the most essential proceedings, at least, in all the offices of the main office for Reich Security and whether he would not then very soon, after all, have obtained knowledge of, for example, Himmler's and Eichmann's Jewish operation and many other serious terrorist measures. I may remind you that Kaltenbrunner in answering my questions declared repeatedly and emphatically before this Tribunal that he protested regularly every time he heard of such occurrences, addressing himself to Himmler and even Hitler, but that he had but little success and that only after a long while. The defendant, for example, traces back the stopping of the extermination of Jews by an order of Hitler in October 1944 to his personal initiative. However difficult it may be to judge whether the power and influence of a single man would have been sufficient to bring about the suspension of a program of extermination already in its final phase, I believe I may say without being incorrect that many tens of thousands of Jews owe it to this man that they escaped the hell of Auschwitz and still see the light of the sun. From the statements of Messrs. Dr. Brachmann and Dr. Meyer of the International Red Cross (Doc. Kr. 4 and 5. Question 4) it appears that Kaltenbrunner asked the International Red Cross to organize relief shipments to a large political camp at Unskirchen near Wels.

Witness Wanek has characterized Kaltenbrunner's attitude toward the question of Himmler's Jewish policy as follows. He says: In the daily haste of our joint foreign-political labors and discussions we did not touch on the problem of the Jewish policy any more. At the time Kaltenbrunner came into office this question was already so far advanced that Kaltenbrunner could not have had any more influence on it. If Kaltenbrunner expressed himself at all on the subject, it was to the effect that mistakes had been made here that could never be made good. This witness then finally confirms that this operation was conducted independently of this enterprise, owing to, and through the direct channel of command of Himmler-Eichmann and says that the position of Eichmann which already had been a dominating one when Heydrich was still alive, had increased steadily, so that eventually he would have acted completely independently in the entire Jewish sphere (Doc. 8, Question 7).

Prof. Burckhardt states that Kaltenbrunner, when discussing the Jewish question, declared: "It is the greatest nonsense, all the Jews should be released, that is my personal opinion." (Doc. 3, Question 18).

But in spite of all this, the fundamental question is raised for the problem of guilt: May a high official and the director of an influential office, whose subordinates in a far reaching hierarchy continuously commit crimes against humanity and against the rules of international law, assume such an office at all or remain in such an office, although he condemns these crimes. But is it perhaps a different case, if this man has the intention of doing all that is humanly possible to break the chain of crimes and thereby finally to become a benefactor of humanity? The last question is in my opinion to be answered in the affirmative. It is to be appraised solely from the standpoint of the highest ethic principle:

DEFENSE

My further thought in this connection is the following: he who invokes his philanthropic intention is free of guilt if from the first day of his taking over such an office he refuses all active participation in the direct commission of injustice and even going beyond this, however, uses every conceivable possibility, nay seeks it out, so as to achieve the elimination of unjust orders and their execution through his never ending resistance and every kind of human cunning.

The defendant himself has also sensed and clearly recognized all these things. On account of the importance of the question I should like to refer to his interrogation:

Question: "I ask you whether there was a possibility that you might have brought about a change after having gradually learned the conditions in the Secret State Police and in the concentration camps, etc. If this possibility existed, will you then say that an alleviation i.e. an improvement, was brought about in the conditions in these fields due to your remaining in office?"

Answer: "I repeatedly applied for service at the front. But the most burning question which I had to decide for myself was whether the conditions would be thereby improved, alleviated or changed. Or is it your duty to do all that is possible in this position to change all the conditions that have here been so severely criticized? As my repeated demands to be sent to the front were refused, all I could do, therefore, was to make a personal attempt to change a system, the ideological and legal foundations of which I could no longer change, which has been illustrated by all the order presented here from the period before I was in office; I could only try to moderate these methods, so as to help to eliminate them definitely."

Question: "And so, did you consider it consistent with your conscience to remain in spite of this?"

Answer: "In view of the possibility of constantly using my influence on Hitler, Himmler and other people, I could not in my opinion reconcile it with my conscience to give up this position. I considered it my duty to take a personal stand against injustice."

As you see the defendant appeals to his conscience and you have to decide, whether this conscience, taking into consideration duty toward one's own country but also towards the community of mankind, has failed or not.

The duty which I have just mentioned, to resist the orders of evil, exists in itself for every human being, regardless of his position; this duty is expressly affirmed by Kaltenbrunner also. He who holds a state office, must in the first place be able to prove that he contributed toward abolishing the gigantic injustice which occurred in Europe as soon as he learned of it, if he does not want to become guilty. Has Dr. Kaltenbrunner presented sufficient proofs? The answer to this question I leave to your judgment. But one thing I should like to express as my opinion: This man was no conspirator, but rather he was exclusively a man acting under orders, under compulsion.

Himmler's order was to take over the main Reich Security Office. Is it right that a given order should change the fundamental aspect of the problem? This question is of the highest importance. The Charter of this Tribunal has forbidden appealing to orders for the purpose of avoiding punishment. The reasons given for this by the American Chief Prosecutor proceeded from the presumed knowledge of the crimes or their background in the minds of the higher leader which, therefore, prevented him from appealing to orders given. Like a red thread the fact runs through this trial that hardly one high official, in whatever position of public life he may have been, was put into office without the order of the highest representative of the legal authority of the state; for in the last three years of the war the already clearly distinguishable, inevitable destiny of the Reich meant for the holder of a high office the renunciation of that part of life which many people say makes life worthwhile. Even during the duration of the war orders held the office holder fast in his position as with an iron ring. There is also no doubt that he who refused to obey an order, especially in the last years of the war, had to fear his own death, and possibly also the extinction of his family.

From whatever side we approach the problem of orders in Germany, after 1933, the appeal to the above-mentioned state of necessity ought not to be denied to the defendant; because the principle of necessity, which exists also in the German criminal code and which probably exists in the criminal codes of all civilized nations, is based on the freedom of the individual being necessary for the affirmation of any guilt.

If the perpetrator is no longer free to act, because another person deprives him of this liberty by endangering his life, then, on principle, he is not guilty. I do not want at this instant, to examine whether in the German world of reality of the last years such a direct immediate danger for one's own life always existed; an encroachment upon the freedom of the man receiving orders existed in smaller or larger dimension without doubt. It seems certain to me that Himmler would have interpreted a refusal of Kaltenbrunner to take over the direction of the Reich Security-Main Office as sabotage and would, as a necessary conclusion, have eliminated him.

DEFENSE

Hitler was one of the greatest breakers of law that world history has ever known. Many even affirm the duty to kill such a monster, so as to guarantee for millions of human beings the right to freedom and life. At these trials the most different points of view with regard to the "Putsch" especially the killing of the tyrant have been preferred by witnesses and defendants. I cannot recognize the duty, but the right is certainly not contestable. If the oppression of human freedom occurs by means of a clearly unjust, because misanthropic, order, the scales in the now ensuing conflict between obedience and freedom of conscience will be turned to the side of the latter. Also the so-called oath of allegiance could not justify a different point of view because, as everybody feels, the obligation to allegiance presupposes duties of both partners so that he who treads under foot the obligation to respect human conscience in the person of his subalterns loses, at the same moment, the right to expect obedience. The tortured conscience is freed and breaks the ties which the oath has created. Perhaps some persons will not agree with my point of view on this problem and will point at the necessity of an orderly state of community and the wholesomeness of obedience especially in the interest of this orderly state, or they will point at the prudence of those in command and at the impossibility of knowing and evaluating all such orders as the person in command can, they will point to patriotism and many more other points of view. And although all that may be correct, it remains the absolute duty, to resist an order, the purpose of which, clearly recognizable for a subaltern, contains the realization of evil and violates unequivocally the sound sentiments for humanity and peace among peoples and individuals. The phrase "In the fight of a people for life or death there is no question of legality," is not thought out to the end.

Even the immediate danger of life of the person receiving the order could not induce me to change my conviction. Dr. Kaltenbrunner would not deny that he who stands at the head of an office, of great importance to the community, is obliged to sacrifice also his life under the above-mentioned provisions. If, however the direct present danger for his own life and that of his family cannot excuse him, it does moderate his culpability. Kaltenbrunner only means to point to this moral and legal evaluation of his position. Thus he emphasized a fact, historically proven, which was one of the deeper reasons for the collapse of the Reich; for no living man can bring liberty, peace, and welfare to a country, who himself carries chains reluctantly and has lost that freedom which is the decisive characteristic of all human beings. I believe Kaltenbrunner would like to be reborn and I know that he would fight for that freedom with his life's blood. Kaltenbrunner is guilty; but he is less guilty than he appears to be for the prosecution. He will await your judgment as the last representative of an ominous symbol of a period of the Reich, darker and more laden with anguish than any other period, and yet he was a man one could not meet without a feeling of pathos.

2. FINAL PLEA by Ernst Kaltenbrunner

The Prosecution held me responsible for the concentration camps, for the destruction of Jewish life, for Einsatzgruppen and other things similar. All of these are neither in accord with the presentation of evidence nor with the truth. The accusers as well as the accused are exposed to the dangers of a summary proceeding and they must realize it.

Correct it is that I had to take over the RSHA, but in that point alone there is no guilt. Such offices exist in governments of other nations. But the task with which I was charged and the activity with which I was charged in the year 1943 was almost exclusively in the reorganization of the German political and military intelligence service, not as the successor of Heydrich but rather, almost a year after his death, when the suspicion of collaboration with the enemy of Admiral Canaris over long years existed, I, according to orders and as an officer, had to accept this post. Very shortly, to the most terrific extent, I ascertained the treason of Canaris and his helpers. The Offices IV and V of the RSHA were subordinate to me only formally, but never in fact.

The chart shown here and the chain of command which was concluded from it is wrong and misleading. Himmler, who was a master of raising the SS into the smallest fragmentary groups to bring them under his immediate influence as far as it served his purpose, together with Chief of Police Mueller, committed crimes which we know today. Contrary to public opinion, I emphatically state that the activities of Himmler and his consultants and the offices which were under him I learned of only to the smallest extent and as far as it concerned my own sphere.

DEFENSE

In the Jewish question, I was deceived just as long as other high functionaries. Never did I approve or tolerate the biological extermination of Jewry. Anti-Semitism as found in Party and State laws was to be considered an emergency measure in time of war. The anti-Semitism of Hitler as we know it today was barbarism. I did not participate in either of these forms and I assert, as I shall show, that the prevention of the persecution of the Jews is to be traced to me because of my influence on Hitler.

The Prosecution has submitted several photographs which allegedly show my knowledge of crimes in concentration camps such as in Mauthausen. Never did I set foot in Camp Mauthausen, but only that part of the labor camps where the quarry was, where hardened criminals were employed according to the law, not political prisoners. The pictures show an administration building and nothing else. Affidavit USA 909, Pages 894 to 897 F is therefore quite factually impossible and is wrong. The picture with Hitler shows a building at a construction area of Linz, 35 kilometers away from Mauthausen.

The statement given by Dr. Morgen, the witness, seems essentially true but it needs to be supplemented as far as my person and my reactions to this are concerned. The witness in his statement was too much concerned with himself and does not say that because of my influence his office of the juridical system was transferred to Office V of the RSHA so that, as a special office, he could investigate the concentration camps to supplement the research which had been carried on. Perhaps he cannot testify as to additional happenings and incidents, contrary to Mueller, who raged as a madman as the chief of the Criminal Police Nebe did. On the same day an exact written report was sent to Hitler. On the same day I was asked to appear, and I went there. After much discussion, Hitler said that there had been an investigation against Himmler and Pohl. A special court was to be instituted, and arrest was to be the lot of those involved. Pohl was to be dismissed from his office. In front of me Hitler gave orders that Pohl should be called to him, and he gave me his pledge to the effect that even today he would take all steps against any further misdeeds.

My request to be dismissed and to be sent to the front he denied, saying that I was essential, and that I could not be spared from the intelligence service. Eichmann was arrested and I was told of the decree by Himmler in October of 1944, which confirms and puts in final form that which I have just testified in its wording is the last devilish work of Hitler.

Will the Prosecution even now not see any discrepancy that office V of the RSHA discovered the crimes of office IV, and in that fact see the proof of the fact that I never knew the true happenings, and at the moment when I realized what was taking place, protested in my own office.

KALTENBRUNNER

Should I have left, or was it my duty to use all my powers to fight that barbarism? That alone is to be decided as my guilt.

The defamations raised by the Prosecution against me, the letter which seems to be so highly incriminating here, written to the Mayor of Vienna, which I do not remember to have signed—that matter has been clarified and explained for me today.

All of the 12,000 people who at that time, together with tens of thousands of German men and women were used to fortify the region east of Vienna, together with an additional 2,000 persons in Gunskirchen in Upper Austria, were taken care of by the International Red Cross because of my intervention and were brought to freedom. During the excitement of the cross examination I could not recall that in this period of time in which the men of Office V were active in the camps, that I could not any longer believe in a threat to Jewish life. My credibility has been doubted ever since then. My credibility would have been restored if an inquiry had been sent to the International Red Cross at Geneva.

If the question is put to me, why did you remain even after you knew what was taking place and that your superiors were committing crimes, to that I can answer only that I could not set myself up to be their judge, that not even this Tribunal here will be in a position to ask for expiation of these crimes.

In the last days the Prosecution has accused me of my participation in the murder of a French General. I heard of the murder of the German General Brodowski and the order given by Hitler to investigate the question of reprisal. I only heard of the murder here for the first time a few days ago. Panzinger was the chief of the Reichs Criminal office and was subordinate to no one except Himmler, who was the Chief of the Prisoner of War System and of the Replacement Army. He was not, as the Prosecution asserts, an official of the Secret State Police.

As far as the teletype message of the 30th of December, 1944, is concerned, with the signature in my name, in which the carrying out of the plan is directed to and made known to Himmler at his headquarters, I should like to say that from the 23d of December until the 3d of January I was in Austria with my family. This teletype message was not seen by me, and I could not have seen it, nor could I have signed it.

In November 1944, exclusively it was my orders to check the report of the Reich Press Chief on the murder of the French General. The results were sent to the headquarters.

DEFENSE

I regretted the fact that Hitler, in a situation as I found it when I assumed office in 1943, was not in a better relationship to the churches, which are a factor in an order and which cannot be done away with. I tried to do everything possible. The presentation of evidence has seen this, and the Prosecution did not draw any consequences.

I know only that I put my powers at the disposal of the German people as a German soldier. I could only put myself at the service of the defense of those factors which had brought Germany to the abyss, and after the collapse of the Reich I still did it.

If in my work I made mistakes, if orders which are accused of being cardinal orders were given out before my time of office, then I am in a fate which is stronger than myself, but which is carrying me along with it. I am accused here because Himmler and other elements which were completely contrary to me needed deputies. Whether my story will be accepted or not, I should like to ask you that the fate and the honor of hundreds of thousands of the living and dead of the General SS, of the Waffen SS, and of the officialdom who, up until the very last, fought bravely, fought for their rights, that you do not connect them in any way with your just curse towards Himmler. Just as I, they believed that they were acting under the law.

VIII. ALFRED ROSENBERG

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Alfred Thoma, Defense Counsel

May it please the Tribunal:

The documentary film which was shown in this room and which was supposed to illustrate the "Rise and Fall of National Socialism" begins with a speech delivered by Rosenberg concerning the development of the Party up to the taking over of power. He also describes the Munich insurrection and says that in the morning of 9 November 1923 he saw police cars with machine guns assembling in the Ludwigstrasse in Munich and he knew that the March to the Feldherrnhalle was imminent. Nevertheless he marched in the first lines. Today, also, my client takes the same position in face of the indictment formulated by the prosecutors of the United Nations. He does not want to be pictured as though nobody paid any attention to his books, his speeches, and his publications. Even today he does not want to appear as another person than he was once before, as a fighter for Germany's strong position in the world, namely a German Reich in which national freedom should be linked to social justice.

War of Aggression against the Soviet Union

Rosenberg is a German born in the Baltic provinces (Deutsch-Balte) who learned to speak Russian as a young boy, passed his examination in Moscow after the Technical College in Riga moved to Moscow during the 1st world war, took an interest in Russian literature and art, had Russian friends, and was puzzled by the fact that the Russian nation, defined by Dostojewsky as "the nation with God in its heart" was overcome by the spirit of materialistic Marxism and he considered it inconceivable and unjust that the right of self determination had often been promised indeed but never voluntarily granted to many nations of Eastern Europe which had been conquered by Tsarism as late as the 19th century.

Rosenberg became convinced that the Bolshevik Revolution was not directed against certain temporary political phenomena only but against the whole national tradition, against the religious faith and against the old rural foundations of the Eastern European nations and generally against the idea of personal property. At the end of 1918 he came to Germany and saw the danger of a Bolshevik revolution in Germany too; he saw the whole spiritual and material civilization of the occident endangered and believed to have found his life work in the struggle against this danger as a follower of Adolf Hitler. It was a political struggle against fanatic and well-organized opponents who disposed over international resources and international backing and who acted according to the principle: "Hit the Fascists wherever you can." But as little as one can deduce from the latter slogan that the Soviets entertained intentions of military aggression against Fascist Italy, as little as one can say that the struggle of the National-Socialists against Bolshevism meant a preparation for a war of aggression against the USSR.

To defendant Rosenberg a military conflict with the Soviet Union, especially a war of aggression against the latter, seemed as likely or as unlikely as to any German or foreign politician who had read the book Mein Kampf. It is not right to maintain that he was initiated in some way in plans of aggression against the Soviet Union; he rather publicly advocated proper relations with Moscow (Doc. Re 7b P. 147). Rosenberg never wanted a military intervention, however, he feared in turn the entry of the Red Army into the border states, then into Germany.

When in August 1939 Rosenberg learned about the conclusion of the Non-Aggression Pact between the German Reich and the Soviet Union, he was as little informed about the preliminary discussions as he was about the other foreign political measures taken by the Fuehrer, he might have gone to see the Fuehrer and protested against it. He did not do it and he did not object to it with a single word which the witness Goering confirmed as being a statement of Hitler's.

DEFENSE

As a witness, Rosenberg described (Prot. of 16 April 1946, p. 7894) that he was then suddenly called to Hitler at the beginning of April 1941 who told him that he considered a military clash with the Soviet Union as inevitable. Hitler offered two reasons for it:

1. The military occupation of Rumanian territory, namely Bessarabia and North Bukowina.
2. The tremendous increase of the Red Armies along the line of demarcation and on Soviet-Russian territory in general which had been going on for a long time.

These facts were so striking, he said, that he had already issued the appropriate military and other orders and that he would appoint Rosenberg in some way as a political adviser. As he further states as a witness, Rosenberg found himself confronted with an accomplished fact and even the sole attempt to talk about it was cut short by the Fuehrer with the remark that the orders had been issued and that hardly anything could be changed in this matter. Thereupon Rosenberg called some of his closest collaborators together because he did not know whether the military events would take place very soon or later on, and he also had some plans made concerning the treatment of the political problems. On 20 April 1941, Rosenberg received from Hitler the preliminary order to establish a central office to deal with questions concerning the East and to contact the competent highest Reich authorities with respect to these matters (Doc. 865-PS, USA 143).

If this statement made by Rosenberg in itself is not sufficient to refute the assertion made by the prosecution according to which Rosenberg is "personally responsible for the planning and execution of the war of aggression against Russia" (Brudno, on 9 Jan. 1946, p. 2278 of the protocol), and was aware of the "aggressive, predatory, character of the imminent war" (Rudenko, on 17 Apr. 1946, p. 8016 of the protocol)—if above all one does not want to admit that Rosenberg was convinced of an imminent aggressive war waged by the Soviet Union against Germany, I would like to bring up four more points in order to prove the correctness of the statements made by the defendant.

1. Rosenberg was not called to the well-known conference at the Reich Chancellery on 10 November 1937 ("Hossbach Document" Doc. 386-PS, USA-25) when Hitler disclosed for the first time his intentions of waging war; this was at a time when Rosenberg still had political influence or at least seemed to have it. If ever, he should have played the part of the intimate political instigator then.

2. Lammers in the capacity of a witness stated before this Tribunal that Hitler took all important decisions all by himself, thus also the decision concerning the war against Russia (Prot. P. 7363).

3. Upon my question about Rosenberg's influence with respect to Hitler's decisions concerning foreign policy, Goering replied before this Tribunal on 16 March 1946: "I think that after the accession to power the Fuehrer did not consult the Office of Foreign Affairs of the Party a single time about questions concerning the foreign policy and that it was created only for centrally taking care of certain questions concerning the foreign policy which came up within the party. As far as I know Rosenberg was certainly not consulted about political decisions after the accession to power." This was also confirmed by the witness Neurath on 26 June 1946.

As fourth argument I would further like to refer to the "Brief report concerning the activity of the Office of Foreign Affairs of the NSDAP." (Doc. 003-PS, USA-603). Brief mention is made in it of the "near East" in such a harmless manner, that no word has to be said about it. Also in the confidential reports 004-PS and 007-PS nothing is said about any preparations against the Soviet Union.

Administration in the East

It would be too easy, too superficial, and therefore unjust a procedure if one would say: (1) The Eastern territories were occupied in a war of aggression therefore anything the German administration has done there was criminal. (2) In his capacity of Reich Minister for the occupied Eastern territories Rosenberg was the responsible minister, therefore he must be punished for all crimes which have occurred there, at least for what happened within the scope of the jurisdiction and authority of the administrative bodies. I will have to demonstrate that this conception is not correct for legal and factual reasons.

1. General. Rosenberg was the organizer and the highest authority of the administration in the East. On 17 July 1941 he was appointed as Reich Minister for the occupied Eastern territories. According to instructions he performed already before that time preparatory work on questions concerning East Europe by contacting the Reich agencies concerned (Doc. 1039-PS, USA-146). He planned and set up his office for dealing centrally with questions concerning Eastern Europe (Doc. 1024-PS, USA-278). He had the provisional instructions for the Reich Commissioners drawn up (Doc. 1030-PS, USA-144), he delivered the program speech of 20 June 1941 (Doc. 1058-PS, USA-14) and above all he took part in the Fuehrer Conference of 16 July 1941 (L-221, USA-317).

DEFENSE

In the presence of Rosenberg, Lammers, Keitel, and Borrman Hitler said at that time that the real aims of the war against Russia should not be made known to the whole world, those present should understand clearly that "we will never withdraw from the new Eastern territories, whatever offers any opposition will be exterminated, never again must a military power develop west of the Ural; nobody but a German shall ever wear a weapon." Hitler proclaimed the subjection and the exploitation of the Eastern territories and in making these statements he was in opposition to what Rosenberg told him before—without being contradicted by Hitler—concerning his plans for the East.

Thus Hitler had probably a program of enslavement and exploitation.

Nothing is so natural and nothing is easier than to say before Rosenberg took over his Ministry already he knew Hitler's aims for the East; namely, (1) to rule it, (2) to administrate it, (3) to exploit it. Therefore he is not only an accomplice in a crime of conspiracy against peace, he is also jointly responsible for the crimes against humanity perpetrated in the Eastern territories, since Rosenberg held complete power, the highest authority in the East.

I shall deal later de jure and de facto with the question of Rosenberg's automatic responsibility in his capacity of supreme Chief of the Eastern territories. First I would like to consider the question of his individual responsibility. One could refer to two reasons: (a) because he allegedly participated in the preparation of the war of aggression against the Soviet Union; I have stated already that this assertion is not correct. Rosenberg has neither ideologically nor actually participated in the preparations of the war of aggression; (b) because he supported Hitler's plan of conquest by making plans, delivering speeches, organizing the administration.

When a minister or a general, following the instructions of the chief of State, elaborates plans or takes preparatory measures of organizational nature for events which might happen later, this activity cannot be considered as criminal even when thereby the interests of other countries are affected and even when the plans, preparations, and measures are intended for war. Only when the minister or general in question directs his activity towards things which have to be considered as criminal according to sound common sense and international sense of decency and justice can be held individually responsible. Rosenberg has continuously proved in words and deeds that the traditional conceptions of right are his conceptions also and that he is willing to stand up for them. His position was particularly difficult indeed since his supreme chief finally moved beyond the limits in his ideas, aims, and intentions, and since other strong forces also like Bormann, Himmler, and Gauleiter Koch were involved which prevented and sabotaged Rosenberg's good and fair intentions. Thus we witness the strange spectacle of a minister who governs but who partly cannot understand, partly cannot approve, partly does not know at all, the intentions of the Chief of State, and on the other hand that of a chief of State who appoints a minister to take office who is certainly an old and loyal political fellow combatant but with whom he has no spiritual contact whatsoever anymore. It would be wrong to judge without further examination such constellations according to the democratic conceptions of the responsibility of a minister. Rosenberg could not simply resign, but he also felt inwardly the duty of fighting for the opinion which appeared to him as being right and decent.

In his speech of 20 June 1941 Rosenberg says that it is the duty of the Germans to consider that Germany should not have to fight every 25 years for her holdings in the East. He by no means desires the extermination of the Slavs, but the advancement of all the nations of Eastern Europe, and the advancement not the annihilation of their natural independence. He demanded (Doc. 1058-PS, USA-147), "friendly sentiments" towards the Ukrainians, a guarantee of "national and cultural existence" for the Caucasians; he emphasized that even with a war on we were not enemies of the Russian people, whose great achievements we fully recognize. He advocated "the national right of self-determination of the people"—one of first points of the whole Soviet revolution. This was his idea, tenaciously defended till the end. The speech in question also contains the passage, of which the prosecution accuses him in particular, that the feeding of the German people during these years will be placed at the top of German demands in the East, and that the southern territories and North Caucasus would have to make up the balance in feeding the German people.

DEFENSE

Then Rosenberg continues literally: "We do not see at all why we should be compelled to feed the Russian people also from these surplus regions. We know that this is a bitter necessity which lies beyond any sentiment. Without a doubt an extensive evacuation will be necessary, and there are very hard years ahead for the Russians. To what extent industries are to be kept up there is a question reserved for future decision." This passage comes quite suddenly and all by itself in the long speech. One feels distinctly that it has been squeezed in, it is not Rosenberg's voice. Rosenberg does not proclaim here a program of his own, but only states facts which lie beyond his will. In the first directives of the East ministry (Doc. 1056-PS, USA-605) the feeding of the population is shown to be especially urgent, as well as its supplying with all medical necessities.

On the contrary, the true Rosenberg emerges in the conference of 16 July 1941, when in response to Hitler's plans, he called attention to the university of Kiev, and to the independence and cultural advancement of the Ukraine, and when he took stand against the full power of the police and above all against the appointment of Gauleiter Erich Koch in the Ukraine. (Doc. L-221).

One will say: "What is the use of opposition and protests, what is the use of secret reservations and of feigned agreement with Hitler's intentions," Rosenberg did cooperate all the same. Therefore he is responsible too. Later on I will outline in detail how and to what extent Rosenberg did adhere to the policy in the East, what things he did not do, and how he opposed them, what he planned and desired himself, in order to defend him against the grave charge of being responsible for the alleged exploitation and enslavement of the East. Here, I would like to point out the following: It was in no way a hopeless task to begin by accepting even Hitler's most passionate statements without contradiction in the hope and with the intention of attaining nevertheless a contrary result later on. In opposition to Hitler's statement, which said that: "No other than a German may ever wear weapons in the East", it was not long, for example before, on Rosenberg's recommendation, legions of volunteers were formed from the peoples of the East, and in opposition to Hitler, an edict of tolerance was issued at the end of 1941 for the churches of the East. (Doc. 1517-PS.)

If, at first, Rosenberg could achieve nothing for the autonomy of the Eastern nations, he still adhered to his plans for the future in this respect too. First he took care of the urgent agrarian question. An agrarian order was drawn up, which it was possible to present to the Fuehrer on 15 February 1942, and which was authorized by him in its unadulterated form. It was not an instrument of exploitation, but an act of liberal formation of the agrarian constitution in the midst of the most terrible of all wars. Right in the middle of the war the eastern countries not only received a new agrarian constitution but also agricultural machines. The witness Dencker, in his affidavit, has born witness to the following deliveries to the occupied Soviet territories including the former border states:

	Number of Pieces	Value in Reich marks
Plough tractors, 40-50 HP.	about 7,000	about 45,000,000.00
Thrashing machines	about 5,000	about 20,000,000.00
Agricultural tools	about 200,000	about 30,000,000.00
Gas generators for German and Russian tractors . . .	about 24,000	about 35,000,000.00
Reaping machines	about 35,000	about 15,000,000.00
Spare parts for German and Russian tractors and ag- ricultural machines		about 10,000,000.00
Scythes and sickles		about 10,000,000.00
Miscellaneous (hand equip- ment, tools, driving-belts, etc.)		about 15,000,000.00
Total		about 180,000,000.00

I do not think one can say that these deliveries were made in view of an exploitation. So, in this too, Rosenberg accomplished a piece of constructive work that was really a blessing.

In the following, I will first treat the question of Rosenberg's automatic responsibility as minister for the Eastern territories and then his criminal liability on the grounds of his official position.

2. Automatic responsibility (criminal liability). On 17 July 1941, Rosenberg was appointed Reich Minister for the occupied East territories. Two Reich commissariats were set up as supreme territorial authorities: "Ostland" (Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and white-Ruthenia) under the Reich Commissioner Lohse and Ukraine under Reich commissioner Koch. The Reich commissariats were divided into general districts and regions. Right from the beginning, the East Ministry was not conceived as an administrative authority built on a large scale, but as a central office, and supreme authority, which was to confine itself to overall instructions and fundamental directives, and in addition was to insure the reinforcing of material and personnel. The actual government was the duty of the Reich commissioner, he was the sovereign in his territory.

DEFENSE

It is, moreover, of special importance that Rosenberg as Minister for the East was not at the head of the whole Eastern administration, but that several top authorities existed at the same time. Goering, who was plenipotentiary for the four-year plan, was responsible for the control of the economy in all occupied territories, and in this respect had authority over the minister for the East, for Rosenberg could only issue economic decrees with Goering's permission. The chief of the German police Himmler was solely and exclusively competent for the security of the occupied Eastern territories as far as police authority was concerned; there was no police division at all in the ministry for the East, neither in the Reich commissariats. Rosenberg's competence was furthermore undermined by Himmler the "Reich commissioner for the preservation of German nationality" and by Speer, on behalf of whom a Fuehrer decree detached all technical matters from the East administration. It was further weakened by Goebbels who claimed for himself the control of propaganda in the occupied Eastern territories too. Later on I shall come to the important question of labor employment which was put under the authority of Sauckel.

Nevertheless, Rosenberg was the minister responsible for the occupied Eastern territories. In this respect, the following must be emphasized: In this trial Rosenberg is not made responsible from the political standpoint, since the high tribunal is no parliament; neither is he made responsible from the point of view of constitutional law, for the high tribunal is not a Supreme Court of Judicature. The liability of the defendant with respect to civil law is not in question either; but only his penal liability, his responsibility for his own alleged crimes and for the crimes of others. I do not need to outline in more detail that for a penal liability and condemnation, it must be proved that the defendant culpably and illegally committed acts forming a case which is punishable by law, and that he may only be punished for a non-action, i.e., a commission, if he had the legal duty to act, and if it was due to his inaction that the criminal result occurred, i.e., if he had the factual possibility of preventing the criminal result.

It seems to me of decisive importance that Rosenberg was a minister for the occupied Eastern territories, but not a sovereign. The Reich commissioners were sovereigns of the gigantic territories "Ostland" and "Ukraine". The lines along which these territories were to be constitutionally remodeled were not visible yet, but one thing was certain: The Reich Commissioner was the highest authority. For instance, it was he, who in the most important measures, like the shooting of inhabitants of a region for acts of sabotage, had the right to make the ultimate decision. (Doc. EC-347, USA-320, Prot. P. 2285.) The Reich, i.e., partly the East ministry and partly other authorities, detained the right to make fundamental legislation and give over-all supervision. By a slight change in the well known remark of Benjamin Constant, the French professor of constitutional law: "Le roi regne, mais il ne gouverne pas" one may define in the following way Rosenberg's position as minister for the occupied territories of the East: "Le ministre gouverne, mais il ne regne pas". As in certain dominions of the British empire, there existed a sovereignty of the Reich Commissioner with a central over-all supervision on the part of the minister for the East. Today, nobody would think of summoning the competent English minister before a tribunal, because a governor in India had allowed native villages to be bombed and burned down. And so I come to my conclusion, that in Rosenberg's case there exists no automatic, penal responsibility for the non-prevention of crimes in the East, because although he had the authority and supervision but was not sovereign, the two Reich Commissioners had the supreme authority.

It must furthermore be asked and briefly examined, whether the defendant is individually responsible, i.e., individually guilty of criminal exploitation and enslavement of the nations of the East and, may be, of further crimes. What was his attitude, what were the general lines and general trends of his policy, what did he positively do, and what did he prevent or at least try to prevent?

3. Individual responsibility (penal culpability) a. General lines and general trends of Rosenberg's policy in the East. In the Baltic countries, national administrations (directorates) were installed under German supervision. The German administration was compelled by the Reich minister for the occupied territories of the East, to show the greatest understanding for all desires which could be gratified and strive for a good relationship with the Baltic countries; the Baltic countries had a free legal, educational, and cultural system and were only limited with respect to questions concerning politics, economy, and the police. After the war of 1914-1918 agrarian reform in the Baltic states was carried out at the expense of the 700 years old German property. Nevertheless, Rosenberg, as Minister for the East, made a law giving back to private owners the farms which had already been collectivized in past by the Soviet Union after 1940, and in this restitution of the soil which had once been taken away from the German proprietors showed the greatest good will conceivable on the part of the German Reich.

DEFENSE

This, as well as the already-mentioned agrarian order, has been expressly confirmed by witness Riecke (Transcript P. 8032).

In the general district of White Ruthenia, the independent administration was initiated under Reich Commissar Kube. The "White Ruthenia Central Committee" was founded, furthermore a White Ruthenian relief system and a White Ruthenian youth organization. When a White Ruthenian youth delegation returned from a visit to Germany, Kube said that he would continue to act as a father to the White Ruthenian youth. In the following night he was murdered, but his policy was not changed. I should like to observe in passing that the actual Russian territories between Narwa and Leningrad and around Smolensk had remained all the time under military administration. Likewise the districts around Kharkow and the Crimea.

As far as the Ukraine is concerned, Rosenberg intended to give it, as soon as possible, an extensive central self-administrative sovereignty, similar to the directorates in the Baltic states and pledged to a definite advancement of the cultural and educational needs of the people. After Rosenberg had originally thought that he could assume, Hitler agreed to this idea, another conception came to prevail, namely that all forces should be directed towards the war economy. Rosenberg only managed to achieve and carry through one thing: The new agrarian order of 15 February 1942 which provided for a transition from the collective economy of the Soviet Union to personal exploitation, and then to ownership by the peasants. On 23 June 1943 the property declaration was issued as a complement to this. At first it was not possible to carry it out because of Reich Commissar Koch's resistance, but then military events brought everything to an end. A further fundamental decree was based on a general adjustment of the school system, which Rosenberg had ordered to be worked out, because the Reich Commissioner of the Ukraine declined to do it himself. Rosenberg provided for elementary schools and higher technical schools, the Reich Commissioner protested against this. On account of the conflict which became more and more acute between Rosenberg and Reich Commissioner Koch, Hitler issued, in June 1943, the following written instructions: The Reich Commissioner had no right to make any obstructions, but the Reich Minister for the occupied territories of the East should confine himself to essential questions, and when issuing any orders should make it possible for the Reich Commissioner of the Ukraine to take up his position beforehand, which practically meant Koch's coordination along with Rosenberg.

b. Witness Lammers. During his examination of 8 April 1946 (Transcript P. 7374) the witness Lammers described Rosenberg's peculiar constitutional position as Reich Minister for the occupied territories of the East, and his political position which became weaker and weaker. I would like to emphasize the following striking and especially important declarations made by the witness: the authority of the Reich Minister for the occupied territories of the East was undermined by the Wehrmacht, by Goering as plenipotentiary for the four-year plan, by Himmler as chief of the German police, by Himmler as Reich Commissioner for the preservation of German nationality (resettlement measures), by Sauckel as general plenipotentiary for Labor utilization, by Speer in the field of armaments and technique and finally through differences of opinion with propaganda minister Goebbels. Furthermore, Rosenberg was limited by the fact that two Reich Commissioners, Lohse and Koch, were appointed for the occupied Eastern territories. The higher SS and police chief was "personally and directly" subordinated to the Reich Commissioner, but, as Lammers has declared, in technical respects he could not receive any orders from Rosenberg or from the Reich Commissioner but only from Himmler. Lammers said furthermore: Rosenberg always wished to pursue a moderate policy in the East, he was without any doubt against a "policy of extermination" and against a "policy of deportation", which was often advocated by other parties. He made efforts to rebuild agriculture through the agrarian law, to put order into the educational system, church affairs, the universities, and schools. Rosenberg had great difficulties in succeeding for the Reich Commissioner for the Ukraine before all others simply did not follow Rosenberg's orders. Rosenberg was for setting up a certain independence of the Eastern nations, he especially had at heart the cultural interests of the latter. The differences of opinion between Koch and Rosenberg filled volumes of files. Hitler called Rosenberg and Koch, and decided that they should meet each month in order to consult each other. The witness Lammers said quite rightly that for Rosenberg as the superior minister it was unendurable to have to come to an agreement in each case with his subordinate the Reich Commissioner; subsequently it was shown that in spite of the meeting they came to no agreement, and finally it was Mr. Koch who was right in the eyes of the Fuehrer. As Lammers finally says, it was about the end of 1943 that Rosenberg was received for the last time by the Fuehrer, and before that time too he had always great difficulties in reaching the Fuehrer. There were no more Reich Cabinet sessions since 1937 already.

DEFENSE

c. Rosenberg and Koch. Hitler turned his attention more and more to the Bormann-Himmler group. The East became the ground for experiment. For this group, as is now quite clear today, it seemed hopeless to look for an understanding on the part of Rosenberg for the development of the Reich as they wished it. Rosenberg had no idea of the extent of the fight put up against him. His argument with Reich Commissioner Koch, the exponent of Himmler and Bormann, is a proof of this ignorance, but it is also a complete proof of Rosenberg's integrity.

On 14 December 1942, Rosenberg issued an instruction to the Reich commissioners of the Ukraine (1921-PS, Ro.11.) ; his other instructions have unfortunately not been found. In this, Rosenberg requests the chiefs of the administration to preserve decent attitudes and views, he demands justice and human understanding for the population, which has always seen in Germany the bearer of legal order; war brings terrible hardship, but every offense must be fairly examined and judged and must not be punished to excess; it is absolutely inadmissible that German agencies oppose the population with contemptuous speeches. One can only show one is the master by taking the right attitude and through one's actions, not by obtrusive behavior; our own attitude must bring others to respect the Germans; those chiefs of the administration, who have shown themselves unworthy of their task, who have misused the authority they were given, and who by their pernicious behavior have become unworthy of our uniform, must be treated accordingly, summoned before a court or removed to Germany.

The echo, which such decrees aroused on the part of Koch, is shown in his memorandum of 16 March 1943 (192-PS, Ro.14). Koch writes: "It is strange, that not only a correct attitude must be taken with the Ukrainians, but that we must even be amiable to them and always ready to help."

Furthermore, Rosenberg demands esteem for the highly-developed self-consciousness of the Ukrainian people and according to Rosenberg a high degree of cultural self-administration is desirable for the Ukraine, nations as big as the Ukrainian one is cannot be kept in permanent dependence, the Eastern campaign is a political campaign and not an economic forage raid. Here Koch is speaking to Rosenberg in a cynical manner about the climax reached in the relations of his organization with Ukrainian emigration. There are other decrees of Rosenberg's which are criticized by Koch. One of these is the decree of 18.6.1942 concerning the acquisition by Rosenberg of Ukrainian schoolbooks for a total of 2,3 millions Reich Marks to be charged to the budget of the Reich Commissariat without even previously getting in touch with Koch. One million primers, one million spelling charts, and 200,000 arithmetic books were to be provided at a time when there was not enough left for German school children.

Koch goes on saying: "It is not necessary to point out repeatedly in the decrees issued by your Ministry and in long-distance remonstrances that any coercion in hiring laborers should be avoided and that the East Ministry even demands to be informed of any instance in which compulsion has been used." By a subsequent decree Koch is blamed to have caused the closing of vocational schools and that Rosenberg ordered the General Commissioners to adopt another school policy, circumventing the Reich Commissar's authority.

Koch then concludes with a veiled threat that to him, a veteran Gauleiter, the way to the Fuehrer would not be barred.

So much challenging criticism of Rosenberg, so much unintentional praise, and so much proof of absolute decency of his behavior and the farsighted and statesmanlike direction of his office as Chief of the East Administration!

The last document in the fight of Rosenberg against Koch is the report regarding the Reich Commissar Koch and the timber region of Zumand of 2 April 1943 (032-PS) regarding which Rosenberg gave exhaustive information as a witness. In this very matter Rosenberg displayed his conscientiousness so clearly. (Protocol, p. 7930 and pp. 8019-8021.)

d. Rosenberg and Bormann. And now we have to unroll another scene before our eyes because the prosecution attached specific importance to it. In July 1942, Bormann wrote a letter to Rosenberg. Rosenberg replied and a third party, Dr. Markull, an associate of Rosenberg in his Ministry, wrote a criticism of it. (Transcript p. 7971). According to Mr. Markull's representation, the meaning of Bormann's letter, the original of which is not extant, contained the following points: the Slavs should work for us; if of no use for us, they ought to die; health provisions were superfluous; the fertility of the Slavs was undesirable; their education dangerous: it will do if they can count up to one hundred. Every educated person is a potential enemy. We were leaving them their religion as an outlet. As sustenance they should receive only the barest necessities, we are the masters and we come first.

To that letter of the closest collaborator of Hitler there could be only one reply by Rosenberg: feigned consent and feigned compliance. In the inner circle of the East Ministry there arose considerable apprehensions regarding this significant change in the attitude of their chief, apprehensions which were expressed in Dr. Markull's memorandum of 5.9.1942. Rosenberg as a witness has stated, and there cannot exist any doubt about it by reading that writing impartially, that he agreed only for the sake of pacifying Hitler and Bormann. He wanted to insure himself against an attack from the Fuehrer Headquarters which he anticipated with certainty, because he supposedly did more for the Eastern population than for the German people, because he required more physicians than there were available for sick Germans, etc. The memorandum of Markull is the truest possible reflexion of Rosenberg's personality and influence as it shows the anxious subordinate trying to conjure the former spirit of his Minister, as he got to know and to love him in his work, against an alien phantom who seemed to have taken his place.

DEFENSE

It says there that though the train of thought conforms with the policy of the Reich Commissar Koch, but not with the decrees of the Minister and the conception of at least 80 per cent of the regional commissars and specialists counting on their Minister, according to which decrees the Eastern population should be treated decently and with understanding, that it is showing a surprisingly high capacity for culture, that their efficiency in work is good, but that we are about to dissipate a precious capital of gratitude, love, and confidence. That the controversy between the Minister and the Reich Commissar was well known among the high authorities of the Reich and that it was no secret that the Ministry was unable to carry out its policies against the Reich Commissars, who considered the East Ministry as entirely superfluous. That the writings of Bormann would disavow the total policy of the Minister up to now and that one had the impression that Koch has been considered by Hitler as being right in his opposition to the Minister. That since its foundation the Ministry had to complain about an ever increasing loss of power. The higher SS and Police officials refused to render to the General Commissar the normal honors such as reports, etc. One jurisdiction of the East Minister after another was transferred to different highest Reich authorities. In the offices in Berlin it was openly said that the remodeling of the Ministry into a mere Operations staff (Fuehrungsstab) was to be expected. On the other hand, the Reich Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories, due to the personality of its leader, enjoyed the exceptional respect of the public.

Dr. Markull implores the Minister to stand by his original ideas, that the unfortunate Master complex should be as much avoided as the opinion that the intelligentsia were alien to the masses.

The influence of spiritual forces should be taken into consideration. Germany must prove a "righteous judge", acknowledging the national and cultural rights of nations. Such has been the ideas of the Minister before and such they must remain.

Rosenberg's attitude did not change in fact, as at that very time he was working on the great School Order (Schulverordnung). Later on he effected the reopening primarily of the medical faculties in colleges. And then it came to the conflict with the Fuehrer in May 1943.

4. Tendering of resignation. On 12.10.1944 Rosenberg tendered his resignation through Lammers to the Fuehrer (Doc. Ro. 14), because the German Eastern policies in general and the political psychological treatment of Eastern nations in particular had been opposed from the very start to his previously conceived plan of autonomy of the Eastern nations and of the cultural development of their capacities amid an all-European conception of a family of nations on the continent. Now he had made up his mind seeing a great statesmanlike program gone to pieces.

All he could do in regard to the policy of enslavement and looting which was going on in his country was merely to accept memoranda from his colleagues in the Ministry or at best indulge in a futile paper war with people like Koch.

He was not strong enough against the blinded forces in the East and what plans they wanted to carry out and he was powerless against their influence, being in addition totally unaware at that time of all police and army orders, now presented here to the Tribunal.

When Rosenberg once reminded Hitler of the foundation of a university in Kiev, Hitler apparently agreed. After Rosenberg had left and he was alone with Goering, Hitler said: "This fellow has special worries. We have more important matters on our mind now than universities in Kiev." (Protocol of 16-3-46, morning, 10-13 hours).

No episode can illustrate the theme better than all the documents: the theme, Rosenberg and reality in the East; and the other theme, Rosenberg as the alleged inspirator of Hitler. As Rosenberg did not receive any reply to the request for resignation, he tried many times to talk to Hitler personally. It was all in vain.

Labor Employment in the East

On 11.12.1945 Mr. Dodd said: "The system of hatred, barbarism, and denial of personal rights, which the conspirators have elevated to the national philosophy of Germany, has followed the national-socialist masters when they overran Europe. Foreign workers became the slaves of the master race, being deported and enslaved in millions." And on 8.2.1946 General Rudenko said (Prot. p. 4116) : "In the long line of ruthless crimes committed by the German fascist troops of occupation, the forcible deportation of peaceful citizens into slavery and bondage in Germany takes a particularly important place. For the inhuman and barbaric instructions, directives, and orders of the Hitler government, whose purpose was the carrying out of the deportation of Soviet people into German slavery," he said, "Goering, Keitel, Rosenberg, and Sauckel were particularly responsible."

DEFENSE

1. Sauckel's jurisdiction. I have already spoken of the formal and individual responsibility of Rosenberg as Reich Minister for the occupied Eastern territory. I have already explained, too, that in the field of labor employment it was not Rosenberg, but Sauckel who, as General Plenipotentiary for the Employment of labor, was the highest instance and the responsible person, by virtue of the Fuehrer's decree of 21.3.1942. (See e.g. Doc. 580-PS, and the writings of the R.M.f.d.b.O. (Rosenberg) to the Reichs Chancellery of 6.3.1942.) Thus Sauckel in his field was Rosenberg's superior.

He wrote on 10.3.1942 to Rosenberg (Doe. 017-PS, USA-180) : "The Fuehrer has drawn up new and most urgent armament programs which require the speediest employment of 2 million additional foreign workers. For the execution of his decree of 21.3.1942 the Fuehrer has given me for my further tasks more authority, particularly empowering me to use my own judgment in taking all measures in the Reich and in the occupied Eastern territories in order to insure under any circumstances an organized employment of labor for the German armament industry." In his "Program for the Employment of Labor" of 24.4.1942 (Doc. 016-PS, USA-168) he emphasizes that the regional employment offices are in charge of all technical and administrative matters of labor employment coming under the exclusive competence and responsibility of the General Plenipotentiary for the Employment of Labor. The defense of Sauckel is not my task. But may I point out that he also did not take over his great and difficult task with feeling of hatred and intentions of enslavement. In his program for the employment of labor just mentioned he says for instance: "Everything has to be avoided which, beyond the shortages and hardships caused by war conditions, would aggravate and even cause unnecessary sufferings to foreign male and female workers during their stay in Germany. It stands to reason to make their presence and their work in Germany, without any loss for ourselves, as bearable as possible. On that point Sauckel and Rosenberg shared the same opinion. Neither is it my task to state and to prove that many hundreds of thousands of foreign workers have found their good fortune in Germany, that in fact numberless persons were better off here than in their fatherland, but I am only concerned with the bad conditions which may have been charged to the defendant Rosenberg.

2. Central agency for nationals of the eastern territories. The war was getting more and more intensive in its totality and brutality, and the German worker and any other German certainly lived like anything but a lord. So far as he was not drafted into the army, the German because of obligatory service was assigned to some work, had to work long and hard, and was separated from his family, had to be satisfied with poor lodgings, particularly due to progressive destructions by air raids, and he also was severely punished for evading or delaying work.

The fact that the foreign worker was also affected by that totality and brutality, in some respects undoubtedly more than the German, certainly cannot be charged to Rosenberg, neither legally nor morally. His Ministry was established by him as a central agency for nationals of the Eastern Territories, filled with trustworthy persons from all Eastern nations, which had neither policy tasks nor any other authority in the labor administration, but served the welfare of the Eastern nations. In its report of 30-9-1942 (Doc. 084-PS, USA 199) all kinds of defects are pointed out, that the lodging, treatment, food, and payment of wages of Eastern workers have given rise to severe criticism. Though much has been improved (sealing date 1-10-42) the general condition of the Eastern worker is still unsatisfactory. Rosenberg therefore should have a consultation with Hitler in order to ask for his personal vigorous intervention, particularly to get Himmler to annul his general instructions for the treatment of Eastern workers, to instruct the Party and its chancellery to keep in mind their responsibility before history in treating the millions of former Soviet citizens, and to consult the Reich Minister on any measures concerning Eastern workers employed in the Reich. It is finally proposed to enlarge without delay the Central Agency for Eastern nationals to function as an extended arm of the Reich Ministry East and as representative of foreign nationals from the occupied territories residing in Germany, thus being able to look after their affairs more effectively. In this spirit, namely in the spirit of social trust and human welfare, the Eastern Ministry worked for the Eastern workers.

DEFENSE

3. Rosenberg and Sauckel. To refute the accusation that Rosenberg was active as a protagonist of the system of hatred and barbarism, of denying human rights and of enslavement, I must add the following. Rosenberg received further unfavorable reports, one being the report of 7.10.1942 about the bad treatment of Ukrainian skilled workers (054-PS, USA-198). Abuses in recruiting and during transportation were pointed out; the workers were frequently dragged out of their beds at night and locked up in cellars until the time of their departure; threats and blows by the rural militia were a matter of course; food brought from home by the skilled workers was often taken from them by the militia; during transportation to Germany neglects and transgressions on the part of the escorting units occurred, etc.

Rosenberg had no authority whatsoever to intervene in those matters. But he tried to do so in a letter of 21.12.1942 to Sauckel (018-PS, USA-186). Rosenberg first admits his fundamental accord with Sauckel, but after a few tactical and polite cliches he complains seriously and urgently about the methods used in the employment of labor: "I must emphatically request for reasons of my responsibility for the occupied Eastern territories, that any methods to supply the required contingents be excluded, if I or my associates might be accused one day for tolerating them and for their consequences."

Rosenberg further states that he empowered the Reich Commissar for the Ukraine to make use, so far as required, of his sovereign right by giving attention to the elimination of recruiting methods which are running counter to the interests of warfare and war economy in the occupied territories. He, Rosenberg, and the Reich Commissars cannot help being surprised that in numerous instances measures which should have been determined by civilian authorities were first communicated to him by the police or other offices. Without coordination of their mutual wishes, he, Rosenberg, was unfortunately unable to accept the joint responsibility for consequences resulting from these reported conditions. In conclusion Rosenberg expresses the wish to put an early end to such conditions for the sake of their common interests. Rosenberg also tried a personal consultation with Sauckel, and got Sauckel to promise that he would do everything to bring about a fair solution of all these questions. (Conversation of 14.4.1942, Doc. 020 PS, Ro. 9.) It was beyond Rosenberg's power and authority to do more. His secret opponent, supported by higher authorities, was Reich Commissar Koch, who was indeed the chief culprit in the cruel recruiting and employment methods for Eastern workers and whose influence Rosenberg was unable to counteract. (See the same document.)

When the prosecutor (Brudno on 9.1.1946, Prot. p. 2277/78) charges the defendant for protesting against these methods not for humanitarian reasons but for the sake of political expedience, I can only say that in my opinion one cannot simply maintain that the defendant Rosenberg is devoid of any human qualities without some sound reasons.

4. "Hay action" (Heuaktion). As an example of the defendant's particular bestiality the so-called "Hay action" has been repeatedly pointed out by the prosecution. (031-PS, USA-171.) It concerned the intention of the army group "Center" to evacuate 40 to 50 thousand juveniles from the area of operation, as they represented a considerable burden to the area of operation and, besides, were in the majority without any parental supervision. Villages for children were to be established behind the front lines under native supervision. One of these villages had already proved its value. It was expected that through the Organization Todt, being a particularly appropriate organization due to its technical and other possibilities, the juveniles would be introduced to German handicraft first as apprentices in order to employ them as skilled workers after two years training. At first Rosenberg, as the Reich Minister for the occupied Eastern territories, was against it, because he feared that the action might be considered as a deportation of children and on the other hand because the juveniles did not represent a considerable increase of military strength. The chief of the political operational staff approached Rosenberg again that the army group "Center" attached particular importance to the fact that the children should reach the Reich not by the authority of the General Plenipotentiary for the Employment of Labor, but through the agencies of the Reich Minister East, as only then could they be assured a correct treatment. The Army Group wanted the action to be carried out under the most loyal conditions and wanted special regulations to be issued with regard to the taking care of these people, as regards a mail service between them and their parents, etc. In the event of a possible reoccupation of the territory the East Ministry could then let the boys go back. Together with their parents they would certainly form a positive element during the subsequent reconstruction of the territory. Finally as reason for the second request addressed to the Minister it was stated in addition that the boys, to be sure, would not essentially contribute to strengthening the military power of the enemy, but that the important factor in this case was the long-range weakening of the biological strength of the enemy; not only the Reichsfuehrer SS but also the Fuehrer had expressed themselves to this effect. Rosenberg finally gave his consent to this action.

To this it may be said that it concerned a field which was not at all within the jurisdiction of Rosenberg's administration. He did not want to destroy foreign peoples even if biological weakening was given him as a reason—a reason which he himself did not recognize. Instead he wanted to have the children educated and trained in order to bring them with their parents back to their homes later on. That is more or less the contrary of what the defendant is criminally charged with. Later on (late in summer 1943) Rosenberg visited the Junker's plants in Dessau where approximately 4,700 young White Ruthenian craftsmen were employed, and also visited a White Ruthenian children's camp. The clothing of young workmen was irreproachable, they were industrious, enjoyed the best treatment and got along very well with the Germans. As Rosenberg was able to see for himself the young people were taught languages and mathematics by Russian teachers. The children were cared for in forest camps by White Ruthenian mothers and women teachers. The figure of 40,000, moreover, was never attained, in fact, barely half of it.

The attempt of the prosecution in this instance to appeal especially and to the disadvantage of the defendant to considerations of humanity cannot be successful in my estimation. For it is exactly this example which compelled me to point out the following in particular: We were in the midst of a war which was being conducted with terrible intensity on both parts. Is not war in itself "monstrous bestiality"? The "weakening of the biological strength of nations" is truly a fitting expression for the goal and purpose of the whole war, for that is what the thoughts and efforts of both belligerent parties were aimed at. It is impossible to think that one should want to forget this in judging the actions of the defendants, and that one should hold the defendants responsible not only for unleashing the war but in addition for the fact that war in its very essence constitutes a great crime on the part of mankind both against itself and against the laws of life.

5. Matters of International Law. The prosecution contends that Rosenberg is guilty also insofar as it was he who issued the inhuman and barbarian decrees which aimed at carrying out the deportation of Soviet people into German slavery; this brings me to discuss the question as to whether the compulsory labor decree of 19 December 1941 and Rosenberg's other decrees concerning compulsory labor for the inhabitants of the Eastern territories were contrary to international law.

The Eastern territories administered by Rosenberg had suffered a military occupation during the war. Through this "occupation bellica" Germany realized a complete domination and had the same sovereignty as over her own territory. While according to previous conceptions of international law the occupying power could act and rule arbitrarily without consideration of rights and laws, recent developments in international law eliminated the principle of force and brought victory to the principles of humanity and culture; therefore, the formerly unlimited might of the occupying power was modified into limited rights; the Hague Rules of Land Warfare stipulated in particular the legal duties of the occupying power. On the other hand, it is not true either that the Rules of Land Warfare set up only certain rights for the occupying power; they merely set bounds to the intrinsically unlimited right of the occupying force to exercise all powers deriving from territorial sovereignty over an occupied territory. From this results the following principle which is recognized by international law:

Measures undertaken by an occupying power in an occupied territory are legal as long as they are not in opposition to an authenticated legal stipulation of the International Rules of Warfare. Supposition, therefore, would indicate that the occupying power is entitled to the full exercise of all powers deriving from territorial sovereignty over an occupied territory. According to the uniform opinion of experts on international law the occupying power acts by virtue of an original law of its own which is guaranteed and defined as to contents by international law only, in the interest of its own conduct of the war as well as for the protection of the civilian population in the occupied territory. (Cf. Heyland in the Handbook on International Law, published by Stier-Somlo, 1923).

The inhabitants of the occupied territory no longer have a duty of allegiance to the enemy sovereign but only to the occupying power; the will of the occupying power rules and decides in an occupied territory; the occupying power is the executor of its own will; its own interests alone are decisive for the exercise of its sovereign rights and it, therefore, is at liberty to act against the interests of the enemy state. (Heyland, as above, p. 13).

In view of article 52 of the Hague Rules of Land Warfare the right to conscript labor in the occupied territory is denied. It is stipulated thereby that labor services may be demanded from the inhabitants of the occupied territory; the employment must be limited to the requirements of the occupation forces, it must be adjusted to the available resources of the country and must be of such a nature as not to compel the population to participate in military operations against their own country. In these stipulations I cannot discern any prohibition of labor—conscription in occupied territories; on the contrary, I consider that an approval of compulsory labor service can be deduced from them at once. The employment of such labor in war industry is undoubtedly in accordance with the requirements of the occupation forces and, in my estimation, it is equally beyond doubt that this constitutes no commitment to military operations. The Rules of Land Warfare contain no stipulations as to whether labor service may be demanded only in the home country or whether the conscript may be transported into the native land of the occupying power for the purpose of rendering labor services there. Thus, the general principle holds good, that supposition speaks for the authority of the occupying power to exercise to their full extent all powers deriving from territorial sovereignty.

DEFENSE

If one takes the correct stand that the International Rules of Warfare should tend to humanize war by limiting the rights of the belligerents and that more progress could be made in this sense one must consider, on the other hand, that the stern reality of war tends to lead in the opposite direction. Present day warfare is no longer what it was for people in 1907; war has developed into total war, a life and death struggle of annihilation, in which the very last and remotest physical and moral forces of the nations are mobilized, and the loss of which, as is shown by the example of Germany, means unconditional surrender and total destruction of her existence as a state.

Can one maintain in view of this fact that Germany in this struggle of life and death should not have been granted the basic right of self-preservation recognized by international law? (Cf. Strupp in Handbook on International Law, published by Stier-Somlo, Stuttgart 1920, part III, "Violations of International Law," pages 121 and following.)

There is no doubt that the very existence of the state was at stake, i.e., it was an emergency which justified the compulsory employment of labor even if it had not have been permissible according to international law. It is inherent in the character of that anomaly called war that international law, as soon as the state of war has been proclaimed, is set aside in the interest of the objective of that war, the overpowering of the enemy. (Strupp, as above, page 172.) Even though the development of civilization was accompanied by a progressive moderation of this conception according to which everything goes in war until the enemy is destroyed, the rules of warfare constitute even today a compromise between the demands of military necessity with their fundamental boundlessness and chastened humanitarian and civilized views.

And one thing is certain, at any rate, namely that the existence of a genuine emergency may be pleaded even under the stipulations of the Hague RLW. During the negotiations preceding the formulation of article 46 of the RLW the following was stated literally and without any opposition: "The restrictions will effect the liberty of action of the belligerents in certain extreme emergencies"; for extreme emergencies, therefore, a state of emergency may be pleaded. It is a recognized international law that even an aggressor must not be denied the right of pleading a state of emergency in case his existence is directly threatened. (Strupp, p. 170.)

Persecution of Jews

Contrary to the assumption of the Prosecution, Rosenberg was by no means the inspirer of Jewish persecution, any more than he was one of the leaders and originators of the policy adopted by the Party and the German Reich, as the Prosecution claims (Walsh on Dec. 13, 1945, transcript p. 1244). Certainly, Rosenberg was a convinced anti-Semite who expressed his conviction and the reasons for it both verbally and in writing. However, in his case anti-Semitism was not the most outstanding of his activities. In his book "Blood and Honor", speeches and essays 1919-1933, out of 64 essays, e.g., only one had a title referring to Jewry. The same applies to the other two volumes of his speeches. He felt his spiritual ancestors to be the mystic Master Eckehart, Goethe, Lagarde, and Houston Stewart Chamberlain; anti-Semitism was for him a negative momentum, his chief and most positive efforts were directed toward the publication of a new German intellectual attitude and a new German culture. Because he found this endangered after 1918, he became an opposer of Jewry. Even such different personalities as von Papen, von Neurath, Raeder, now confessed to their belief that the penetration of the Jewish element into the whole of public life was so great that a change must be brought about. It strikes me as very important, however, that the nature of Rosenberg's anti-Semitism was intellectual and above all, noble; e.g., at the Party Session 1933 he spoke plainly of a "chivalrous" solution of the Jewish question. We never heard Rosenberg use expressions like "We must annihilate the Jews wherever we find them; we shall take measures that will lead to a sure success. We must cut out all feelings of sympathy". The prosecution itself quotes the following as an expression of the program Rosenberg set up for himself:

DEFENSE

"The Jewish question will find a decisive solution after the Jews have been ousted, as a matter of course, from all official positions, and through the setting up of Ghettos" (Walsh, Prot. p. 1236, Doc. 1028-PS, USA-273).

It was not a mere question of chance that Rosenberg did not take part in the boycotting of Jews in 1933, that he was not called upon to help work out the laws against Jews 1933/35, etc. (Ex-patriation, prohibition of marriages, withdrawal of the right to vote, expulsion from the more important positions and offices, etc.)

Above all, he never took part in the action of 1938 against the Jews, nor in the destruction of synagogues and anti-Semitic demonstrations. Neither was he the instigator in the background, who sent out smaller people to commit certain actions or ordered them to do so. To be sure, Rosenberg was a true follower of Hitler's, of the kind that took up Hitler's slogans and passed them on. Like the motto "The Jewish question will be solved only when the last Jew has left Germany and the European Continent." Or once the slogan about the "extermination of Jewry."

Exaggerated expressions were always part of the National-Socialist weapons of propaganda; a Hitler speech without insults to his internal or external political opponents, or without threats of extermination was hardly imaginable. Everyone of Hitler's speeches was echoed a million times by Goebbels down to the last speaker of the Party in a small country inn; the same sentences and the same words were repeated as Hitler had used and not only in all the political speeches, but in the German press, too, in all the leading articles and essays, until weeks or months later a new speech was held which elicited a new echo of a similar kind. Rosenberg made no exception to this. He repeated all of Hitler's slogans just like the rest, that of the "Solution to the Jewish question", and once also that of the "Extermination of Jewry", etc. Apparently, like Hitler's other supporters, gave little thought to the fact that in reality none of these words are clear but they have a sinister double meaning and that though they may mean real expulsion, they may also mean the physical annihilation and murdering of Jews.

Quite apart from the knowledge and will of the German people, and apart from the knowledge and will of the majority of the leaders of the Party, there was hatched and carried out from 1941 onwards a mass crime which surpasses all human conceptions of reason and morality. The "Jewish question" was even further "developed" and brought to its so-called "final solution". The Tribunal will have to decide the question: Is Rosenberg, too, as the specially characteristic exponent of the Party and Reich Minister for the occupied territories, responsible for the murdering of Jews, and particularly for the murdering of Jews in the East? Or must it be recognized and admitted that though he stands at a hair's breadth from the abyss, it was after all nothing but external circumstances which led up to it all, and these circumstances were outside his sphere of responsibility and guilt.

I believe I can say with complete conviction that Rosenberg never aimed either openly or in secret at the physical extermination of the Jews. His reserve and moderation were certainly no mere tactics. The gradual slipping of anti-Semitism into crime took place without his knowledge or his will. The fact in itself that he preached anti-Semitism justifies his punishment as a murderer of Jews as little as one could hold Rousseau and Mirabeau responsible for the subsequent horrors of the French revolution.

No matter how much the first impression might lead to it, criminal guilt on his part cannot be deduced either from his position as Reich Minister for the occupied Eastern territories. As stated already, the "Minister in charge" cannot be held responsible without more ado for criminal acts committed in the sphere of his occupations or his territory. Criminal responsibility according to the Penal Code, par. 357, exists only if an official knowingly assents to the criminal actions of his subordinates, and if—the commentary furnishes the details—the superior is in a position to prevent the action.

I should like to take up the question of his responsibility on the grounds of the documents submitted:

1. The action taken against Jews at Sluzk (Doc. 1104-PS, USA-483). On October 27, 1941, a horrible slaughtering of Jews took place in Sluzk through the 4 companies of a Police battalion, because the Commander received an order from his superior to clear the city of all Jews, without exception. The regional Commissioner immediately made vigorous protests and demanded that the action be stopped at once. With pointed revolver he kept the police officer in check. He reported to the Commissioner General Kube of White Ruthenia at Minsk, and the latter suggested to Reich Commissioner Lohse that the officers implicated be punished for the "unheard of butchery." The latter reported to the East Reich Ministry with the request that measures be taken at once in higher places. The RMfdbO. sent the entire report to Heydrich, Chief of the Security Police and of the SD, requesting further instructions. Due to an ingenious system according to which the police was not responsible to the competent administrative chief, and was not even obliged to report, Rosenberg could not take any further steps either in this or in other similar cases. He was not above the police and could only hope that the transfer of the report to Heydrich would be sufficient to stop what he considered to be regional excesses of the police. It can be seen from the indignation of all the administrative offices over the reported incidents, that none of them knew anything about them, that it was no question of excesses, but of an action ordered by Heydrich and Himmler. And when Heydrich and Himmler declined responsibility Rosenberg could not suspect anything either.

DEFENSE

2. From October 1941 too comes document No. 3663-PS in which the "Reich Minister for the occupied Eastern territories", signed "for Dr. Leibrandt" calls for a report by the Reich Commissioner Ostland because a complaint has been made by the Chief Office of Reich Security that the Reich Commissioner Ostland has prohibited Jewish executions in Libau. To this the addressee replied: "I prohibited the execution of Jews in Libau, because there was no justification for the way in which they were carried out." This is followed by a request for further instructions. Of this document, which is signed by the departmental chief Leibrandt, and which in no way points to any knowledge on the part of the defendant Rosenberg, the following careful statement may be said in brief: It is not conceived as a reproach by the Reich Minister East, because the executions of Jews were not continued, but it simply points to the transfer of a complaint to the Reich security chief with a request to report. It is to be presumed that the reason for the complaint was that the Reich Commissioner Ostland encroached on the competency of the Reich Security Chief, and the demand for a report was supposedly issued in this sense. In the letter of December 18, 1941 the Reich Minister East also signed "For Braeutigam" asking the Reich Commissioner Ostland to settle directly any questions which occurred with the higher SS and Police leaders.

3. Document No. 3428-PS concerns a letter of the General Commissioner for White Ruthenia to the Reich Commissioner for the East. It is a shocking document about the mass extermination of Jews in White Ruthenia; however, there is nothing of interest in it for the case against Rosenberg, because the horrible events may be attributed to him only if he knew of them and neglecting his duty failed to intervene. There is no actual proof to go by for a supposition of such knowledge.

The claim that these documents were found in Rosenberg's possession is not in accordance with the actual facts for they show the Reich Commissioner in Riga as the addressee. To identify the sign R. as Rosenberg's initial because the Prosecution obviously was more than doubtful about Rosenberg's knowledge of matters, turned out to be a failure too.

4. In the "Aktennotiz for the Fuehrer of 18/12/1941" (Doc. 001-PS, USA 282) the defendant suggested the following, which I must quote literally: "The outrages against members of the German Wehrmacht have not stopped, but have gone on. It looks as though there were an obvious plan to disturb German-French co-operation, to force Germany to take measures of retaliation thereby bringing about a new defensive attitude on the part of the French against Germany. My suggestion to the Fuehrer is that instead of killing 100 Frenchmen now, he should have 100 or more Jewish bankers, lawyers etc. shot".

It is not my task here to say how far it is admissible to shoot hostages, but one thing is certain, that Rosenberg was convinced such a measure was admissible. But in that case his suggestion must be considered in that light, and can by no means be judged as an independent incitement to murder.

The suggestion, however, had no results; in his reply of December 31, 1941, Lammers acting on the Fuehrer's order, merely referred to the suggestion of utilizing the furniture and fittings from Jewish houses, and not to the shooting of hostages. (Doc. 1015-PS). Rosenberg made no more reference to it either.

At this point I should like to recall that Rosenberg testified as a witness that on one occasion a regional commissioner in the East was sentenced to death for having extorted valuables from a Jewish family, and that the sentence had been carried out. Please do not consider it a bad argument of defense when I say: Does that not prove that Rosenberg loathed criminal acts against the Jews?

5. Document R-135, USSR-289 refers to the report of the General Commissioner of White Ruthenia, in Minsk, dated June 1, 1943, on the subject of what happened in the prison of Minsk as regards gold fillings. This was addressed to the Reich Commissioner of Ostland, who forwarded the report on the 18th of June 1943 with his marked anger.

At his hearing before the Tribunal on April 16, 1946, the defendant already made a statement on this point, and I would like to repeat this briefly now: He had returned on the 22-6-1943 from an official trip to the Ukraine and found a pile of notices about conferences, a number of letters and above all the Fuehrer decree from the middle of June 1943, in which Rosenberg was instructed to limit himself to the principles of legislation of the law, and not to bother about the details. Rosenberg did not read the letter, but he has to surmise—he cannot remember it—that the letter was explained to him by his office, and presumably in the course of the reading he was informed of many documents and learned that there was again serious trouble between the Police and Civilian Administration, and it is probable that Rosenberg said: turn that over for investigation to Gauleiter Meyer or to the Police officer of liaison. If it were not so the terrible details would certainly have remained in Rosenberg's memory.

DEFENSE

Nobody doubts for a moment that the horrible crimes shown in the documents, and all the other frightful things not covered in the documents but which actually happened, call for atonement, nobody is in doubt that not only the lesser tormentors acting on higher orders must be punished but also and above all those who issued the orders and those responsible for the crimes. Rosenberg did not issue an order to murder the Jews, so much is clear, but is he in spite of this responsible for the frightful murderers?

The defendant has left no trace in handwriting on any of the murder documents, in any case it could not be determined that he knew anything about what went on. But can we condemn Rosenberg on the basis of his supposed and probable knowledge? Rosenberg has by no means the intention of playing a false and cowardly game of hide-and-seek behind his advisers and subordinates, but let us remember with what cunning the so-called executions of the Jews were kept secret not only from the public but even from Hitler's most important colleagues! Is it not possible and, even credible, that they were playing a game of hide-and-seek and especially with Rosenberg? The thoughts and intentions of none of the other NSDAP leaders were revealed so openly and clearly to all the world as those of the editor Rosenberg in particular, of no other could one be so sure that he would turn with indignation from the cruel, inhuman acts.

On the other hand, let us go a step further and assume that Rosenberg had full knowledge of this, the greatest crime of all—it is not proved but one could imagine and surmise it—is he then responsible, too? Peculiar, even subtle, too, as we well know, was the departmental authority and the responsibility which went with it in the Eastern countries. The entire complex of the police force had been taken from Rosenberg's sphere of influence, the highest instance was Himmler and under him Heydrich. Of their orders and measures Rosenberg had no knowledge and no suspicion as a rule. The lower strata of police chiefs and police organs were in effect subordinate and responsible to their police superiors and no one else. It was quite immaterial whether or not Rosenberg knew anything of the measures taken by the police, he could do as little about it as any other of his fellow citizens in the third Reich. One might say yes, he could have remonstrated with Himmler or Hitler, he could have given up his position. Of course, he could have done so. The point, however is not whether he could have done it, the question is, would he have achieved anything by doing it. That is to say, whether he could have prevented the executions. For only in such a case could his responsibility be affirmed on the ground of his failure to do so, and only in such a case could one speak of causality without which criminal responsibility is unthinkable.

One can make further claims, still under the assumption of Rosenberg's knowledge of matters: That Rosenberg could at least have stepped in against the Reich Commissioners, who were obviously involved in these matters. We know that the administrative organization and the dividing up of supreme authority in the East were vague to say the least. The Reich Commissioners were sovereign masters in their own territory, they had the final say in the shooting of hostages and in other retaliatory measures of far-reaching consequence. And what was the actual extent of their authority? In case the Reich Commissioner was dissatisfied with Rosenberg — and he mostly was dissatisfied — he went to Hitler.

Does anyone really believe that if Rosenberg had different opinions from these of Koch as regards the execution of the Jews, he would have been upheld by Hitler if he had gone to him? In this again, there is a lack of that causality which is indispensable for a legal indictment.

Operational Staff Rosenberg

1. Prosecution. No less than three prosecutors have taken stand in this trial against Rosenberg and have accused him of having systematically stolen objects of art and science on a large scale in the East and West (Storey 18.12.45, Prot.P.1408; Gerthofer February 6, 46 Prot.P.3945; Smirnov Feb.15,46 and Feb.21,46.) First I must take exception to some obvious exaggerations and injustices, e.g. the assertion that the activities of the special staff (Sonderstab) in the West extended to public and private property without distinction. (Prot.p.3951), that the objects of art Germany appropriated, amount to more than the treasures of the Metropolitan Museum in New York, of the British Museum in London, of the Louvre in Paris and of the Tretjakow gallery all together (Prot.P.1423). Further, I must declare the statement incorrect that the "Looting program" of Rosenberg was intended to rob the occupied countries of their entire centuries-old possessions of art and science. Finally, the Prosecution contrasts Rosenberg's actions to the looting of art-treasures in former wars, it says that while egotism, conceit, taste and personal inclination were the underlying motives of such looting, the National-Socialists in the first place had the criminal intention of storing up reserves of things of value (Prot. p. 3965). I think it unnecessary to go back over the looting of art-treasures in former times as far as Napoleon, because the concepts of international law and regulations have changed in the meantime, but I should like to mention two things: (a) How many of the most famous objects of art in the most famous galleries of the world got there through the channels of war and how many got there in a peaceful way? (b) I can accept the fact that the Prosecution denies Rosenberg any delight in art, or joy in the possession of treasures of art as a possible motive for his actions, because Rosenberg was no pirate of art, no thief. He had no intention of appropriating the objects of art for himself or for someone else.

DEFENSE

What were the actual facts?

Rosenberg's operative staff was active in the east and in the west, it had two tasks: (1) to search libraries, archives etc. for material, suitable for the "High School" of the party, which had been planned, to confiscate this material and take it away for the purpose of research, (2) to seize objects of cultural value that were in possession of or which belonged to Jews, or which had no owner or were of a doubtful origin. The Prosecution says: The true and only motive, the true and only purpose of this "seizure" was robbery and looting. There could be no question of intentions of "mere safeguarding".

2. In the East. On the 20th of August 1941, Rosenberg wrote to the Reich Commissioner Ostland that he wished distinctly to prohibit the transfer of any kind of art treasure from any place whatsoever without the approval of the Reich Commissioner (Doc. No. 1015-C-PS). On the 30th of September 1942, (Doc. 1015-N-PS) an order was issued by the High Command of the Armed Forces in agreement with Rosenberg, to the following effect:

"Apart from exceptional cases when it is urgent to safeguard objects of cultural value which are in danger, it is desired that for the time being such objects be left where they are." Further, it says: The troops and all military service posts within the operational area are invariably directed to spare valuable cultural monuments as far as possible and to prevent their destruction or damage." In the report of "Special Staff for Plastic Arts" Work report for the period October 1940 to July 1944 (Doc. No. 1015B—

PS, RF-1328) it says that in the occupied eastern territories the activities of the Special Staff for Plastic Arts were restricted to the scientific and photographic seizure of official collections, and that the safeguarding and protection of these was carried out in cooperation with the military and civilian service posts; it further says that in the course of vacating the territories a few hundred valuable icons and paintings, etc. were saved and with the cooperation of individual army groups were brought to a place of hiding in the Reich. Finally, on the 12th of June 1942, Rosenberg sent out the following decree in a circular letter to the highest Reich authorities. "In the occupied eastern territories a number of service posts and individual people are occupied with the salvaging of objects of cultural value. They work from various angles and independent of each other. It is absolutely essential for the administration of these territories that a survey be made of the existing objects of cultural value. Furthermore, it must be seen to that as a general rule, they be left where they are for the time being. To this end I have set up a central post for special discernment in my Ministry to lay hold of and salvage cultural values in the East."

Rosenberg, as can be proved, proceeded from the point of view that objects of cultural value must remain in the country, and only through the retreat of the German troops were few hundred valuable icons and paintings brought into Germany.

In time of war objects of cultural value, both mobile and immobile, are as exposed to the danger of destruction as are any other values. Rosenberg put a stop to an unnecessary destruction, theft and removal inasmuch as he centralized the safe-guarding of objects of cultural value and had all necessary action taken through his operational staff in the east and west. (See e.g. Abels' report on the library at Minsk 076-PS, USSR-375). It is quite in accordance with the conception of international law (see Scholz, Private property in occupied and unoccupied enemy country, Berlin 1919, page 36) that care should be taken on the part of the occupiers not only to protect but to safeguard and salvage protected objects of art, as far as the war situation permits; yes, it is even considered a cultural duty for the occupier to remove particularly valuable objects of art from the zone of fire and to place them in safety as far as possible; under circumstances, the concept of international law may even make it the right and duty of the occupier to bring into his own country for reasons of salvage objects which are of special scientific and artistic value. This is not an inadmissible seizure (article 56 par2. LKO.), because the latter term could only apply to acts which are hostile to culture and not to acts which are friendly to culture. (see Scholz on p. 37).

DEFENSE

Finally, I want to refer to Document 1109-PS, a report according to which scientific institutes that had been saved were ready to be taken back to the Ukraine immediately after the hoped-for reentry of the troops. I consider it completely impossible to read anything about looting into this clear text.

Certainly, in the East great quantities of cultural objects of considerable value were destroyed by direct military action or by wanton destruction or looting. It would be a fundamental misjudging of the true facts of the case and a great injustice if these losses should be charged to the account of the Rosenberg Einsatzstab (task force) and its chief, for his efforts were in the opposite direction.

3. In the West. In the West (see Robert Scholz's testimony of 19 May 1946, Document No. Ro. 41) the case was different, but, in my opinion, here also the defendant cannot be charged with looting and robbing objects of art. When, in the summer of 1940, the Parisians, with the exception of the Jews, had once more returned, somebody conceived the idea of searching the now ownerless apartments, houses and castles for books and libraries and of taking what was interesting of this scientific material to Germany. From various branches of the Wehrmacht (Armed Forces) the report came that especially in Jewish castles there were collections of art which one could not guarantee would remain intact in case of a long occupation. Thereupon, Rosenberg made the proposal that his Einsatzstab (task force) be allowed to direct its attention at objects of art and to take care of them, which was then ordered by Hitler. What did the task force do with these objects of art? It set up an accurate card index containing the name of the particular owner of each picture, photographed the objects of art, scientifically appraised them, repaired them expertly insofar as was necessary, packed them carefully and shipped them to the Bavarian castles of Neuschwanstein and Chiemsee. Because of the dangers of air raids they were then stored in an old Austrian mine. Rosenberg attached great importance to keeping the objects cared for by the Einsatzstab separately and not mixed in with the great purchases which Hitler made for the proposed gallery in Linz.

Was that looting, robbery, theft? Looting is the indiscriminate and wanton carrying off of objects in situations of general distress and danger, robbery is carrying off by force, theft carrying off without force. In all cases the intent must exist to appropriate the object illegally for oneself or somebody else. What intent did Rosenberg have? He has never denied that he and his co-workers had hopes of the pictures remaining in Germany, perhaps as compensation or as security for the peace negotiations, but his intent was only directed at confiscating and safeguarding the objects and as has been proved, the question of what should be done with the confiscated items was left open until the end and no decision made on it. It is absolutely certain that Rosenberg did not have the intention of appropriating the things for himself or anybody else. If Rosenberg had been a plunderer of objects of art, he certainly would not have made notations concerning date and place of confiscation and name of the owner. As a precaution, however, I should also like to point out that because of the flight of their owners the objects were ownerless and that the question of the lack of owner and the question of the legality of their acquisition by Rosenberg cannot be judged by normal circumstances, but must be judged according to the extraordinary circumstances of the war. If the Prosecution claims that public and private objects of art were stolen at random, I should like to reply that statement that only Jewish possessions, and indeed as mentioned ownerless objects were confiscated, above all it is not true that state-owned property was also touched. Finally, he did not act on his own responsibility, but acted in carrying out a state order and finally I want to ask that the fact be not ignored that Rosenberg acted without any egotistic motives; not a single picture passed into his private possession, he did not gain a single mark from this transaction which was worth millions and after all, the entire lot of artistic and cultural property has been found again.

Goering supported the work of the Einsatzstab and, as he admits "diverted" ("abgezweigt") some objects for his own purposes with the Fuehrer's approval. This disturbed Rosenberg because the Einsatzstab was in his name and he declared that as a matter of principle he did not want to give anything even to the museums, that his task was purely one of registration and safeguarding, that the Fuehrer should have the final decision on these works of art. Rosenberg could not undertake anything against Goering, but he ordered his deputy Robert Scholz at least to make an accurate inventory of what was given to Goering and to have the latter sign a receipt, which Goering also did. And so it most certainly cannot be proven that Rosenberg had the intention of illegally appropriating the objects of art for himself or somebody else. Furthermore, Robert Scholz confirmed that Rosenberg also forbade all his assistants to acquire any object of art or culture, even by virtue of an official appraisal (Doc. Ro. 41).

The Prosecution says that with the Rosenberg Einsatzstab a gang of Vandals broke into the European house of art in order to plunder it in a barbarous way. If one thinks of the tremendous work of drawing up an inventory, of cataloguing, restoration and scientific appraisal and if one finally bears in mind that all these treasures were most carefully stored away and certainly came through the war better than would have been the case if the German authorities had not taken care of them. I believe that objectively speaking one can use any term but that of "Vandalism".

DEFENSE

4. The Furniture Operation ("Moebelaktion"). Rosenberg is also especially charged with looting furniture. He is alleged to have robbed 79,000 Jewish-owned apartments, among them 38,000 in Paris, of their contents and to have taken the loot to Germany. Unquestionably, these measures were taken for the benefit of air-raid victims; in the cities which had been destroyed by air warfare new apartments were built for the homeless.

It was in line with the National-Socialist mentality and must certainly be morally condemned that the confiscation was limited to Jewish property. The essential question, however, is whether the confiscation was at all legal. In all my statements, I have avoided—and I do not wish to do it at this point, either— Trying to excuse a war legal position with a state of military emergency, for as an expert international law states "the state of emergency is the lever by means of which the entire body of martial law can be torn off its hinges." But in this case was not national and military necessity the ground for justification, did not air warfare bring "intense and general distress" to Germany? One might object: "The distress could have been ended by unconditional surrender". In my opinion, however, by this reference to unconditional surrender, the abandonment by the Reich of its own existence and independence and its own vital interests, this ground of justification cannot be taken from the defendant. The appropriation of enemy property took place in application of a right of requisitioning which was extended beyond the legal maxims of martial law and justified by the state of emergency. I venture to assert that this procedure of confiscating furniture, in view of the devastating effects of the air warfare against Germany was not contradictory to "the customs among civilized peoples", "the laws of humanity", and "the demands of the public conscience" (Marten's clause in the preamble of the agreement concerning the laws and customs of lawless warfare; see Scholz in the aforementioned book, page 173).

The Norway Operation

The prosecution characterizes Rosenberg and Raeder as the most energetic conspirators of the Norway Operation and later in the same matter calls Rosenberg a "dealer in high treason". The opinion of the prosecution and also the supposition of the present Norwegian Government (Norwegian report of 3 October 1945, Doc. TC-56) are obviously that the Party's foreign office (Aussenpolitisches Amt) of which Rosenberg was the head, and Quisling had plotted the war against Norway in a mutual conspiracy. I believe that of all the charges against Rosenberg hitherto dealt with none has less foundation than this one. On the basis of the few documents which have been submitted to the court, in my opinion the case could doubtless be cleared up in favor of the defendant.

There was a Party "foreign office" (Aussenpolitisches Amt) (A.P.A.) which had the task of informing foreign visitors about the National-Socialist movement, of referring any possible suggestions to the official offices, and otherwise of functioning as a central office of the Party for questions of foreign policy. The special interest, and I may perhaps say the special sympathy of the leading men of the Party and the State was directed at the Nordic countries; it was in this direction that the A.P.A. placed the main emphasis on the field of cultural policy. The already existing Nordische Gesellschaft (Nordic Society) was expanded, the birthdays of great Nordic scientists and artists were observed in Germany, a great Nordic music festival was held, etc. The relations first took on a really political note with the appearance of Quisling whom Rosenberg had seen for the first time in 1933 and who then in 1939—i.e. six years later—looked up Rosenberg again after the convention of the Nordic Society in Luebeck; the former spoke of the danger of European entanglements and expressed the fear that Norway was in danger of being drawn into them. He then feared above all a partitioning of his country in such a manner that the Soviet Union would occupy the northern part and England the southern part of Norway.

Quisling again appeared before Rosenberg in Berlin in December 1939. The latter arranged for a conference with the Fuehrer. Hitler declared that he would by far prefer to have Norway remain completely neutral and that he did not intend to extend the theater of war and involve more nations in the conflict, but he would know how to defend himself against a further isolation of, and further threats against, Germany. In order to counteract the increasing activity of enemy propaganda, Quisling was promised financial support of his movement, which was based on the Pan-Germanic idea.

The military treatment of the questions now taken up was assigned to a special military staff; Rosenberg was to deal with the political aspect and he appointed his assistant Scheidt to maintain liaison between him and Quisling. Hagelin, a Norwegian confidential agent of Quisling's, in January 1940 gave Rosenberg some more disturbing reports on the feared violation of neutrality by the Norwegian government and Rosenberg passed them on to Hitler. After the "Altmark" incident, Hagelin, who moved in Norwegian government circles, intensified his warnings. The Allies had already begun to study the Norwegian seaports for disembarkation and transportation possibilities; in any case the Norwegian government would be satisfied with protests on paper and Quisling sent the message that any delay in undertaking a counter-action would mean an exceptional risk. Rosenberg again handed the reports immediately to Hitler. If he had not done so that would actually have been treason to his country. The German counter-blow followed on 9-4-1940 and Rosenberg learned about it from the radio and newspaper like any ordinary citizen. After his above-mentioned report which he made in the line of duty, Rosenberg did not participate in either diplomatic or military preparations.

DEFENSE

Should there still be any doubt that Rosenberg was only an agent who forwarded information to Hitler and not an instigator, conspirator or traitor in the Norwegian case, I should like to refer to two documents. First, to Document C-65, Rosenberg's file notes concerning Quisling's visit. Obviously, it is the information on Quisling which had been requested by Hitler of Rosenberg. If Rosenberg had been on close terms with Quisling, he certainly would have wanted to inform Hitler about it. Rosenberg had only heard of a fantastic and impracticable plan of Quisling's for a coup d'etat (occupation of important central offices in Oslo by sudden action, supported by specially selected Norwegians who had been trained in Germany, then having the German fleet called in by a newly-formed Norwegian government). However, an earlier report of Quisling appeared less fantastic to Rosenberg; according to which—names were given—officers of the Western powers travelled through Norway as consular officials, ascertained the depth of the water in ports of disembarkation and made inquiries into the cross-sections and heights of railway tunnels.

This was the true and only reason for everything Rosenberg did in the Norwegian matter. The second document is the report concerning: "The Political Preparation of the Norway-Operation" (Doc. 004-PS), a report from Rosenberg to Hess of 17 June 1940; in this inter-departmental report also there is nothing which deviates from Rosenberg's own trustworthy statement and which would let him appear as an instigator of war and a person guilty of high treason.

Rosenberg was not called in at any political or military discussion concerning Norway. Thus, what criminal act did Rosenberg commit? Was it criminal that he tried "to gain influence in Norway" (TC-56) or that with his knowledge subsidies were given to Quisling by the Foreign Office? Finally, I should also like to point out that later on, after the operation had succeeded, Rosenberg in no way was entrusted with an office or function with regard to Norway, that even the appointment of a Reich Commissioner for Norway was carried out without consulting him.

In connection with this I shall briefly mention the case of the Rumanian minister Goga. The latter visited Rosenberg who gave a friendly reception to a friend of Germany. The fact that in the matter in merging of the followers of Goga and Professor Cuza, Rosenberg recommended to the latter that he give up the radical anti-Jewish points of his program, cannot seriously be regarded as evidence against him. Otherwise, Rosenberg did not interfere with the purely Rumanian party which bore the name "Christian-National Party" and was strictly loyal toward the supreme head of the state and proceeded along purely legal channels. After the Rumanian king dismissed Goga, whether as a result of the demands of the British and French ministers or for other reasons, further relations ceased. That was in 1937. Antonescu did not know Rosenberg and had no relations whatsoever with him.

I remember moreover that the world does not object when, for instance, the representatives of social-democratic parties from all countries meet at international congresses. How can we blame a German who receives foreigners who are well disposed to Germany and assures them of his sympathy.

Persecution of the Church

The prosecution maintains that Rosenberg together with Bormann issued the orders for religious persecutions and induced others to participate in those persecutions. However, not a single order of this kind is known. There were presented only writings of Bormann, partly to Rosenberg, partly to others, from which no charges against Rosenberg can be drawn. On the contrary, Rosenberg was repeatedly reproached as once when in the presence of Hitler he praised a book by Reichsbishop Mueller (Doc. 100-PS, USA 691). Another time, when Rosenberg gave Reichsbishop Mueller instructions to work out directives for thoughts regarding religious instruction in schools (Doc. 098-PS, USA 350). Once again when Rosenberg promoted a strictly Christian piece of writing by General von Rabenau.

DEFENSE

As a witness Rosenberg declared himself (Prot.p.1874) that he always declined propaganda advocating the withdrawal from the Church and never called for state and police measures against his clerical and scientific opponents, and particularly he never used the police for suppressing those who were opponents of his "Myth." In December 1941 he had issued, as Reich Minister for the occupied Eastern territories, an edict for church toleration (Doc. 1517-PS, and 294-PS, USA-185); with arrests, the deportation of priests, and persercution of the Church Rosenberg had nothing to do. He had no part either in the negotiations with the Vatican over the Concordat or in the assignment of the Protestant Reich Bishop: but neither did he take any part in measures which were hostile to the Church, and which were later carried out by the police. He never participated in any other administrative or legislative anti-clerical measures.

In my opinion it is impossible, for lack of documentary evidence, to construe from what Rosenberg thought and said about religious and philosophical matters that he conspired towards a political suppression of religion. The only document (130-PS, USA-672) pointing in this direction was withdrawn by the prosecution itself, before I saw myself obliged to draw attention to it as a pamphlet drawn up against Rosenberg. His book "The myth of the 20th century" which is allegedly written for the reshaping of confessions in the spirit of a German Christianity, is moreover chiefly addressed to those who have already broken with the Church. "No consciously responsible German", says Rosenberg on one occasion in it, "should suggest withdrawal from the Churches to those, who are still faithful members of them." (Doc. Ro 7, Doc. Book I, p.122). Another time: "May science never have the power to dethrone true religion" (See the same page 125). His writings are not addressed to the faithful church-goers of today in order to hinder them in the course of their spiritual life, but to those who have already discarded their faith. (Doc. Ro 7, Doc. Book I, p.125).

In his speeches he declared that the Party is not entitled to establish norms in metaphysical matters which deny immortality etc. Having been assigned to supervise ideological education he said explicitly in his Berlin speech of 22.2.1934: "No National-Socialist is allowed to engage in religious discussions while wearing the uniform of his movement," and he declared at the same time that all well-disposed persons should strive for a pacification of the entire political and spiritual life in Germany (Ro 7a, Doc. Book, p. 130). That in this respect, too, things developed on different lines is not due to will and influence of Rosenberg.

Moreover, I need to make only a brief allusion to the fact, that it is a question of the 1000 year-old problem of relations between the clerical and so-called worldly powers: The struggle of emperors, kings and popes in the middle ages; the French revolution with the shooting of priests; Bismarck's clerical controversy; the secular legislation of the French republic under Combes. All these were things, which from the standpoint of the Church are persecutions, but from the standpoint of states and nations are termed necessary measures.

Ideology and world politics

Ideology and Education have been nothing but a means of obtaining power and consolidating it. Uniformity of thinking has played an important part in the program of the conspiracy. The formation of the Wehrmacht has only been possible in conjunction with the ideological education of the nation and party, so says the prosecution (Brudno, on 9-1-1946, Prot. p.2253 ff.) And continuing its attacks against Rosenberg, the prosecution continues: If Rosenberg's ideas formed the foundation of the National-Socialist movement, Rosenberg's contribution in formulating and spreading the National-Socialist ideology gave foundation to the conspiracy by shaping its "philosophical technique."

I think that one will have to take care, in judging Rosenberg's case, not to yield to certain primitive ways of thinking and become a victim to them. First of all an exaggeration of the conception of ideology and to an imprecise use of that conception. At best it was a political philosophy, which went hand in hand with Hitler's political measures and which Hitler himself preached in his book "Mein Kampf", but it was not an "ideology" in an all-embracing sense. It is true that National-Socialism endeavored to create a spiritual philosophy and world ideology of its own, but it had not reached that stage yet. Rosenberg's book "The myth of the 20th century" is an attempt in that direction, being a personal confession, without any suggestion of political measures. So his philosophy cannot have formed the ideological basis of National-Socialism. Besides this there is a total lack of proof that a straight spiritual line, a clear spiritual causal connection exists between the conceptions of Rosenberg and the alleged and actual crimes. If one goes to the trouble of looking through the book "Myth", one sees immediately that though there is some philosophizing in the National-Socialist way, it would be however pure fiction to affirm that there is any dogmatic formulation of an aggressive program in this book and that it is a foundation for the activities of the responsible leaders of the German Reich in the world war.

DEFENSE

Another mistake of National-Socialism was perhaps the boundless unification and simplification; people were made uniform, thinking was made uniform, only one uniform type of German was left. Presumably there was also only one National-Socialist way of thinking and only one National-Socialist ideology. But in spite of this, as we see today, the leaders were frequently of different opinion in essential questions, I will recall the mere questions of Church and Christianity, and that of the policy in the East.

Here in the Tribunal, too, there seems to be a danger of accepting this way of thinking, of observing everything through the spectacles of uniformity and of saying: One idea, one philosophy, one responsibility, one crime, one penalty. Such simplification apart from its primitive nature would surely be a great injustice toward the defendant Rosenberg.

Finally, when one hears how the prosecuting authorities attack "German Christianity", the "Heathenish Bloodmyth", pillorying Rosenberg's expression, "the Nordic blood is the very mystery, which superseded and overpowered the old sacraments", one may close one's eyes for a moment and picture oneself at a session of the Inquisition in the Middle Ages where they are about to sentence Rosenberg as a heretic to the stake. Surely nothing can be farther from the Tribunal's mind, than to harbor thoughts of intolerance, as here in spite of all attempts by some of the prosecutors, to affirm that it is not ideologies but crimes which are being debated here.

In the defendant Rosenberg's case we are debating: whether by his teachings he did wilfully prepare and further a crime. The prosecuting authorities have brought forth arguments to prove this, but have not done so, and I can prove the opposite merely by pointing out Rosenberg's activities in the East. Had he been the bearer and apostle of a criminal idea, he would have had an opportunity, such as no criminal has ever had yet in world history, to indulge in criminal activities. I have stated explicitly that in his case it was just the opposite. So when the bearer and apostle of an idea, himself has the greatest of opportunities and yet behaves morally, then his teachings cannot be criminal and immoral either, and above all he cannot be punished then as a criminal on the ground of his teachings. What criminally degenerate persons practised as alleged National-Socialism cannot be laid to the charge of Rosenberg. Moreover, Rosenberg's speeches in three tomes, which express what he taught during the course of 8 years bear witness to the honorable nature of his endeavors.

Thus if we give up the false conception of uniformity: One party, one philosophy, one ideology, one crime, then in view of the indisputable fact that Rosenberg himself never pursued a policy of extermination, destruction and enslavement in the East, we shall have to admit that the facts of the terrible central executive orders and of Rosenberg's philosophy are not identical and on these grounds alone the conclusions of the prosecuting authorities are invalid.

Karl Marx teaches that historical events, and political social reality are conditioned by the more casual play of materialistic forces. Whether Marx acknowledges the independent influence of man and ideas in history is at least doubtful. On the contrary Rosenberg stresses emphatically the influence and the necessity of the highest ideas in the history of peoples. But Rosenberg does not overlook the fact that every event in history is the result of a totality of acting forces. The will, the passions and the intelligence of the people involved work together to form a historical process which cannot be calculated in human terms. It has already been pointed out, that just as little as Voltaire's and Rousseau's ideas can be recognized as the causes of the French revolution, and the slogans of liberty, equality, and fraternity be taken as the cause of the Jacobine terror, as little as one can say Mirabeau and Sieze had wanted or plotted such blood-thirstiness, just as little can one ascribe to Rosenberg as moral or even criminal guilt what became of National-Socialism during its development through the decades. In other words, I believe it is as unjust as it is unhistorical to ascribe today in retrospective the negative aspects of National-Socialism which were connected with the terrible collapse to a plan which had been desired from the beginning, a plan which also originated in Rosenberg's ideas.

Therefore, in considering Rosenberg's work the mistake of a standardization which does not correspond to reality is added to the further mistake of mechanization, there is neither a mechanical man nor mechanical history; and, finally, the construction of the indictment is also an absolutely negative one, it views the defendant from the standpoint of political polemics and is impressed by the excitement of people in these most excited times. I must briefly take exception to this distortion of the defendant's mental traits.

The mental state of the period after the first world war and even of the preceding period which gave birth to the defendant's ideas are known to all of us only too well: The mental-psychic uprooting of man by the technical age, his hunger and thirst for a new spirit and a new soul; "liberty" was the slogan and "a new beginning" the impulse which directed the will of youth. Its longing and enthusiasm were aimed at nature. The thoughts and wishes of this generation were led into political paths by the contrast between rich and poor, which youth considered unjust and which youth sought to bridge through Socialism and the fellowship of the people; in Germany the development on political lines was further enhanced by the national misfortune of 1918/19 and the Treaty of Versailles; which was likewise felt to be unjust. The idea of a future building of German history through the union of nationalism and socialism, glowed unconsciously in the hearts of millions as the undisputed, tremendous success of National-Socialism proves. The psychic foundation was the will for self-preservation and love for one's fellow countrymen and for the people itself, which had already had to suffer so much torment and misery in history.

DEFENSE

The will for self-preservation and love for one's own people together with the whole complex of National-Socialist ideas then developed in an inexplicable manner into a furious conflagration, the most primitive considerations of common sense were eliminated just as in a delirium; in complete delusion everything was put at stake and lost.

The questions his conscience put to him however and which he asked himself time and time again, are whether he could have done more for what he thought and upheld as just and worthy, where he neglected essential things, where he fell short of requirements, what negative events, in so far as he had knowledge of them, he should have attended to with more effort. Can such questions which every person asks when he is crushed by disaster, be considered as evidence for his objective guilt? I do not think so. On 17 January 1946 (transcript p.2765/66) the French chief prosecutor, M. de Menthon stated the following which I quote: "We are rather facing systematic criminality which directly and necessarily derives from a monstrous doctrine with the full will of the leaders of Nazi-Germany. The crime against peace which was undertaken immediately is derived from the National-Socialist doctrine." To refute this assertion I must briefly present this doctrine.

I have classified the National-Socialist ideology—in full accord with scientific opinions—under the so-called new-romanticism. This tendency of the time which was grounded in fate and the necessities of history had gone through the whole civilized world since the turn of the century as a reaction against rationalism and the technical age. It differs from the old romanticism in that it adopts the naturalistic and biological consideration of man and history.

It is borne up by a confident faith in the value and meaning of life and the whole of reality. It does not glorify feeling and the intellect, but the innermost workings of man, his heart, will, and faith. This philosophy receives its National - Socialist stamp through the emphasis which is placed upon the mysterious importance of peoples and races for all human experience and work. It is in the people, in the common possession of blood, history, and culture that we find the real roots of strength. Only by participating in the movements of a people and its strength does the individual serve himself and his generation.

Rosenberg's scientific contribution to the racial ("voelkisch") ideology consists in his description of the rise and fall of great historical figures, who were born of races and peoples who set up definite standards in all fields of language, custom, art, religion, philosophy, and politics. According to Rosenberg the efforts of the 20th century to establish a form for itself are a struggle for the independence of the human personality. In Rosenberg's opinion then essence is the consciousness of honor. The myth of national honor is at the same time the myth of blood and race; the race produces and supports the maximum value of honor. Therefore, the struggle for the maximum value of honor is also a spiritual struggle with other systems and their maximum values. Thus intuition stands against intuition, will against will. Rosenberg expresses this thought in the following manner ("Myth", Introduction, pp. 1 and 2) : "History and the task of the future no longer means a struggle between classes, it will no longer be a struggle between church dogma and dogma, but the dispute between blood and blood, race and race, people and people. And this means: A struggle between psychic value and psychic value". Consequently, Rosenberg had, in any case, no ideas of genocide as Raphael Lemkin opines in "Axis Rule in Occupied Europe", page 81, where he ends the above quotation after the words "race and race, people and people", but he believed in a struggle between psychic value and psychic value, in other words, spiritual controversy.

I mention this spiritual tendency in order to explain the peculiar fact in National-Socialism that political considerations born of the intellect often the pathos of will and faith. In Rosenberg's case this danger did not appear so much. In making everything revolve around the "soil", i.e. the fatherland, and its history and peasantry as the life-growing forces from which spring the essence of a race, he remains in the sphere of life's realities. Perhaps, unaware of it himself, he was, nevertheless, borne upwards by the current.

DEFENSE

A question arises, as to the effects this ideology had in political life?

It is clear that the emphasis on will and faith gave special weight to political demands. After the Treaty of Versailles the political demands of Germany were aimed at recovering freedom and equality among the peoples for her great power which was everywhere hemmed in. This had been the objective of German statesmen already before Hitler. The other great power had certain misgivings about recognizing Germany again as a great power. Rosenberg fought to do away with these misgivings. His weapon was his pen. The Tribunal allowed me to present in evidence an excerpt of Rosenberg's speeches and writings. I submitted it in my Document Book I, Volume 2. In view of the quantity of material and of my intention to submit only the most important matter, through lack of time, I depend on the court's being familiar with my document book. In the first place I wish to call attention to the effects which these books had on German youth. I may recall the witness von Schirach's testimony. I repeat verbally: "At conventions of youth-leaders at which he spoke once a year, Rosenberg chiefly chose educational, character-building subjects. I remember he spoke for instance on loneliness and comradeship, personality and honor etc. At these conventions of leaders he did not deliver speeches against Jews. As far as I remember, he did not touch either on the confessional problem of youth, in any case to the best of my memory. Mostly I heard him talk on such subjects as I have just mentioned." The attitude of youth was actually better than before the taking-over of power. Idleness, the root of all evil, had ceased and had been replaced by work, the fulfillment of duty, the aiming at ideals, patriotism and the will to go ahead. It was a fatality here, too, that through Hitler's policy these values were used in the wrong manner.

The charges by the prosecution that Rosenberg was the advocate of a conspiracy against peace, of racial hatred, the elimination of human rights, of tyranny, a rule of horror, violence and illegality, of a wild nationalism and militarism, of a German master race, I could already refute by pointing to the excerpts from the "Myth of the 20th Century" which the prosecution itself has submitted as evidence for the truth of its assertions. In reply to this, in order to refute this assertion by the prosecution I want to point in particular to the following facts:

To prove Rosenberg's honest struggle for a peaceful living together of the peoples I wish to refer to his speech in Rome in November 1933 before the Royal Academy (printed in "Blood and Honor", Doc. Ro.7b, p. 150). In his speech in Rome, Rosenberg pointed to the fateful significance of the four great powers and proclaimed, I quote his words: "Therefore he who strives in earnest to create a Europe which shall be an organic unit with a pronounced multiplicity of form and not merely a crude summation, must acknowledge the four great nationalisms as given to us by fate and must, therefore, seek to give fulfillment to the force radiating from their core. The destruction of one of these centers by any power would not result in a "Europe" but would bring about chaos in which the other centers of culture would also have to perish. Reversed: It is only the triumph of the radiations in those directions where the four great forces do not come into conflict with each other which would result in the most dynamic force of creative thinking and organic peace, not an explosive forced situation such as prevails today, but it would then guarantee the small nations more security than appears possible today in the struggle against elementary force."

To this line Rosenberg, as chief of the Foreign Office of the Party, remained true. Unfortunately, he could only work for it through his word. No witness could confirm in this court room that Rosenberg had any influence on the actual foreign policy, whether it was directed by Neurath, Ribbentrop, Goering or Hitler himself. Neither in the Austrian, nor in the Czech, nor in the Polish, nor in the Russian complex has his name been mentioned in connection with the charge of participation in aggressive wars. Everywhere he was placed before accomplished facts. In the war against the Soviet-Union he received his orders only when the war against Russia had already been declared an acute possibility. He did not stir up the Norwegian campaign, but passed on personal information in accordance to his duty.

Now, as regards Rosenberg's speeches and writings on the problem of general foreign politics he advocated the "Anschluss" (union) of the Austrians who had been forcibly excluded from the Reich as a demand born of the right to self-determination which had been proclaimed by the Allies themselves. The revision of Versailles was a postulate of justice against a violation of the treaty of 11 November 1918. To advocate a German Wehrmacht was, in view of the non-disarmament of the other powers, a defense of the solemnly promised equality of rights.

From the standpoint of justice—and this is what Adolf Hitler personally told Rosenberg—it is not the affair of other nations to especially champion the living rights of the German people but it is the duty of the German nation itself. For this purpose it needed to establish a firm unity, and to overcome the social strife which made everything unsafe, and it needed a Wehrmacht, and these things all together, would only then make the Reich ready for alliances again.

DEFENSE

Those were the decisive factors, which guided Rosenberg.

I shall now take up the accusation of racial hatred. Rosenberg's opinions in regard to the race question were the result of racial research of international scientists. Rosenberg repeatedly asserts (I refer again to the opinions stated in Doc. Book I, Vol. 2) that the purpose of his racial political demands is not contempt of a race, but respect for it. "The leading moral idea of an approach to world history based on the laws of heredity belongs to our times and to our generation, being in full accord with the true spirit of the modern eugenics movement in regard to patriotism, i.e. the upholding and expansion of the spiritually, morally, intellectually and physically best hereditary forces for our fatherland; only in such way can we preserve our institutions for all future times." These words are the leading idea of his demands, though their originator was not Rosenberg, but Henry Fairfield Osborn, Professor at Columbia University who wrote them about the work of his colleague in science, Madis Grant: "The Decline of a Great Race". This research led long before the existence of the Third Reich to eugenic legislation in other countries, in particular to the American immigration law of 26 May 1924 which was aimed at a strong reduction of immigrants from Southern and Eastern Europe while favoring those the North and West of Europe.

For Rosenberg it was a question of spiritual strengthening and consolidation of the German nation, indeed of the Aryan race. He would like to have his ideology considered in that light, above all his "Myth of the 20th Century". His preaching of the significance of race in history did not call—I remark it again—for race contempt, but for consideration and respect of the race and he demanded the acknowledgment of the racial idea only of the German people, and not of other nations.

He considered the Aryan nations as the leading ones in history. And in so doing he somewhat underestimated the value of other races, as the Semitic ones, he, in his praise of Aryan races did not think of the German nation alone, but of the European nations in general. I point out his speech in Rome of November 1932.

I am keeping within the framework of historical truth in pointing to the fact that anti-Judaism is not an invention of National Socialism. For thousands of years the Jewish question has been the minority problem (Fremdenproblem) of the world. It has an irrational character which humanly cannot be understood. Rosenberg was a convinced anti-Semite, who in writing and speech gave expression to his convictions and their cause. I have already mentioned that even such different personalities as von Papen, von Neurath, Raeder still are of the opinion that the predominance of the Jewish element in the entire public life had reached such proportions that a change was bound to come. The concrete result of that predominance and the fact that the Jews in Germany when attacked knew how to repay in kind, sharpened the anti-Semitic fight before the accession to power (of the National Socialists).

I wanted to present to the Tribunal a selection of Jewish literary attacks on the national feelings at that time, but the Tribunal ruled it out as irrelevant; as these writings were not introduced as evidence I cannot speak about them. It is, however, an injustice to Rosenberg to assert that blind hatred of the Jewish race has driven him into that controversy. He had before his eyes concrete facts of the seditious activities of Jews.

It appeared as if the party program of placing Jews under a large scale law for aliens would be realized.

It is true that Goebbels at that time called for a day's boycott of Jewish stores. Rosenberg, however, declared in his speech of 28 June 1932 on the anniversary of the Versailles Treaty in the assembly hall of the Reichstag in the Kroll Opera: It was no longer necessary that in the capital of the Reich 74% of all lawyers should be Jews and that 80 to 90 percent of the physicians in Berlin hospitals should be Jewish. Some 30% of Jewish lawyers in Berlin would amply do. In his speech on the Parteitag in September 1933 Rosenberg stated in addition (I quote): "In the most chivalrous way the German government has excluded from the percentage stipulations those Jews, who have fought for Germany at the front or who have lost a son or a father in the war" (Doc. Ro. 7b supp., Doc. Book I, p.153a). In his speech at the Kroll Opera Rosenberg gave the reason for this measure, saying that an entire nation should not have been discriminated against, but that it was necessary for our younger German generation who for years had to starve or beg, to be able to obtain bread and work, too.

But despite his strong opposition to the Jews he did not want the "extermination" of Judaism, but advocated as the nearest goal the political expatriation of Jews, i.e. by placing them under a law and protection for aliens. In addition he granted to the Jews a percentage access to non-political professions which still by far exceeded the actual percentage Jews in the German population. Of course, his final goal was the total emigration of the Jews from Aryan nations. * He had no understanding of what a great loss to the Aryan nations themselves such an emigration would be in cultural, economic, and political respects. But one must admit that he meant that such emigration would prove useful for the Jews themselves, first because they would be free from anti-Semitic attacks and then because in their own settlement they may live unhampered according to their own ways.

DEFENSE

The dreadful development which the Jewish question took under Hitler, and which was justified by him as being a reaction against the policy pursued by the emigrants, was never more regretted than by Rosenberg himself, who blames himself for not having protested against the attitude of Hitler, Himmler and Goebbels, as much as he protested against Koch's influence in the Ukraine. Rosenberg also does not hesitate to admit that his suggestion to Hitler to shoot 100 Jews instead of 100 Frenchmen after the recurring murders of German soldiers was an injustice born under a momentary feeling—despite his belief in its formal admissibility—because from the purely human standpoint the real basis for such a suggestion was lacking, namely the active participation of those Jews. I am mentioning this event again, as it is the only instance when Rosenberg wanted retribution by the death of Jews. On the other hand one must insist with greatest emphasis that there is no proof of Rosenberg's being aware of the extermination of 5 million Jews. The prosecution is blaming him for making preparations for an anti-Semitic congress as late as 1944, which did not take place only because of the course of the war. What sense could such a congress have had when Rosenberg knew that the majority of the Jews in Europe had been already exterminated?

Rosenberg had no faith in democracy because it meant for Germany a split into numerous parties and a constant change of governments, making finally the formation of an efficient government impossible. Another reason for not having faith in democracy was that non-German democratic powers did not stand by their democratic principles in some cases when they could have been of benefit to Germany, for instance in 1919 when Austria was willing to be annexed to Germany and later on at the referendum in Upper Silesia. But Rosenberg did not turn towards tyranny for that reason. To paragraph 25 of the party program he said in his comments on page 46: "That central power—the Fuehrer's power is meant—should have as advisers representatives of the people as well as trade chambers grown out of organic life" (Doc. Book III, p. 6—Doc. Ro.34). And in his speech in Marienburg on 30 April 1934 "The Order of the German State" he said: The National-Socialist state must be a monarchy on a republican foundation. From that standpoint the state will not become a diefied purpose in itself, neither will its leader become a Caesar, a God or a substitute for God (Doc. Book I, p.131 Doc. Ro.7a).

In his speech "German Law" of 18-12-1934 Rosenberg stressed: "In our eyes the Fuehrer is never a tyrannical commander" (Doc. Book I, p.135, Doc. Ro. 7a).

Only in such expressions was a protest against the development of tyranny possible.

The development went beyond Rosenberg and degenerated. Rosenberg himself learned it while being Minister for the East. Rosenberg was an idealist, but he was not the unscrupulous man who inspired the state and the Fuehrer to commit crimes. I believe, therefore, that he should not be included in Mr. Jackson's accusation (page 8), that Rosenberg belongs to those who have been in Germany "the very symbols of race hatred, of the rule terror and violence, of arrogance and cruel power."

In looking over Rosenberg's writings, one more often finds statements and expressions which give a decided impression of tolerance.

He says, for example, in his "Myth", page 610, of the national church, which strove for: "A German church cannot pronounce compulsory dogmas which every one of its followers is compelled to believe, even at the risk of losing his everlasting salvation." In his speech "Ideology and Dogmatics" on November 5, 1938, in the University Halle-Wittenberg, he demanded tolerance toward all denominations with the demand of "in respect for every real denomination" (Doc. Book I, p. 156, Doc. Ro. 7c) and in his speech "On German Intellectual Freedom" of July 6, 1935 he also spoke up for the freedom of conscience (Doc. Book I, p. 140 Doc. Ro.7a). There was no document presented which contained a proposal by Rosenberg for criminal persecution against one of his numerous ideological opponents, although he may have been prompted to do so by their sharp attacks on his opinions.

Further, the Prosecution accused him of militarism and an exaggerated respect for the soldier (Soldatismus.). Rosenberg was indeed an admirer of the soldier's life and his heroic attitude toward life but he also admired the peasant's standards as the basis of the national character (Volkstum). He promoted the creation of a people's army (Volksheer), first as the outward expression of Germany's unity, and at home for the purpose of strengthening and educating the people. However, he denies that in this connection he thought of world conquest. On this point I can refer to his speech "Germany's Position in the World" of October 30, 1933. There he offered peace to Russia on the occasion of the German withdrawal from the League of Nations. ("Blood and Honor", Doc. Book I, p. 147). I shall quote this part for it proves also that National-Socialism did not want to interfere in the affairs of other countries: "We are ready at any time, to maintain absolutely correct relations with Soviet Russia, because we, of course do not necessarily want to change the valves of an ideology in the field of foreign policy and foreign relations."

DEFENSE

And in the same speech he emphasizes that the avowal of an ideology, which he calls ethnology is "not meant to be a lecture on racial hatred, but a lecture on racial respect" ("Blood and Honor" p. 377).

Mr. Jackson called Rosenberg's nationalism a "wild" one. He was passionate. But Rosenberg wanted thereby to overcome the class-conflict among the people which threatened their life, and for a clearer understanding of the facts it may also be said, that he is to be understood as a phenomena of psychic compensation, as often appears in a conquered people.

[The Tribunal requested a summary of the remainder of the speech if Dr. Thoma deemed it possible.—Ed.]

As to the accusation dealing with anti-Christianity, that is something which I have already mentioned, and I should just like to refer to it.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

I have already mentioned the words "Master Race", and in that connection I refer to the documents of Rosenberg. I wish to mention the fact that these words are not found in the documents at all.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Concerning the Party program. I stated that Rosenberg did not draft this, but rather supplied only a commentary. Also, we are not concerned with the things contained in the Party program, but rather, how the Party program was realized.

I refer to the witness Funk, who stated that in his first action and his first program as Minister of Economy, he did not refer to the Party program, but rather, that his program was democratic and liberal.

[Dr. Thoma omitted the material from this point to paragraph 5, page 360, but the Tribunal agreed to take official notice of it when submitted in writing.—Ed.]

The entire ideology of the journalist and author Rosenberg becomes intensified and is rendered more menacing to peace according to the prosecution by the fact that Rosenberg was the deputy of the Fuehrer for the supervision of the entire intellectual and ideological education of the NSDAP. How did this assignment come about and what were the circumstances concerning it? On the basis of his previous experience in the educational work of the Party, its organizational leader asked Rosenberg whether he would not undertake a common intellectual project. Rosenberg answered in the affirmative, if the Fuehrer wished it so. Whereupon on the 24th of January 1934 the Fuehrer appointed him the leader of the designated office. It was a party office and had nothing to do with the schools (as is erroneously assumed). The office had no right to issue directives to national offices; even any possible correspondence with them had to be sent only via the party office. Neither did it have any right to suppress books, etc. Even a right to issue directives to the party was not granted the more so since the branch school directors were also subordinated to the Reichsleaders (SA, SS, HJ). Therefore, from the very beginning Rosenberg did not consider his work as that of an intellectual police, but as an executive, unifying work, as the central point of the expression and realization of the factual and personal power of convincing and of initiative.

He had no offices in the various Gaus, not even any separate representatives; he accepted the Gau Education Leader as his deputy at the same time in order to maintain a connection with practical education in the country.

The office had many things to review in the course of time, yet in the beginning it remained quite limited.

It became subdivided into various spheres of work, teaching and education proper, cultivation of literature, the arts, cultural and general problems. About twice a year, for the purpose of comparing teaching experiences, Rosenberg called together the so-called "Working Community for the Instruction of the Entire Movement". In it were represented the educational deputies of the political leadership and its various subdivisions. They reported on their work and expressed their suggestions. On the basis of these suggestions, Rosenberg lectured frequently in the Gaus on appropriate topics, and likewise induced his collaborators to handle such questions in all the subdivisions. These are the two educational meetings which the Prosecution (Prot. p.2265) mentioned in its brief by reason of their alleged "broad influence on the community schools" as an indication of criminal activity. This generally executive work found expression particularly in the periodicals of the offices of Rosenberg's department. At first in the "N.S.Monthly Booklets", which after 1933 acquired a gradually increasing polemical-political content in the interest of handling historical, cultural, scientific topics. "Art in the German Reich" achieved special significance, as it simply offered the most beautiful examples in the way of contemporary plastic art, excellently presented without discussion. The "Buecherkunde" offered a monthly cross section of writings and literary contributions. The monthly periodical "Music" devoted itself above all to serious art, the cultivation of the German classics, and without any pettiness toward new creations. The journal "Germanic Heritage" published contributions on research in early history. The "German Folklore" was devoted to games, folk songs, peasant customs. "German Dramaturgy" described the ambitions and problems of the contemporary theater.

DEFENSE

Besides, there were special exhibitions of the lifework of great artists in Rosenberg's exhibition building in Berlin, book exhibits in various cities.

It is simply not true if the Prosecution declares that Rosenberg used his assignment to sow hatred. The essence of his entire work after 1933 was towards a deepening and large-scale promotion of new positive talents.

Political polemics in these seven years has almost entirely disappeared. But for the difficulties in the language, one would find in glancing over the journals and speeches, an honest great effort, whether Rosenberg spoke to the youth or to the technicians, teachers, lawyers, workers, professors, women at meetings of historians or the Northern Society. (Nordische Gesellschaft.)

Heads of his offices were instrumental in publishing and promoting valuable works of art: Classics of music, history of the German ancestry, world political libraries, development of the German peasantry, and others. In the present passionate days one is not interested to know of this side of a life work, and I only touch upon it but wish to emphasize that it was just that which seemed to Rosenberg, since 1933 potentially, as the most essential part of his work, as he likewise intended to devote himself in his old age entirely to the scientific-cultural research and teaching. But about this a few more words later.

Contrary to some, at first necessary, then in the evaluation of individual persons perhaps rather petty judgments, Rosenberg advocated at the universities of Munich and Halle the right of examining new problems of our times as well as the independence of scientific thinking. He declared, we would have to "feel as intellectual brothers of all those who once in medieval times raised the flag for this free research" (Doc. Book I, page 134). Against attempts to identify certain scientific physical theories with the Party, he protested in an official declaration rejecting this danger of hair-splitting. "It is not the task of the National-Socialist movement," said he, in a speech about Kopernikus and Kant on February 19, 1939, "to make any regulations for research other than necessarily connected with our philosophy of life". (Doc. Book I, p. 173).

When certain trends towards quantity, peak figures representing the number of visitors, etc., appeared within the otherwise desirable progress achieved by the DAF he unequivocally interceded in favor of an emphasis of the personal element. He rejected this idea of "mass production" in an address to youth, with the words, "One cannot receive art and culture delivered like mass-produced, ready-made clothes in a department store" (Doc. Book I, p. 155). If a poisoning of this youth is imputed to him here, he on the contrary asks (Doc. Book I, p. 161) for comprehension in teaching on the part of everybody under whose protection young people are placed and he unequivocally rejects here any orders in the intellectual field.

With regard to any (form of) collectivism, as has already been mentioned, he impresses on youth the importance of comradeship, but emphasizes the personal element and the right to solitude. When on the ground of certain occurrences many voices criticize the teaching body, Rosenberg apprehends the growth of a general discrimination against the profession. He takes stand against this danger in two speeches. At a great meeting in October 1934 at Leipzig, then at the session of the NS-Teacher's League at Bayreuth (Doc. Book I, p. 162), where he declared that the National-Socialist movement will step in and see that the teaching body be respected, just as it would have stepped in for all other professions.

By these brief allusions I mean to say that Rosenberg, as a regulating and leading intellectual force, advocated high cultural values and the rights of the personality, in a manner rendered convincing by his attitude and motives. Throughout the whole Party it was no secret that this activity involved deep opposition to the Propaganda Minister. Rosenberg considered it from the very beginning a calamity that culture and propaganda should be associated in one ministry. For him art was a faith, propaganda a form of the tactics of life.

At first things could not be changed, Rosenberg emphasized his attitude to the outside world by not attending a single annual meeting of the Reich Chamber of Culture, in the firm hope that at some later day another conception would win through.

Many things Rosenberg said did not fail to have their effect and certainly prevented some wrong actions, but more, and probably the most important, did not succeed because the legislative and executive powers in the State lay in quite different hands, and these finally due to the war, and in spite of the will to sacrifice, brought about not the development of the National-Socialistic idea but the growth of its degeneration. Moreover, this happened to an extent which Rosenberg could not foresee.

It was seen that the foundations for the spiritual instruction of the party were not sufficient, and round about 1935 there grew up a wish to have a serious place for research and study. This desire led to the idea which was known as "High School" later on and which was intended to take the form of an academy. Rosenberg considered the creation of this academy as a task for his old age. Since it would have taken years to provide teaching materials, and to choose personalities, the Fuehrer authorized Rosenberg, at the end of January 1940, to carry on the preparatory work he had started on official orders. Thus, contrary to what the prosecution asserts, the "High School" had nothing to do with Rosenberg's "Einsatzstab" which was not even planned at that time (Prot. p.2266).

DEFENSE

The Moral Law as a Basis of the Indictment

Mr. Justice Jackson, in his fundamental speech of 21 November 1945, has expressed the desire that this trial should appear to posterity as the fulfillment of the human passion for justice. Mr. Jackson has furthermore declared that he has brought the indictment because of conduct which according to its plan and intention meant injustice from the moral and the legal standpoint. In his report of 7 June 1945, Mr. Justice Jackson has outlined further, that in this trial those actions are to be punished which since time immemorial have been considered as crimes and are designated as such in any civilized legislation. The most difficult problem, the greatest task, and the most tremendous responsibility for the Tribunal lies concentrated in this single point: What is justice in this trial?

We have no code of laws, we have, as astonishing as it may sound, even no fixed moral concepts for the relations of nations to each other in peace and war. Therefore, the prosecution had to be satisfied with the general words: "civilized conception of justice", "traditional conception of legality", "conception of legality built on sound common sense with regard to justice"; they have spoken of "human and divine laws" (Mounier on 7 February 1946, Transcr., p. 3981); the land warfare rules of the Hague refer in their preamble to the "laws of humanity" and to the "demands of the public conscience".

The basis of justice is without any doubt a morality, the moral law; thus if we wish to determine what injustice among nations is, what is contrary to the idea of justice among nations according to international law, then we must open the question of morality.

One will answer that is moral which the conscience designates to us as being moral.

But what is the original cause of moral discrimination, the desire and happiness of the individual, or the progress, the improvement, the preservation of the life of an individual, of a people, of humanity, or virtue, or duty?

How can I recognize what is good and what is bad? By intuition, or by experience, or by authoritarian and religious education? What is good and bad in the actions of a state, what is good and bad in the mutual relationship between states and nations? Does a difference exist between national morals and private morals? Can the state do any injustice at all? From Saint Augustine, through Machiavelli and Nietzsche, to Hegel, Tolstoi and the pacifist thinkers, yearning humanity has received the most different answers to this question.

And furthermore, have fixed moral laws existed since time immemorial or have changes in the ideals of nations brought about changes in morals, too? What is the situation with regard to this today?

I have already said once, that according to my opinion, war itself is a brutality and a great crime of humanity against itself and the laws of life. An essentially different question is, whether this conviction has already entered the conscience of humanity. We consider ourselves way above the moral level of other nations and ages, and are, for example, astonished that the highest representatives of Greek morality, such as Plato, Aristotle, consider the exposure of children and slavery as absolutely right, or that in certain parts of East Africa today, only robbery and murder give a man the stamp of heroism; on the other hand it is absolutely compatible with our present day idea of morality that human beings are killed by hundreds of thousands in war and that the products of human welfare and culture are wantonly destroyed. Neither in a moral nor in a legal sense is this considered as unjust.

If the prosecution now charges the defendant with a wrong in the moral or legal sense, it is its duty to present the prerequisites for a punishment of the defendant for such a wrong, in such a way as to convince the court for, according to the hitherto existing moral concepts of nations, neither is killing in war a murder within the meaning of the penal codes of the individual countries nor have the measures of a sovereign country in war or in peace ever at all been interpreted as an offence within the meaning of these penal codes, or as punishable, immoral acts by the legal convictions of civilized humanity. Christianity teaches to return good for evil and to love one's enemy; this has been a world religion for 2,000 years, but many today still laugh if one demands the principles for the relations of nations between each other.

DEFENSE

In the face of the yearning of humanity the prosecution at last wants to help progress, even if only step by step, in this direction, it seeks to achieve that "unmistakable rules" emerge from this trial; its mistake, however, is that it wants to explain the "traditional opinions of justice" and the civil criminal laws as the contents of a public conscience which hardly exists any longer, and compliance with which cannot be demanded retroactively of the defendants.

It is certainly very true that a deep change is commencing today in the moral thinking of humanity, a new genesis of the moral law of nations, and that this trial before the High Tribunal constitutes a leap into this new era. However, it appears to me very doubtful whether it is just to hammer a new kind of justice into the conscience of mankind by making an example of the defendants.

It is easy to speak of human and divine laws, or of the demands of public conscience, but we become greatly embarrassed if we are to answer the question: What is the substance and content of private morality, when is an act immoral according to private morality? In their anguish over what is good or evil, some rely on religion, others have been taught wisdom by experience and education, others still find an explanation in the philosophers.

The state has in recent times taken on the moral education of its citizens in increasing measure, not only through criminal laws but also through "political education" or whatever other name is used for it. Not only does the National-Socialist state have a great advantage here over the liberal states, but so do all the totalitarian states of the world; they have hammered moral principles into the minds of their citizens which are of a private and public nature. They have proclaimed moral ultimate values, such as fidelity, honor, and obedience. By this means reflection concerning private and public morals is made easier for the individual citizens and they are obliged by force to uphold these ultimate values in the prescribed form. The German people, which has become tired and resigned as a result of continual warlike disputes and religious upheavals, willingly followed National Socialism, even when the latter's ethics were exalted to a faith; it made this leap into the unknown, not with the idea of being taught by this means to deceive people, to enslave them, to rob them, to kill them to torture them (see Mounnier on 7 February 1946, transcript, p. 3983), but because it asked for a moral elevation, an authoritative moral leadership in its material and spiritual distress, and because nothing else was offered to it, above all, not by a liberal world conscience which did not know how to make the fundamental principle of humanity a reality.

The National Socialist ethical conceptions were taught to Germans as "summum bonum", as the highest idea, and they believed the idea to be moral and good. Then National Socialism got into conflict not only with ideologies, but also with the means of power of other states, because it could not find the formula which would include not only the perfection and the life for Germany, but also the interests and justice for all nations of the world. Trying to construe out of such inadequacy of a national ethical idea, however inefficient, a punishable action, a conspiracy is not acceptable in my opinion if only because uniformly acknowledged national morality has not yet developed, but the unlimited national egotism has not been dethroned so far and even today is still considered as the highest moral instance of the state.

One could object, You Germans should only have followed the teachings of your great philosopher Kant in thought and action, according to his "categorical imperative". Act in such way that the maxim of your will could always serve as a principle for general legislation! Then you would and should have recognized the moral instability of National Socialist teachings. To that I can answer with the words of the great English philosopher John Locke, who says the following as to what is good or evil: ("Essay concerning human understanding" Book II, ch. XXVIII, par. 6 f.) "God has ordained it in such a manner, that certain activities produce general happiness, preserve society, and even reward the doer. Man discovers that and establishes it as a practical rule. With that rule are connected certain rewards and punishments either by God Himself (Reward and punishment of infinite size and duration in the Beyond) or by mortals (legal penalties, social approval or condemnation, loss of honor), good and evil which are not the natural effects and results of the actions themselves. Then men point to those rules or laws, i.e., divine and made by the state, and the laws of custom or of private opinion, and measure their actions by them. They judge the moral value of their actions according to whether they conform with the rules or not. The moral good or evil is therefore only conforming or not conforming our action with a law, which by the will and power of the legislator determines for us what is good and evil."

Therefore good and evil has been and still is today what the authorities want or do not want. Christianity for centuries has been preaching not only to Germans but to all nations of the world, "Everybody is a subject to the authority over him." And the authorities do not move beyond conscience and morality so long as the expansion of national egotism is not opposed by clear laws and commandments and irrefutable legal convictions.

DEFENSE

The highest good (summum bonum) in international morals of nations has not yet been mandatorily codified. There does not exist any authoritative idea for the community of nations. Instead of discussions on individual ethics and individual criminality, the prosecution should have submitted its accepted principles and criteria as international common law, which was not done.

Therefore, with regard to the standpoint of the prosecuting authorities as to the personal responsibility of the acting statesmen, I must put it down as a totally new philosophy and one which is very dangerous in its consequences.

Apart from the misdeeds of the individual, which do not satisfy even the minimum of moral conceptions, the ethical conceptions of National Socialism and the actions resulting from them, insofar as they are an expression of the National Socialist ethos, cannot be subjected to the judgment of a human forum, since they are an event of world history. And the "Fate and Guilt" of the defendant Rosenberg likewise cannot be judged conclusively within the framework of this trial. As to the question of deciding the criminal guilt of the defendant, that is the heavy task of the High Tribunal but his potential historical guilt cannot and will not be judged by the Tribunal. Rosenberg like all persons of historical importance has acted according to his character and his pathos, thereby perhaps becoming guilty in the eyes of history. The more freedom of action a given personality has in his will, the clearer becomes the importance of conditions and the onesidedness of all human activities, and out of an insignificant guilt there grows, particularly in historical personalities, an enormous power, which decides the fate of many and which remains a gloomy foreboding him who lets it loose.

Goethe says once, "The doer never has a conscience, no one feels his conscience but the observer". But this maxim can never mean that a person is not to move and act to the best of his knowledge and conscience, and particularly for his country's sake. And we all know that in reality nobody is capable of attaining the good he is striving for. Just as his knowledge, so will his actions, always be incomplete. Any action we accomplish as free beings is an infringement on the operating forces of the universe, which we are never able to overlook.

I will now sum up in conclusion and I would like to point out the following:

Rosenberg was caught up in the destiny of his nation in a period of heavy foreign political oppression and internal dissension. He struggled for cultural purity, social justice, and national dignity and rejected all the movements prompted by passion which did not admit these high values or which consciously attacked them in an irreverent manner. With respect to foreign policy he stood for an agreement, especially between the four central powers of the European continent, under recognition of the heavy consequences of a lost war.

He acted in all loyalty and respect towards a personality who gave a political shape and increasing power to his ideas.

After the political victory at home, Rosenberg advocated the overcoming of the polemics and other aspects of the period of struggle. He stood for a chivalrous solution of the existing Jewish problem, for a large scale spiritual-cultural instruction of the party, and, contrary to the statements of the prosecution, he refused any religious persecution. He cannot be blamed for emphasizing a definite religious-philosophical conviction of his own. The practical utilization of many of his views was accepted by authoritative agencies of the party but they were disregarded in a steadily increasing proportion, especially after the beginning of the war. Finally as has been discovered now, they were often turned into the opposite of what Rosenberg fought for.

Until 17 July 1941 Rosenberg was excluded from participation in any state legislation. Considered from the point of view of personal responsibility, all his speeches and writings come within the scope of unofficial journalistic activity which every politician and writer must admittedly be at freedom to engage in, a freedom which the Tribunal has fundamentally acknowledged with regard to all utterances by the statesmen of all other countries during the unofficial period of their career. It seems to have all the more importance that Rosenberg as a private man did not make any appeals in favor of a war or any inhumane or violent acts.

As Minister for the East he advocated a generous solution taking into consideration the comprehensible national and cultural aspiration of the Eastern European peoples. He fought for this conception as long as it had some prospects. Ultimately realizing that Hitler refused to be persuaded, he requested his dismissal. The fact that he could not prevent many outrages from happening in the East cannot be brought a penal charge against him. Neither the Wehrmacht nor the Police nor the Labor conscription were subject to his authority. Whenever injustices or excesses came to his knowledge, he did everything he could to counteract them.

For almost a whole year, Rosenberg endeavored to keep the labor recruiting on a voluntary basis. When several age classes were later called, he protested against every abuse by the executives and always demanded redressing measures. Quite apart from the legitimate requirements of the occupation power, his labor legislation for the Eastern territories was necessary for the establishment of order and the repression of despotism as well as of dangerous idleness, growing sabotage, and increasing murderous actions. It was war time and it was a war area, not a post-armistice period or by any means a period subsequent to a definite capitulation.

DEFENSE

So far as he was informed of things and commanded any influence Rosenberg fought for his good conviction. The fact that adverse powers were stronger cannot be brought as a charge against him. One cannot punish offenses and at the same time punish those who revolted against them. With regard to the terrible extermination orders which have now been disclosed, it is certainly possible to raise the point whether Rosenberg could not have exerted a much stronger opposition. Such a demand would, however, suppose an earlier knowledge of things which he only learned after the collapse. Should he be incriminated with any carelessness it must not be forgotten that he felt the duty of serving the German Reich and engaged in the struggle for its existence and that terrible injuries were also inflicted upon the German nation, injuries which Rosenberg was unable to accept as war necessities.

The official orders, as for example the duties of the Operational staff West and East, were carried out by Rosenberg in preserving his personal integrity. The seizure of artistic and cultural goods he always carried out provisionally, subject to final decision of supreme headquarters and, as far as was possible in any way, subject to agreement with the proprietor. Moreover, for the use of stray furniture for the benefit of air raid victims in Germany, provisions were made for the subsequent indemnification of the proprietors based upon a precise inventory.

Considered in his entire personality, Rosenberg has followed his belief and love for an ideal of social justice allied to national dignity. He has fought for it openly and honorably, he has gone to prison and risked his life for it. He did not only step in when National Socialism afforded the opportunity to begin a career but at a time when it was dangerous and only cost the life of victims. In his speeches after 1933, he took his stand in favor of a deeper spiritual formation, a new cultural education, personality values and respect for every form of honest work. He accepted the sombre days of that time as unfortunate but inevitable accompanying phenomena of a revolution without bloodshed without having in fact been aware of the secret details. He fully believed that the better forces and ideas would prevail over these as well as other human imperfections. In the war, he was conscientiously at the service of the Reich.

For 25 years he kept his personal integrity and untainted character through the revolution and the events of the war. He had to experience with deep sorrow how a great idea in the hands of those possessed with the lust for power was gradually abused, and in 1944, at party reunions, he protested against this abuse of the power entrusted to its holders. He had to see at the court proceeding, to his disgust and horror, the evidence of the degeneration of his life ideal, but he knows that his aspirations and the aspirations of many millions of other Germans have been honorable and decent. Today indeed, he stands up for his honorable, honest, and humanly irreproachable conduct and, full of sorrow for the wounds inflicted upon all nations and for the downfall of the Reich, he awaits the sentence of a just Tribunal.

2. FINAL PLEA by Alfred Rosenberg

The Prosecutors, going beyond a repetition of the old accusations, have raised new ones in the strongest manner. They now claim that we all attended secret conferences in order to plan for an aggressive war. Further, we are supposed to have ordered the alleged murder of 12,000,000 people. All these accusations have been collectively described as Genocide—the Murder of peoples. I want to declare the following in that connection.

My conscience is completely free from such guilt, beginning from an assistance in the murder of people. Instead of working for the destruction of the culture and national sentiments of the people of Europe, I represented the furthering of their physical and moral living conditions; and instead of destroying their personal safety and human dignity, I have proved that with all my might I stood up against every policy of forcible measures and that I demanded with severity a just behavior on the part of the German officials and a humane treatment of Eastern workers. Instead of carrying on a policy of "child slavery", I saw to it that juveniles coming from territories endangered by combat were protected and took special care of them. Instead of exterminating religion, I reinstated the liberty of the churches in the Eastern territories by a decree of tolerance.

In Germany, representing my ideological convictions, I demanded freedom of conscience, granted it to every enemy, and never ordered a persecution of religion.

The thought of a physical extermination of Slavs and Jews, that is to say, the actual murder of peoples, has never entered my mind and I must certainly not advocate it in any way. It was my opinion that the existing Jewish question had to be solved by the creation of a minority right, emigration, or by settling the Jews in a national territory by a process lasting a decade. The white paper of the British Government of 24 July 1946 shows how a historical development can cause measures which were never previously planned.

DEFENSE

The practice of the German State Leadership in the war as proved here during the trial, completely differed with my conviction. Adolf Hitler, in an increasing measure, drew persons to himself who were not my comrades, but my opponents. I must say, with reference to their harmful activities, this is not the execution of National Socialism for which millions of believing men and women have fought. It was its shameful misuse; it was the degeneration which I also deeply condemned.

The thought that a crime of Genocide has to be outlawed by International agreement and will be the subject of severe penalties is something which I sincerely welcome, though under the natural prerequisites, Genocide neither at present nor in the future may be permitted against the German people in any way.

Among other matters, the Soviet Prosecutor stated that the entire "so-called ideological activity" had been a "preparation for crime". In that connection I wish to say that National Socialism represented the thought of an overcoming of the class struggle which was disintegrating the people, and the unity of all classes in a large community of peoples. Through the Labor Service, for instance, it reinstates the honor of manual labor on the mother earth, and directs the eyes of all Germans to the necessity of a strong peasantry. By the Winter Aid Work it created a comradeship of the entire nation working for all the comrades in need, irrespective of their former Party membership. It built homes for mothers, youth hostels, and community clubs in the factories; and it acquainted millions with the yet unknown treasures of art.

And all that, I too served.

Never in my love of a free and strong Reich did I forget the duty towards honorable Europe. As early as 1932 I applied to Rome for its maintenance and peaceful development, and I fought as long as I could for the ideas of the inner workings of the peoples of Eastern Europe when becoming Eastern Minister in 1941. Therefore, in this hour of need, I cannot deviate from the idea of my life, from the ideal of a socially peaceful Germany and a Europe conscious of its value, and I will remain faithful to them.

The honest service for this ideology considering all human shortcomings was not a conspiracy; my actions were never a crime. I understood my struggle to be, as it was understood by many thousands of comrades, the struggle for the most noble idea for which it was fought for every 100 years and for which the flag was raised.

I ask you to recognize this as the truth.

In that case no persecution of a conviction would arise from this trial; then, in my conviction, a first step would be taken for a new mutual understanding of the peoples, without prejudice, without hostile sentiments, and without hatred.

IX. HANS FRANK

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Alfred Seidl, Defense Counsel

Mr. President, my Lords,

The defendant Dr. Hans Frank is accused in the Indictment of having utilized his posts in Party and State, his personal influence and his relations with the Fuehrer for the purpose of supporting the seizure of power by the National Socialists and the consolidation of their control over Germany. He is also accused of having approved, led and taken part in the war crimes mentioned in Count 3 of the Indictment, as well as in the crimes against humanity mentioned in Count 4, particularly in the war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in the course of the administration of occupied territories.

As I have already explained in the case of the defendant Hess, the Indictment fails to adduce any facts in substantiation of these accusations. It is similar in the case of the defendant Frank; here again the Indictment contains no statement of factual details to substantiate the accusations.

Like all the other defendants, the defendant Frank is accused of having taken part in a common plan which is alleged to have had as its object the planning and waging of wars of aggression and the commission in the course of these wars of crimes which infringe the laws and customs of war.

The evidence has shown that the defendant Frank joined the National Socialist Party in the year 1928. Both before and after the assumption of power by the National Socialists, he was concerned almost exclusively with legal questions till the year 1942. The Reich Law Department was under his control as Reichsleiter of the Party. After Adolf Hitler's appointment as Chancellor, Frank became the Bavarian Minister of Justice. In the same year he was appointed Reich Commissioner for the political coordination of legal institutions. This task consisted in the main of transferring to the Reich Ministry of Justice the functions of the administrative legal departments of the component States (Laender). That was completed in the year 1934. When the affairs of the Bavarian Ministry of Justice had been transferred to the Reich, the office of the defendant Frank as Bavarian Minister of Justice came to an end. In December 1934 he was appointed Reich Minister without Portfolio. In addition he became, from 1934, President of the Academy for Germany Law which he himself had founded, and President of the International Chamber of Law. Finally, he was the Leader of the National Socialist Lawyers' Association.

DEFENSE

This list of the various posts held by the defendant Frank in Party and State would alone be sufficient to show that his work was almost exclusively concerned with legal matters. His tasks were in the main confined to the execution of Point 19 of the Party Program, which demanded a German Common Law. And in actual fact almost all speeches and publications by the defendant Frank, both before and after the assumption of power by the National Socialists, dealt with legal questions in the widest sense of the term.

In the course of his examination in the witness box, the defendant Frank testified that he had done everything he could to bring Adolf Hitler to power and to carry out the ideas and the program of the National Socialist Party. But whatever the defendant undertook in this respect was done openly. Here I can for the most part refer to the statements I made in the case of the defendant Hess. The aim of the National Socialists before they assumed power can be expressed in a few words: Liberation of the German people from the shackles of the Versailles Treaty; elimination of the huge mass of unemployment which had arisen in consequence of that Treaty and of the unreasonable reparations policy of Germany's former enemies; elimination of the signs of degeneracy—political, economic, social and moral—connected with that unemployment, and finally the restoration of the sovereignty of the German Reich in all spheres.

The Prosecution was unable to produce any evidence to show that the revision of the Versailles Treaty was, if necessary, to be carried out by violent means and by war. The political, military and economic situation in which Germany found herself before the assumption of power, a situation in which it could only be a question of eliminating the terrible consequences of the economic collapse and of enabling seven million unemployed again to play their part in the economic process, necessarily made any serious thought of a war of aggression appear futile.

Moreover, the evidence brought forth nothing to show the existence of the common plan alleged by the Prosecution in Count One of the Indictment, if by this we are to understand a particular, clearly defined plan evolved by a closely circumscribed, unchanging set of people.

As regards the participation of the defendant Frank in this common plan, the evidence and in particular the testimony given by the witness Dr. Lammers and the defendant himself in the witness box, has shown on the contrary that Frank did not belong to the circle of Hitler's closer collaborators. The Prosecution was unable to present to the Tribunal a single document dealing with important political or military decisions with which the defendant Frank was connected. In particular, the defendant Frank was not present at any conference with Hitler which the Prosecution considered especially important for proving the alleged common plan, the minutes of which conferences the Prosecution has submitted as Exhibits USA 25 to 34.

The only statute which is important in this connection is the Law concerning the Reintroduction of General Conscription of March 16, 1935. In the case of the defendant Hess I have already explained in detail what led to the promulgation of that law and why it cannot be looked upon as an infringement of the Versailles Treaty.

The defendant Frank signed that law in his capacity as Reich Minister, as did all the other members of the Reich Government. That law, which had as its object the restoration, at least in the military sphere, of the sovereignty of the German Reich, did no harm to any other nation. Nor did the content of that law or the circumstances which led to its enactment allow of the conclusion that it was part of a common plan whose object was the launching of a war of aggression. The German people had been obliged to realize during the preceding 17 years that the voice of a nation without military power, and in particular a nation in Germany's geographical and military situation, cannot make itself heard in the concert of nations if it has not at its disposal adequate instruments of power. The Government of the German Reich faced the consequences of this realization, after equality of rights had been promised the German people over and over again for fourteen years and that promise had not been kept, and in particular after it had become clear in the years 1933 and 1934 that the Disarmament Conference would not be capable of fulfilling its appointed functions. For the rest, I refer to the Proclamation of the Reich Government to the German people, which was issued in connection with the publication of that law.

Further: the work of the defendant Frank, even after the assumption of power, up to the beginning of the war, was confined almost exclusively to the execution of tasks connected with the leadership of the Academy for German Law and the National Socialist Lawyers' Association.

DEFENSE

The objects of the Academy for German Law are apparent from the Law concerning its establishment of July 11, 1943. It was intended to encourage the reform of German legal processes and, in close and constant cooperation with the appropriate legislative authorities, to put the National Socialist program into practice in the whole sphere of law. The Academy was under the supervision of the Reich Minister of Justice and the Reich Minister of the Interior. The function of the Academy was to prepare drafts of statutes. Legislation itself was exclusively a matter for the appropriate Reich Ministries for the various departments. One of the tasks of the Academy was to exercise the functions of the legal committees of the former Reichstag. In actual fact the work of the Academy was done almost exclusively in its numerous committees which had been established by the defendant. Entry into the Academy was not dependent on membership of the Party. Most of the members of the Academy were legal scholars and eminent practitioners of law, who were not Party members. Moreover, it is well known that the Academy for German Law kept up close relations with similar establishments abroad, and that numerous foreign scholars gave lectures in the Academy. These facts entirely exclude the assumption that the Academy could have played any important part in the common plan alleged by the Prosecution. The same is true of the position of the defendant Frank as Leader of the National Socialist Lawyers' Association.

Adolf Hitler's attitude to the conception of a State resting on law (Rechtsstaat), in so far as any doubt could still have been entertained about it, has become perfectly clear through the evidence presented at this trial. Hitler was a revolutionary and a man of violence. He looked on law as a hindrance and as a disturbing factor in the realization of his plans in the realm of power politics. Moreover, he left no doubt about this attitude of his and spoke about states under rule of law in a number of speeches. He was always very reserved in his dealings with lawyers, and for this reason alone it was impossible from the outset that any close association could have developed between him and the defendant Frank. The defendant Frank considered it his life's work to see the conception of a State resting on law realized in the National Socialist Reich, and above all to safeguard the independence of the judiciary.

The defendant Frank proclaimed these principles as late as in the year 1939, before the outbreak of war, in a great speech he made before 25,000 lawyers at the final meeting of the Congress of German Law in Leipzig. Among other things he declared on that occasion :

"1. No one shall be sentenced who has not had an opportunity of defending himself.

2. No one shall be deprived of his property, provided that he uses it unobjectionably from the point of view of his fellow-men, except by judicial sentence. Legal property in this sense are: Honor, freedom, life, earnings from work.

3. An accused person, no matter under what procedure, must be enabled to procure someone to defend him who is capable of making legal statements on his behalf; he must have an impartial hearing according to law. If these principles are applied to their full extent, then is the germanic ideal of law fulfilled."

These principles constitute an unmistakable repudiation of all methods employed in a police-ruled State and imply moreover the unmistakable rejection of the system of concentration camps. The defendant Frank had actually spoken against the establishment of concentration camps before the date indicated. The evidence has shown that in the year 1933 he, in his capacity as Bavarian Minister of Justice, was opposed to the concentration camp of Dachau, that he urged the application of the so-called legality principle (i.e. the prosecution of all offenses by the State) even in these camps, and that, over and above this, he demanded the dissolution of the concentration camp of Dachau. That this last is a fact is shown by the evidence, taken on commission, of the witness, Dr. Stepp.

The Prosecution also appears to see in the sentence "Law is what is useful to the people" and indication of the participation of the defendant Frank in the alleged common plan. Such a conclusion could only be drawn from a complete misapprehension of the idea which the defendant Frank wished to express by means of this sentence. It is merely the issue of a challenge to the individualistically over-sensitized legal mind. In the same sense as is implied in the phrase "The common good before one's own", the sentence quoted is intended to express the demand for a legal system which, to a greater extent than in previous years, takes account of common law and socialist tendencies. It is in reality nothing more than a different way of saying: Salus publica suprema lex.

These material differences alone would have been sufficient to make it unthinkable that the defendant Frank could have belonged to the inner circle of Hitler's collaborators. The difference of outlook in regard to the functions of law were bound to become more apparent in the course of the war. It could therefore cause no surprise that after the death of the former Reich Minister of Justice Dr. Guertner, it was not the defendant Frank who was appointed as his successor, but the President of the People's Court Dr. Thierack.

DEFENSE

To sum up: It may be said that there is no factual foundation for the assumption that the defendant Frank participated in a common plan which had as its object the waging of an aggressive war and in connection therewith the commission of crimes against the rules of war. Before I turn to the points of accusation brought against the defendant Frank within the framework of his career as Governor-General, I will refer shortly to his responsibility under penal law as a member of the organizations accused of criminality.

In so far as Frank's responsibility as member of the Reich Government is under investigation, I can here refer in the main to my statements regarding the defendant Hess. The only difference lies in the fact that whereas Hess, too, was only Reich Minister without Portfolio, he had, as 'the Fuehrer's Deputy under the Fuehrer's Decree of July 27, 1934, a considerable part to play in the preparation of laws. That was not the case with the defendant Frank. He had hardly any influence at all on the legislation of the Reich. That is why he was co-signatory of so extraordinarily few Reich laws. With the exception of the law by which general conscription was reintroduced, his name is to be found under none of the laws which the Prosecution has presented to the Tribunal as relevant to the proof of the criminal nature of the Reich Government as an organization.

The defendant Frank, in his capacity as Reichsleiter and Leader of the Reich Law Department was also a member of the Leadership Corps of the National Socialist Party. An investigation of this point of accusation seems all the less called for, as no acts can be attributed to the defendant Frank which fulfill the requirements of any penal law. For the rest, I can here too refer to my statements in the case of the defendant Hess.

In the Annex to the Indictment it is alleged that the defendant Frank was a General of the SS. The evidence has shown that Frank at no time belonged to the SS and that he did not even have the honorary rank of a general of the SS. On the other hand, he was an Obergruppenfuehrer of the SA. With respect to the application made by the Prosecution to declare that organization criminal too, the same may be said as in the case of the application to declare the Leadership Corps criminal. The Charter and the Prosecution here again depart from a principle which has hitherto been considered an indispensable component of any modern criminal law practice, namely that no punishment is admissible unless guilt has been established in every individual case.

My Lords!

I now pass to the points of accusation in connection with the career of the defendant Frank as Governor-General. When the Polish Government had left the country after Poland's military collapse, the German occupying forces were faced with the task of building up an administration without the help of any parliamentary representation or any representatives of the former Polish State. The difficulties arising out of this situation were bound to be all the greater because, in spite of the comparatively short time that the war had lasted, the war damage, especially to the communications system, was not inconsiderable. Above all, however, the establishment of an orderly administration was rendered more difficult by the fact that the unitary economic territory of the former Polish State was divided into three parts. Of the 388,000 sq.km. which made up the territory of the former Polish State, about 200,000 sq.km. were taken over by the Soviet Union; 97,000 sq.km. formed the Government-General, while the rest was incorporated in the German Reich. A change came on August 1, 1941. On that date Galicia was annexed to the Government-General as a new district, whereby the territory of the Government-General was increased to an area of approximately 150,000 sq.km. with 18 million inhabitants. This frontier-delimitation made all the more difficulties for the administration, as the agricultural excess products all went to the Soviet Union, while on the other hand, important industrial cities such as Lodz, and above all the coal fields of Dombrowa, fell to the Reich.

Directly after the military collapse of Poland, a military government was sent up to cover the four military districts of East Prussia, Posen, Lodz and Cracow, Commander-in-Chief General von Rundstedt being placed at the head of that Government. The defendant Frank became Supreme Chief of Administration (Oberverwaltungschef).

The military Government ended on October 26, 1939, with the coming into force of the Decree of the Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor (October 12, 1939) concerning the administration of the occupied Polish territories. By this decree the defendant Frank was appointed Governor-General for the occupied Polish territories which were not incorporated in the Reich and which shortly afterwards became known as the "Government-General".

DEFENSE

As the time at my disposal is short, I will not go into detail on the question as to whether the administration of the territories of the former Polish State jointly designated as the Government-General should have conformed to the principle of occupatis bellica (occupation of enemy territory), or whether it should not rather be assumed that the principles of debellatio (complete subjugation and incorporation in a foreign State) were applicable in that case.

I come now to the question of the powers vested in the defendant Frank by virtue of his office of Governor-General. According to Article 3 of the Fuehrer's Decree of October 12, 1939 the Governor-General was directly subordinate to the Fuehrer. The same provision placed all branches of the administration in the hands of the Governor-General.

In actual fact, however, the Governor-General had by no means such wide powers as it would seem at first sight. The Fuehrer's Decree itself provided in Article 5 that the Ministerial Council for the Defence of the Reich could also make laws for the territory of the Government-General.

The Plenipotentiary for the Four-Year-Plan had the same power. Article 6 provided that over and above this all the highest Reich authorities could issue decrees necessary for planning within the German living space and economic area, and that these would be effective also for the Government-General.

Apart from this limitation of the authority of the Governor-General, as provided in the Fuehrer's Decree of October 12, 1939, other powers were conferred at a later date, which impaired to an equal degree the principle of a military administration. That is particularly true of the position of the Plenipotentiary for Labor. I refer at this point to the appropriate documents presented by the Prosecution and the Defense, in particular to the Fuehrer's Decree of March 21, 1942, in which it is expressly provided that the powers of the Plenipotentiary for Labor extended to the territory of the Government-General. The whole armament industry in the Government-General was at first in the hands of the OKW; after the establishment of the Reich Ministry of Armaments, it came under the jurisdiction of the latter.

The evidence has also shown that in other directions too the principle of military administration was extensively infringed. For this I refer to the Statements of the witnesses Dr. Lammers and Dr. Buehler and to the content of the documents submitted by me, especially the document USA 135. This deals with the directives in "special matters concerning instruction No. 21 (case Barbarossa)," in which it is expressly provided that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army shall be entitled "to order such measures in the Government-General as are necessary for the execution of his military duties and for safeguarding the troops," and in which the Commander-in-Chief is empowered to delegate his authority to the Army groups and armies.

All these infringements of the principle of a unitary administration of all special powers, however, pale beside the special position allotted to Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler even in respect of the territory of the Government-General. The evidence, and particularly the testimony of Dr. Bilfinger, councillor (Oberregierungsrat) in the RSHA, shows that as early as in 1939 when the defendant was appointed Governor-General, a secret decree was issued in which it was provided that the Higher SS and Policeleader East was to receive his instructions direct from the Reichsfuehrer SS and Chief of the German Police Himmler. Similarly, it is provided in the Decree of the Fuehrer and Reich Chancellor for the Consolidation of the German Nation that the Reichsfuehrer SS should be directly empowered to effect the formation of new German Settlement areas by means of resettlements. These two decrees conferred on the Reichsfuehrer SS powers which from the very first day of the existence of the Government-General were to confront its administration with almost insurmountable difficulties. It was very soon evident that the general Administration under the Governor-General had at its disposal no executive organs in the true meaning of the term. Since the Higher SS and Policeleader East received his instructions and orders direct from Reichsfuehrer Himmler and refused to carry out instructions emanating from the Governor-General, it was very soon seen that in reality there were two separate authorities ruling over the Government-General. The difficulties which thus arose were bound to become all the greater as Higher SS and Policeleader Krueger, who for not less than four years was Himmler's direct representative in the Government-General, did not even inform the administration of the Government-General before carrying out police measures.

It is a well-known experience in constitutional life that any administration lacking executive police organs is in the long run not capable of carrying out its appointed functions. This is even true under normal conditions, but must be more especially the case in the administration of occupied territory. If we remember moreover not only that Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler issued his instructions direct to the Higher SS and Policeleader, ignoring the Governor-General, but that over and above this the offices III, IV, V and VI of the RSHA also gave direct orders, namely to the Commander of the Security Police and the SD in Cracow, then we can assess the difficulties with which the civil administration of the Government-General had to wrestle day by day.

DEFENSE

Under these circumstances the Governor-General had no choice but to make every attempt to reach some form of cooperation with the Security Police, unless he was prepared to relinquish entirely any hope of building up a civil administration in the Government-General. And in fact the history of the Administration of the Government-General, which lasted more than five years, is for the greater part nothing but a chronicle of uninterrupted struggles between the Governor-General and the administration on the one hand and, on the other, the Security Police (including the SD) represented by Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler and the Higher SS Policeleader East.

The same applies to the work of Himmler and his organs in the field of resettlements. As Reichs Commissioner for the Consolidation of the German Nation Himmler and his organs carried out resettlement measures without even getting into previous contact with the administration of the Government-General or informing the Governor-General.

The numerous protests of the Governor-General, addressed to Dr. Lammers, Reichsminister and Chief of the Reich Chancellery, with regard to the measures taken by the Reichsfuehrer and the Higher SS and Policeleader East and the difficulties they put in the way of the administration of that territory, have been established by the evidence. These protests led in the year 1942 to an attempted new regulation of the relationship between the administration and the police. In retrospect it can be said today as a result of the evidence that even this attempt was only utilized by Himmler and the Security Police to undermine internally and externally the position of the Governor-General and his civil administration.

By Decree of the Fuehrer, dated May 7, 1942, a State Secretariat for Security was established in the Goverment-General, and the Higher SS and Policeleader was appointed State Secretary. According to Article II of this Decree the State Secretary for Security also became the representative of the Reichsfuehrer SS in his capacity as Reichs Commissioner for the consolidation of the German nation. The decisive provision of this decree is contained in Article IV in which it is stated verbatim:

"The Reichsfuehrer SS and Chief of German Police can issue direct instructions to the State Secretary for Security in matters pertaining to Security and the Consolidation of the German nation."

Herewith the content of the secret decree issued in the year

1939 on the establishment of the Government-General, which also provided that the Higher SS and Policeleader East was to receive his instructions direct from the Berlin central offices and above all from the Reichsfuehrer SS in person, was expressly and now publicly confirmed. It is true that Article V of the Fuehrer's Decree of May 7, 1942, provided that in case of differences of opinion between the Governor-General and the Reichsfuehrer SS and Chief of German Police the Fuehrer's decision was to be obtained through the Reichs Minister and Chief of Chancellery.

Chief of the Reich Chancellery Lammers was interrogated on this subject when he appeared as witness before this Tribunal. He testified that in so far as he found it possible at all to gain the Fuehrer's ear in these matters, the latter on principle invariably approved Himmler's view. This is not surprising if we remember Himmler's position in the German Governmental system, particularly during the later war years. This deprived the defendant Frank of the last possibility of influencing in any way the measures taken by Himmler and the Higher SS and Policeleader East.

In consequence of Article I, paragraph 3 of the Fuehrer's decree of May 7, 1942, the scope of duties of the State Secretary for Security had to be newly defined. Both the Higher SS and Policeleader, and backing him, the Reichsfuehrer SS, attempted to bring as much as possible under their jurisdiction in connection with the new regulation of the competence of the State Secretariat; on the other hand, the Governor-General, in the interest of the maintenance of some sort of order in the administration, naturally tried to obtain control of at least certain departments of the order Police and the administration Police. There is no doubt at all that it was the Police that emerged the victor in these struggles.

On June 3, 1942, the Governor-General was obliged, in a decree concerning the transfer of offices to the State Secretary for Security, to declare himself willing to transfer to the State Secretary all the departments of the Security Police and the order Police. I have submitted this decree to the Tribunal (together with its two appendixes A and B) in the course of the evidence as Exhibit Frank 4. The two appendixes list all the departments of the order and security police that have ever existed in the German Police system. In Appendix A, which covers the departments of the order police, there are 26 numbers in which not only all the departments of the order police are transferred to the State Secretary for Security, but over and above that, almost all the departmental functions of the so-called administration police. I will only mention No. 18 as one example among many. This transfers to the order Police, and therewith to the Higher SS and Policeleader, all matters connected with price control. What is true of the order Police is true in still greater measure of the departments of the Security Police. No change as compared with the earlier situation was brought about by placing under the jurisdiction of the Higher SS and Policeleader the whole of the political and criminal police, political intelligence, Jewish affairs and similar departments; these competencies were already his as leader of the Security Police and the SD, and were made entirely independent of the administration of the Government-General under the secret decree of the year 1939. Departments were also transferred to the State Secretary for Security which had only the remotest connection with the tasks of the Security Police, i.e., matters such as the regulation of holidays and so on. Of no inconsiderable importance are the two last numbers in the appendix A and B, in which it is expressly provided that at conferences and meetings, particularly with the central Reich authorities, on all matters pertaining to the Order-and security police, the Government-General—not the Governor—should be represented by the Higher SS and Policeleader. Therewith any competency possessed by the Governor-General, even in regard to comparatively unimportant branches of the Administrative police, was transferred to the organs of Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler, and the Government-General was thus deprived of even the last remnants of an executive of its own.

DEFENSE

Only by considering these facts and the development of the conditions obtaining between administration and police in the Government-General is it possible to form an even approximately correct appreciation of the events in the Government-General which form part of the subject of the indictment in this trial.
Your Lordships!

The Prosecution seeks to prove its accusations against the defendant Dr. Frank in the main by quotations from the defendant's diary. In this connection I have the following basic observations to make:

That diary was not kept personally by the defendant Frank, but was compiled by stenographers who were present at Government conferences and other meetings with the Governor-General. The diary consists of 42 volumes with not less than 10–12,000 pages of typescript; with one exception, the entries were made, not as a result of dictation by the Defendant, but in the form of stenographers' transcripts. For the greater part, and this is evident from the Diary itself, the authors of this Diary did not record the various speeches and remarks word for word, but made a summarized version in their own words. The entries in the diary were not checked by the defendant and, again with one single exception, were not signed by him. The attendance list stapled into several volumes of the diary—they are only contained in such volumes as relate to Government conferences—cannot be looked upon as a substitute for a confirmatory note. Moreover, the evidence has established clearly that very many entries in the diary were not made on the basis of personal observations, but came about through the fact that the author was told, by the participants, about the subject of government meetings or other conferences after they had taken place, and then expressed it in the diary in his own words.

Above all however it seems to me essential to point out the following:

The content of any document is of material evidential importance only in so far as the document is investigated in its entirety. The diary of the defendant Frank with its 10–12,000 pages is one uniform document. It is improper to put in as evidence certain single entries without showing the context in which alone some of them can be understood. But it is particularly improper—and this infringes the principles of any presentation of evidence—to select from some uniform whole, such as a long speech, a few sentences and put them in as evidence. In Document Book No. II I have listed a few examples of this and hereby refer to them.

As the defendant Frank himself rightly pointed out in the witness box, the diary is a uniform whole; only in its entirety can it be probative and form part of the presentation of evidence I have read through that diary of more than 10,000 pages and can only confirm his opinion. And that was why I did not use single entries in presenting my evidence, but put in the whole diary.

If I myself, in presenting evidence, have read certain single entries from the diary, and if in the course of my present address I shall quote a few more passages from it, then, just as in the case of the extracts put forward by the prosecution, their evidential value can certainly only be gauged within the framework of the whole diary.

The following may also be looked upon as having been established by the evidence: As the diaries show, and as is evident in particular from the testimony given by the witnesses Buehler, Boepple and Meidinger, the defendant Frank in his capacity of Governor-General often made two or three improvised speeches in the course of one day.

The extracts from the diary presented by the Prosecution consist for the most part of single sentences from such speeches. If we take into consideration both the temperament of the defendant and his habit of expressing himself in an incisive manner, then that is another reason which tends to reduce the probative value of these extracts from the diary. And we actually do find many diary entries which flatly contradict other entries on the same subject occurring a little earlier or later.

DEFENSE

In connection with the many speeches made by the defendant Frank, the following must not be left out of consideration, and this too may be looked upon as established by the evidence: It was a foregone conclusion that the defendant Frank, as open champion of the idea of a State resting on law and of the independence of the judiciary, would come into increasingly sharp conflict with the representatives of the Police-State System; this developed to an ever greater degree in the course of the war both within the Reich territory and in occupied country. The representatives of the police-state however were Reich Fuehrer SS Himmler and, for the area of the Government-General, the Higher SS and Policeleader East, above all and in particular SS Obergruppenfuehrer and General of Police Krueger. The relations between the defendant Frank on the one hand and Reich Fuehrer SS Himmler and his representative Obergruppenfuehrer Krueger on the other, had been extremely bad even at the time when the Government-General was established. They deteriorated still more as the divergence of outlook concerning the tasks of the police came ever more openly to the fore and the defendant Frank was forced to make increasingly strong protests to the Chief of the Reich Chancellery, Dr. Lammers, and to the Fuehrer himself concerning the violent measures taken by the Security Police and the SD.

As I have already mentioned, the Governor-General, lacking an executive of his own, had on the other hand no choice but to make repeated attempts to coordinate the work of the general administration with that of the police, in order to be in a position to carry out any administrative work at all. Obviously these objectives demanded, at least on the face of things, a degree of conciliation towards the general attitude of the security police and above all of the Higher SS and Policeleader East. Moreover the evidence has further established that the tension existing between the Governor-General and the Higher SS and Policeleader often reached such a degree that the defendant Frank could not but feel himself menaced and, to quote the words of the witness Buehler, was no longer a free agent and master of his own decisions.

The testimony of the witnesses Bach-Zelewsky and Dr. Albrecht leave no possible doubt on this point. Quite rightly therefore the witness Dr. Buehler also pointed out that the defendant Frank expressed himself with particular vehemence when the Higher SS and Policeleader or the Commander in Chief of the Security Police and the SD were present at conferences and that his utterances were made on quite a different note when he was speaking to an audience composed only of members of the administration. Even a cursory inspection of the diary will confirm this. All these circumstances must be taken into consideration in assessing the substantive evidential value of the defendant Frank's diary. It should also be noted that these diaries constituted the only personal property that Frank was able to rescue from the castle at Cracow. On his arrest, he handed all the diaries to the officers who took him into custody. It would have been an easy matter for him to destroy these diaries.

Your Lordships!

I now turn to the separate accusations brought against the defendant and their legal aspects. The defendant Frank is accused of having approved, led and participated in war crimes and crimes against humanity in the administration of occupied territory.

As the law stands, it rests on the principle that only a sovereign state, not an individual, can be a subject of international law. To make international law binding on an individual, international law itself would have to lay down that a certain set of facts constitutes a wrong and that the rule thereby established is applicable to an individual creating such set of facts. Only in that way can individuals, who under the law as it stands are subjected only to municipal criminal law, by way of exception be bound directly by international law.

Deviating from this rule, operative international law, in exceptional cases only, permits a State to punish the national of an enemy State who has fallen into its power if, before his capture, he had been guilty of infringing the rules of war. But even here punishment is excluded if the deed was not committed on the person's own initiative but can only be attributed to his State of allegiance. Moreover, the conception of war crimes and their factual characteristics are the subject of great controversy both in judicial decisions and in legal literature.

Nor do the Hague Rules on Land Warfare, which form the Annex to the IVth Convention on the Laws and Customs of War on Land and purport to be a codification of certain sections of the law of war; nor do these Rules list any sets of facts which could be interpreted as a basis for the criminal liability of individuals. In Article 3 of this Convention it is on the contrary expressly provided that not individuals but the State that has infringed the Rules may under certain circumstances be liable to pay an indemnity and is also responsible for all acts done by persons belonging to its armed forces.

DEFENSE

In connection with the Hague Rules for Land Warfare, of 1907, the following should also be noted:

The principles therein enunciated were evolved from the experience of wars in the 19th Century. Those wars were confined in the main to the armed forces directly concerned in them.

Now, even the first World War overstepped this framework, and not only in respect of the geographical extent of the bellicose conflicts. On the contrary, the war became a struggle for extermination of the nations concerned, a struggle in which each belligerent party utilized the whole of its war potential and all its material and imponderable resources. War technique having been meanwhile brought to perfection point, the second World War was bound to destroy altogether the framework set up for the conduct of war by the Hague Rules for Land Warfare. That is easily shown by ocular demonstration: the present condition of Europe today reveals. If we remember in addition that in Germany alone the greater part of almost every city has been destroyed as a result of bombing raids; and not only that, but that considerably more than a million civilians thereby lost their lives and that in a single major raid on the city of Dresden 300,000 people were killed, then it will be possible to realize that the Hague Rules for Land Warfare (at any rate in respect of many activities coming under the rules of war) can no longer be an adequate expression of the laws and customs to be observed in waging war. But if any doubt should exist on this subject, then that doubt will certainly be removed on contemplation of the consequences of the two atom bombs which razed Hiroshima and Nagasaki to the ground and killed hundreds of thousands of people.

Taking these circumstances into consideration, it is not possible to adduce the provisions of the Hague Rules for Land Warfare, even indirectly and by way of analogy, to establish individual criminal liability.

Seeing that this is the case, it must be looked upon as impossible to give a clear, general definition of the factual characteristics of so-called war crimes. Referring to the fact that even Article 6 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal only purports to furnish a list of examples it will be realized that the question as to whether a certain line of conduct amounts to the commission of a war crime or not, can only be answered on the merits of each particular case and then only if all the circumstances are taken into consideration.

In the course of the presentation of evidence for the personal responsibility of the defendant Frank, the Prosecution submitted as Exhibit USA 609 (864-PS) minutes of a conference held by the Fuehrer with the Chief of the OKW on the future form of Polish relations to Germany. This Conference took place on October 17, 1939. It is alleged that these minutes alone, in which the administrative goals of the defendant Frank in the Government-General are said to be established, reveal a plan or conspiracy at variance with the laws of warfare and humanity. This is an inadmissible conclusion at least in so far as the defendant Frank is concerned. The Prosecution was unable to prove that the Fuehrer entrusted the defendant Frank with a task in conformity with the administrative aims demanded in that conference. Moreover, this seems very unlikely, because the directives laid down at that conference dealt mainly with measures which could only be carried out, not by the general administration, but alone by the Security Police, the SD and the other organs and offices under Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler. In this connection special mention should also be made of the powers entrusted to Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler (before the date of that conference) in his capacity of Reich Commissioner for the Consolidation of the German Nation. Actually there is at the end of document USA-609 a reference to a commission with which Himmler was charged. In consideration of the fact that the defendant Frank, in the course of a short interview with Hitler about the middle of September 1939, had been told to take over the civil administration of occupied Polish territory as Chief of Administration and had not seen Hitler for a very long time after that, it can safely be assumed that the directives laid down at the conference between Hitler and the Chief of the OKW were intended, not for the defendant Frank, but for Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler, who was the only person to have the necessary executive organs at his disposal.

Another document to which the Prosecution has referred and which is also alleged to show the criminality of the administrative aims of the defendant Frank is USA Exhibit 297 (EC 344-16). The content of this document is a discussion which the defendant Frank is said to have had on October 3, 1939, with a certain Captain Varain. The defendant Frank testified in the witness box that he had never made any such or similar statements to an officer. Moreover, a comparison of the dates shows that this conversation, even if it should have taken place, can have no connection with the subject of the conference between the Fuehrer and the Chief of the OKW, the latter not having been held till October 17, 1939, that is at a later date.

DEFENSE

Not within the framework of the evidence presented in connection with the personal responsibility of the defendant Frank, but in connection with the accusation of so-called "Germanization", a document was submitted with the number USA Exhibit 300 (661-PS). This is a memorandum entitled, "Legal aspects of German Policy towards the Poles from the ethno-political point of view." According to a note on the title page, the legal part of this was to serve as a model for the Committee of the Academy for German Law which dealt with legal nationality questions. This document can have no probative value in connection with the personal responsibility of the defendant Frank. He testified in the witness-box that he had given no instructions for the writing of that memorandum and that he was not aware of its content. Over and above this, it would seem that no substantive evidential value can be attached to that document within the scope of this whole trial.

Nor is it evident from the memorandum who wrote it or who gave instructions that it should be written. Its whole form and content would seem to show that it is not an official document, but rather the work of a private individual. It was stated to have been found at the Ministry of Justice in Cassel. But in actual fact there has been no Ministry of Justice at Cassel for many decades. All these circumstances would point to the material probative value of this document as being at least extremely small.

But whatever the evidential value of minutes of conferences that took place in the year 1939 on the occasion of the establishment of the Government General, the following should be pointed out: In judging the conduct of the defendant Frank it is not of such essential importance to know what Hitler, he himself, or other persons said on one occasion or another, but what policy the defendant Frank actually pursued towards the Polish and Ukrainian peoples. And here there can be no possible doubt, on the basis both of the general result of the evidence and in particular of entries in the diary of the defendant himself, that he repudiated all tendencies and measures designed to effect germanization. That is shown with great clarity by the extracts from the diary which I have submitted to the Tribunal. Thus, on March 8, 1940, he declared at a meeting of department chiefs, i.e., to an audience of men who as leaders of the various main departments were deputed to put his directives into practice; at this meeting he declared the following:

"* * * I have been charged by the Fuehrer to look upon the Government-General as the home of the Polish people. Accordingly no germanization of any sort or kind is possible. In your departments you will please see that the two language principle is strictly observed; you will also point out to district and provincial officers that no violence is to be used in opposing such safeguarding of separate Polish existence. We have in a certain sense here-with taken over on trust from the Fuehrer the responsibility for Polish national life * * *."

This declaration alone makes it apparent that the directives laid down in the Conference between Hitler and the Chief of the OKW on October 17, 1939 and contained in document USA 609 (864-PS) cannot possibly have been made the subject of the duties with which the defendant Frank was charged. On the other hand, in view of the entire work done by the Higher SS and Policeleader East from the first day of his appointment, it can safely be assumed that it was Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler whom Hitler charged with carrying out the directives laid down at his conference with the Chief of the OKW.

A diary entry of February 19, 1940 is on the same lines; in this the defendant Frank advocates the formation of a Polish government or regency Council.

On February 25, 1940, at a service conference of department chiefs and district and municipal commanders of the District of Radom, the defendant Frank gave out in program form his directives regarding general administration. On this occasion the defendant Frank said among other things:

"1. The Government-General comprises that part of the occupied Polish area which is not a component part of the German Reich.

"2. The Fuehrer has decreed that this territory is to be the home of the Polish people. The Fuehrer and General Field-Marshal Goering have impressed on me over and over again that this territory is not to be subjected to germanization.

"3. In accordance with the instructions we have received under the Fuehrer's decree Polish laws will remain in force here."

On June 7, 1942 the defendant Frank stated word for word as follows:

"It is not as rulers by violence that we come and go in this country. We have no terroristic or oppressive intentions. Welded into the interests of Greater Germany, the living rights of the Poles and Ukrainians in this territory are also safeguarded by us. We have not taken away from the Poles and Ukrainians either their churches, their schools or their education. The Germans do not wish to denationalize by violent means. We are sufficient unto ourselves, and we know that people must be born into our community and that it is a distinction to belong to it. And that is why we can look the world in the face with this our work."

DEFENSE

These examples could be amplified by many more, which all show clearly that the measures taken, at any rate by Frank, were intended to care for the Polish nation and that he repudiated any terror policy.

I come now to the so-called "peace-enforcing action." When the campaign against Poland had ended in September 1939, that did not mean that all resistance had ceased. Very soon afterwards new centers of resistance sprang up, and when on April 9, 1940, German troops occupied Denmark and Norway and on May 10, 1940, the German Western Army had begun their attack, the leaders of the Polish resistance movement believed that, in consideration of the general political and military situation, the time for action had come. This resistance movement was all the more dangerous because scattered but not inconsiderable remnants of the former Polish Army were active in it. A large number of entries in the diary of the defendant Frank show that the security situation worsened from day to day during that period. Here for instance is an entry for May 16, 1940: "* * * The general war situation requires that the most serious consideration be given to the internal security situation of the Government General. A large number of signs and actions lead one to the conclusion that there exists a widely-organized wave of resistance on the part of the Poles in the country, and that we are on the threshold of violent happenings on a large scale. Thousands of Poles are already organized in secret circles; they are armed and are being incited in the most seditious manner to commit all kinds of violence."

In consideration of this menacing general situation, the order was given, as the diary shows, by the Fuehrer himself, that in the interest of the maintenance of public security, all measures were to be taken to suppress the imminent revolt. That order was given through Himmler to the Higher SS and Policeleader. The administration of the Government-General had at first nothing to do with it. It intervened however, in order as far as possible to prevent the security police and the SD from taking violent measures and to make sure that innocent people should under no circumstances lose their lives. The testimony given by the defendants Frank and Seyss-Inquart in the witness box and the evidence given by the witness Dr. Buehler have shown that the efforts made by the administration of the Government-General were in so far successful as all the members of the resistance movement rounded up by this special action were brought before a drum-head court-martial introduced by a decree issued in the year 1939; and moreover, the decisions of this court were not carried out before being submitted to a Board of Pardon which in many cases modified the sentence. The Chairman of the Pardon Board was, until his appointment as Reich Commissioner for the Netherlands, the defendant Dr. Seyss-Inquart. As his testimony revealed, no less than half the death sentences pronounced by the summary court were commuted to imprisonment by the Pardon Board. For the rest, as regards the so-called extraordinary peace-enforcing action, I refer to the oral testimony and to the extracts from the diary of the defendant Frank which I read into the record.

Within the framework of the charges against him personally, the defendant Frank is accused of having supported the resettlement plans of the Reich Commissioner for the Consolidation of the German nation (Himmler) and of having thereby also committed a war crime. There is no question but that resettlements, even if they are carefully planned and well-prepared, mean great hardship for those who are affected by them; in many cases a resettlement means the destruction of a person's economic existence. Nevertheless it seems doubtful whether the effectuation of resettlements constitutes a war crime or a crime against humanity, for the following reasons:

Germany today is being flooded with millions of people who have been driven from their homes and who own no property but what they carry with them. The misery thereby caused, which is bound to increase to an immeasurable degree in consequence of the devastation wrought by the war, is so terrible that the bishops of the Cologne and Paderborn ecclesiastical districts were moved on March 29, 1946, to bring this state of affairs to the attention of the whole world. Among other things they said:

"* * * Some weeks ago we found occasion to comment on the outrageous happenings in the East of Germany, particularly in Silesia and Sudetenland, where more than 10 million Germans have been driven from their ancestral homes in brutal fashion, no investigation having been made to ascertain whether or not there was any question of personal guilt. No pen can describe the unspeakable misery there imposed in contravention of all consideration of humanity and justice. All these people are being crammed together in the rump of Germany without means to found an existence there. It cannot be foreseen how these masses of people who have been driven from their homes can become other than peace-lacking and peace-disturbing elements."

DEFENSE

My Lords!

I am not mentioning this in order to point out the enormous dangers connected with such measures, dangers which must arise alone out of the fact that in view of her envisaged deprivations of territory, Germany, with an area reduced by 22 percent as compared with 1919, will have to feed a population increased by 18 percent and that in future there will be 200 inhabitants to the square kilometer. I am further not pointing to this state of affairs to show that if the present economic policy is continued and the so-called industrial plan is maintained, Germany is heading for a catastrophe the consequences of which cannot be confined to the German people. The evidential relevance of these facts is however shown by the following:

Millions of Germans were driven from their ancestral homes in accordance with a resolution taken at Potsdam on August 2, 1945, by President Truman, Generalissimo Stalin and Prime Minister Attlee.

[The Russian Chief Prosecutor objected on grounds of irrelevancy and objection was sustained.—Ed.]

The defendant Frank is further accused of having approved and carried out a program for the extermination of Jews of Polish nationality, thereby infringing the laws of war and humanity. It is true that in a number of speeches given by the defendant Frank in his capacity as Governor-General, he revealed his point of view on the Jewish question. The extracts from the diary submitted by the Prosecution in connection with this matter comprise practically everything relevant thereto in the defendant Frank's diary of 10-12,000 typed pages. Nevertheless it shall not be denied that the defendant Frank made no secret of his antisemitic views. He spoke in detail on this question when giving his testimony in the witness box.

But the question of the importance to be attached to the diary entries submitted by the Prosecution is quite another matter. Almost all of them consist of statements made by the defendant Frank in speeches; but there has not even been an attempt by the Prosecution to prove the existence of a causal connection between these statements and the measures carried out against the Jews by the Security Police.

As a result of the evidence, in particular of the testimony given by the witness Dr. Bilfinger and Dr. Buehler it can be looked upon as certain, in connection with the secret Decree concerning the jurisdiction of the Security Police and the SD of the year 1939, and the Decree concerning the transfer of certain tasks to the State Secretary for Security, that all the measures concerning Jews in the Government-General were carried out exclusively by Reich Fuehrer SS Himmler and his organs. That is true both of the initiation and the organization of the so-called final solution of the Jewish question.

As regards the latter, it may be said here on the basis of the testimony given by the witnesses Wisliceny and Hoess and of the documents presented by the Prosecution that these measures were undertaken on Hitler's express orders and that only a small circle of persons was concerned in their execution. This small circle was confined in the main to a few SS leaders of Department IV a 4 b of the RSHA and the personnel of the concentration camps that had been selected for the purpose.

The administration of the Government-General had nothing to do with these measures. The above facts also show that the anti-semitic statements by the defendant Frank submitted by the Prosecution have no causal connection with the so-called final solution of the Jewish question. Since a causal link must be established before the question of illegality and guilt can even be considered, it does not seem necessary to dwell further on the matter. All the less because the factual elements of many punishable offenses can only be said to exist if at least an attempt has been made, that is, if the commission of the offense has at least been begun. Under the principles derived from the criminal law of all civilized nations, the statements contained in the diary of the defendant Frank do not even constitute preparatory acts.

In consideration of the tense and sometimes extremely frangible relationship between the Government-General on the one hand and the Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler and the Higher SS and Police-leader Krueger on the other, it would also seem to be impossible to look upon the statements of the defendant Frank as acts of incitement or complicity. The evidence has shown on the contrary that all the efforts of the defendant Frank to investigate successfully the rumors about the elimination of the Jews, at least within his own administrative district, failed of their purpose. Only to complete the picture need it be mentioned that the concentration camp of Auschwitz was not in the Government-General, but in that part of Poland which was annexed to upper Silesia. For the rest, it can not be clearly seen whether the erection of concentration camps is in itself to be looked on as fulfilling the requirements of a war crime or a crime against humanity, or whether the Prosecution considers the establishment of such camps solely as part of the so-called common plan. Setting aside the crimes committed in the concentration camps, and considering the nature of concentration camps to be that in them people are confined for reasons of state and police security on account of their political opinions and without an opportunity of defending themselves in an ordinary court of law, it appears at least doubtful whether an occupying Power should not have the right to take such necessary steps as this in order to maintain public order and security. Apart from the fact that it was not National Socialists and not Germans at all who first established such camps, the following must be mentioned.

DEFENSE

According to a statement dated January 14, 1946, by General Lucius D. Clay, Deputy Commander of the zone in Germany occupied by American troops, 250,000 to 300,000 people in that zone were at that time being detained on account of their political opinions. Obviously the occupying Power was convinced that the detention of such a large number of politically suspect persons was necessary for reasons of security and did not conflict with the provisions regulating the rights and duties pertaining to the administration of occupied territory particularly as expressed in the Hague Rules for Land Warfare.

[Dr. Kempner, U. S. associate counsel, objected on grounds of irrelevancy and objection was sustained.—Ed.]

It is not necessary to go into this matter in more detail here, because the evidence has shown that it was the defendant Frank who from the first day of the National Socialists' assumption of power fought against the police-State system and, above all, stigmatized the concentration camps as an institution which could in no way be made to harmonize with the idea of a state resting on law. In this connection I refer to the testimony given by the witness Dr. Stepp, to the defendant's own statement and above all to the extracts from the defendant's diary which I put in evidence. The evidence has further shown that the establishment and administration of the concentration camps lay within the sphere of Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler's organization. The camps, both in Reich territories and in all areas occupied by German troops, were exclusively under the command of the SS WVHA and/or the Inspector-General of the concentration camps. Neither the Governor-General nor the general administration of the Government-General had anything to do with these camps.

A further point of accusation against Frank is the charge that he supported violence and economic pressure as a means of recruiting workers for deportation to Germany. It is true that during the recent war, many Poles came to work in Germany. But in this connection the following should be noted: Even before the first world war, hundreds of thousands of Poles came to Germany as vagrant workers. This stream of vagrant workers continued to flow in the period between the first and the second world wars. In consequence of the ill-fated demarcation line, the Government-General became an area that was distinctly over-populated. The agricultural superfluity areas had fallen to the Soviet Union, whereas important industrial areas were incorporated in the Reich. Under these circumstances, because there were no riches to be found in the soil, the only valuable means of production lay in the working capacity of the population. And this, at any rate for the first few years, could not be absorbed to a sufficient extent, because the other production factors were lacking. In order to avoid unemployment and above all in the interest of maintaining public order and security, the administration of the Government-General was bound, if only for reasons of state policy, to try to transfer as many workers as possible to Germany. There can indeed be no doubt that during the first years of the administration most of the Polish workers went to the Reich voluntarily. When later, in consequence of the continuous bombing raids, not only Germany's cities, but also her factories crashed in ruins and a not inconsiderable part of Germany's capacity for the production of war material had to be removed to the Government-General for reasons of security, the aim of the defendant Frank was necessarily to put a stop to any further transfer of labor. Over and above this however, the defendant Frank had from the very beginning opposed all violent measures in recruiting labor, and alone for security reasons and in order not to create new centers of unrest, had insisted that no compulsory measures were to be used and only propagandistic methods employed. That is certain, as shown by the testimony of the witnesses Dr. Buehler and Dr. Boepple, and also by a large number of entries in the diary. In my presentation of evidence I have already referred to several of them. Thus, for example, the defendant Frank said among other things on March 4, 1940: "* * * I refuse to issue the decree demanded by Berlin, establishing compulsory measures and threatening punishment. Measures that viewed from the outside would create a sensation must be avoided under all circumstances. There is everything to be said against the removal of people by violence."

On January 14, 1944, he made a similar statement to the Commander of the Security Police: "The Governor General is strongly opposed to the suggestion that police forces should be used in recruiting labor." These quotations could be amplified by many more.

I refer further to the evidence presented by me in respect of the treatment of Polish workers in Germany. The defendant Frank continuously and repeatedly pleaded for better treatment of the Polish workers in the Reich.

For the rest, the legal position in the matter of recruiting foreign labor does not appear to be quite clear. I do not intend to go further into the legal questions pertaining to this matter.

DEFENSE

In the literature of international law however, it is undisputed that the conception of vital stress (Notstand) as recognized in criminal law, would, in international law too, preclude illegality in the case of a violation of law committed within that framework.

If the vital interests of a State are endangered, the State may, these interests being paramount, safeguard them if necessary by injuring the just interests of a third party. Even those writers who deny the application of the "vital stress" theory to international law—they are in the minority—grant the threatened state the "right of self-preservation" and therewith the right to enforce "necessities of State" even at the cost of the just interests of other states. It is a recognized principle of international law that a state need not wait until the direct threat of extinction is at its very threshold. There can be no doubt that after the entry into the war of the United States, with which for all practical purposes the productive capacity and the military might of almost the whole world were gathered together to overthrow Germany, the German Reich was faced with a situation which not only threatened the State as such with extinction, but over and above that placed the bare existence of the people in jeopardy. Under these circumstances the right of the state leadership to make use of labor forces, even those in occupied territory, in this defensive struggle had to be acknowledged.

In addition, the following should not be passed over: The prosecution alleges that many, if not most of the foreign workers were brought to Germany by force and that they were then obliged to do heavy labor under degrading conditions. However one may look upon the evidence on this question, the fact cannot be ignored that there are hundreds of thousands of foreign workers still living in Germany who were allegedly deported thither by force. They refuse to return to their homes, although no one now attempts to hinder them. Under these circumstances it must be assumed that the force cannot have been as great, nor the treatment in Germany as bad as is alleged by the Prosecution.

Another allegation refers to the closing of the schools. It may be left out of account whether international law recognizes any criminal classification which would make the closing of schools appear as a war crime or a crime against humanity. In time of war this would seem to be all the more unlikely as it is well-known that schooling in war time was considerably reduced, not only in Germany, but in many other belligerent countries. There is all the less reason to investigate this question more thoroughly, as the evidence has shown that the schools were for the most part already closed when the defendant assumed office as Governor-General. During his whole period of office he left no means untried to reactivate not only the elementary and technical, but also the higher forms of schools. In this connection I will only mention the University courses which he initiated.

The Soviet Prosecution has presented as USSR Exhibit 335 a decree issued by the defendant to combat attacks against German reconstruction work in the Government General, dated October 2, 1943. There is no question but that this decree setting up a drum-head court martial is not in conformity with what must be demanded of Court procedure under normal circumstances. This decree can only be judged correctly if the circumstances which led to its promulgation are taken into consideration.

In general it should first be said that the reconstruction work of the administration of the Government General had to be carried on in a difficult territory and under circumstances which must be among the most difficult that have ever fallen to the lot of any administration. After the collapse of the Polish State, the German administration found so to speak an empty space in which to organize and administer. In all spheres of administration they had to start completely afresh. If in spite of the difficulties they succeeded fairly quickly in removing war damage, particularly in the communications system, then that is incontestably to their credit.

The year 1940 was however to prove the only one in which the work of restoration in the area of the Government-General could be carried out under fairly normal conditions. As the year 1941 opened, the Germans began to concentrate their troops for action against the Soviet Union, and therewith initiated a period of immense strain for the administration of the Government-General. The Government-General became the greatest repair workshop and the greatest military transit territory that history has ever known. This carried in its train an increasing deterioration of the security situation. The resistance movement began to reorganize on an intensified scale. But the menace inherent in the security situation developed to a still more alarming degree when the German armies were forced to arrest their progress in Russia and when, after the catastrophe of Stalingrad, their march forward was transformed into a general retreat. In the course of the year 1943, the activities of the resistance movement and in particular of the numerous guerilla bands in which thousands of a-social elements were grouped, reached extremes that represented a danger to any kind of orderly administration. The administration of the Government-General was forced again and again to deal with this matter. Thus on May 31, 1943, a service meeting of the government of the Government-General was held to deal with the security situation.

DEFENSE

At that meeting the President of the Chief Department Internal Administration felt obliged to state among other things (I quote from the Diary) :

"* * * In their activities the guerilla bands have revealed an increasingly well-developed system. They have now gone over to the systematic destruction of institutions belonging to the German administration; they steal money, procure typewriters and reduplication machines; destroy quota-lists and lists of workers in the communal offices, and take away or burn criminal records and taxation lists. Moreover raids on important production centers in the country have multiplied, for instance on saw mills, dairies and distilleries, as also on bridges, railway installations and Post Offices. The organization of the guerillas has become strongly military in character."

In the course of the Summer and Autumn of the year 1943, the increasing activities of the partisans and the improvement in their military organization and equipment so endangered security in the Government-General that it might perhaps under the circumstances have been better to turn over its entire administration to the appropriate army commanders, and to proclaim martial law. It is indeed not possible to describe the conditions then existing in the Government-General as anything else but a state of war. It was the period when at any moment the possibility had to be taken into account that a general revolt would break out over the whole country.

All this notwithstanding, the defendant Frank even then made every effort to thwart any violent measures by the security police and the SD under all circumstances. It was in order to exercise at least a modifying influence on the security police and the SD and to have at least some guarantee against excesses that the defendant Frank agreed to the order dated October 9, 1943, setting up a drumhead court martial.

As is quite obvious from the content of this decree, its main purpose was to serve as a general preventive. It was meant as a deterrent to the guerillas, and there can be no question but that in this it was temporarily successful. For the rest, the evidence has shown that even while this drumhead court martial Order was in operation, the Pardon Boards continued to act and that many sentences passed by the drumhead court martial were reversed by the Pardon Boards.

In the course of the present trial repeated mention has been made of the report by SS Brigadefuehrer Stroop concerning the destruction of the Warsaw Ghetto in the year 1943. USA Exhibit 275 (1061-PS). Both that report and a number of other documents reveal that all the measures in connection with the Warsaw Ghetto were undertaken exclusively on the direct instructions of Reichsfuehrer SS and Chief of German Police Himmler. I refer in this connection to the affidavit of SS Brigadefuehrer Stroop of February 24, 1946, submitted by the Prosecution as USA Exhibit 804 (3841-PS), and to the affidavit of the same date given by the former Aide-de-Camp of the SS and Policeleader of Warsaw, Karl Kaleske. USA Exhibit 803 (3840-PS). These documents show quite clearly that those measures, like all others within the competence of the Security Police and undertaken on direct orders from either Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler, the Higher SS and Policeleader East, or on instructions from the RSHA, were carried out exclusively by the Security Police and the SD, and that the administration of the Government-General had nothing to do with them.

The Soviet Prosecution has also put in evidence as Exhibit USSR-93 under Article 21 of the Charter the report of the Polish Government. That report makes no distinction between the areas which were incorporated in the German Reich and the territories of the former Polish State which were grouped together in the Government General. But with particular reference to the fact that the report makes no substantiated statements as to the personal responsibility of the defendant Frank it does not seem necessary to delve further into this voluminous document. Like the Indictment itself, the report constitutes an accusation of a general nature; it does not deal in detail with the results of investigations and with evidence which might justify the conclusions drawn in the report. The objections to be raised to the report must appear all the more valid, as—to take only one example—in Annex (1) of the report directives for cultural policy are quoted in evidence which are obviously intended to represent instructions given by the Governor-General or his administration. Actually however nothing of the kind is to be found either in the order Gazette of the Government-General or in any other documents. The witness Dr. Buehler stated in his interrogation that the administration of the Government-General had never issued such or similar directives. In consideration of this alone, it would seem at most admissible to attach substantive probative value to this Exhibit USSR 93 insofar as the statements therein made are confirmed by genuine documents and other unobjectionable evidence.

According to the Indictment and in particular according to the statements in the trial brief presented by the Prosecution, the defendant Frank is also alleged to be responsible for the under-nourishment of the Polish population. Actually however the Prosecution is unable to produce any evidence to show that in the area governed by the defendant Frank either hunger catastrophes occurred or epidemics broke out. The evidence has revealed on the contrary that the efforts of the defendant Frank in the years 1939 and 1940 were successful in inducing the Reich to deliver no less than 600,000 tons of grain. That made it possible to overcome the nutrition difficulties caused by the war.

DEFENSE

It is true that in the following years the Government-General contributed in no small degree to the war effort by itself delivering grain. But it should not be overlooked that these deliveries were made possible by an extraordinary increase in agricultural production in the Government-General. And this was in its turn made possible by a farsighted economic policy, especially by the distribution of agricultural machinery, seed corn and so on. Nor should it be forgotten that the deliveries of grain by the Government-General from the year 1941 onwards, also served to feed the Polish workers placed in Reich territory, and that in general these grain deliveries were utilized to maintain the internal balance as between the European economic systems.

On this question the following basic observations should, however, be made:

In a number of points of accusation the Prosecution has levelled reproaches against the administrative activities of the defendant Frank in his capacity as Governor-General, without making an attempt to give an even approximately adequate description of the general work of the defendant, and without pointing out its inherent difficulties. There can be no question but that such an attitude transgresses the fundamental rules of any criminal procedure. It is a recognized principle derived from the criminal law principles of all civilized states that a uniform natural process must be judged in its entirety and that its evaluation must rest on all the circumstances of the case that are in any way suitable for consideration by the Court when passing judgment. This would seem to be all the more necessary in the present case as the defendant Frank is accused of having pursued a long-term policy of oppression, exploitation and germanization.

My Lords!

If the defendant Frank had in truth had any such intentions, then he could certainly have attained his goal in far simpler fashion. It would not have been necessary to issue hundreds of decrees every year, decrees which for example for the year 1942 reached the proportions of this volume that I hold here in my hand. The defendant Frank from his first day of office set himself to integrate all the economic forces in the area under his rule and pursued in particular an economic policy which one can only call constructive. Certainly he did this partly in order to strengthen the production capacity of the German nation engaged in a struggle of life and death. But just as little can there be any doubt that the success of this measure also benefited the Polish and Ukrainian peoples. I do not intend to go into this matter in detail. I will only ask the Tribunal in this connection to take notice of the Report given by the Chief of Government on the occasion of the 4th anniversary of the existence of the Government-General on October 26, 1943. I have included this Report in the Document Books I put in evidence. It is in volume IV, page 42. The Report gives a concise summary of the measures taken and the successes achieved by the administrative acts of the defendant during those four years in all fields of industrial economy, in agriculture, commerce and transport, in finance and credit system, in the sphere of public health and so on. Only in consideration of all these facts is it possible to form an approximately correct estimate of the whole position. By way of marginal note I will add that the defendant by his administration succeeded in reducing the danger of epidemics, in particular typhus and typhoid, to a degree which had been found impossible in this area in the preceding decades.

If much of what had been achieved by the defendant Frank in the Government-General was destroyed in the subsequent fighting, that can certainly furnish no grounds for reproach against the general administration, which had nothing to do with military measures.

My Lords!

I am certainly not going to deny that in the course of the recent war terrible crimes were committed in the territory known as the Government-General. Concentration camps had been established, in which mass destruction of human beings was carried out. Hostages were shot. Expropriations took place, and so on. The defendant Frank would be the last to deny this; he himself waged a five-year struggle against all violent measures. The Prosecution has put in evidence as USA Exhibit 610 (437-PS) a memorandum which Frank addressed to the Fuehrer on June 19, 1943. In this memorandum on page 11 he listed 9 points in which he sharply condemned all the evils which had arisen in consequence of the violence practised by the Security Police and the SD and of the excesses committed by various Reich authorities, violence and excesses against which all his efforts had proved unavailing. These 9 points are in the main identical with the points of accusation against Frank. The content of the memorandum of June 19, 1943, however, shows very plainly that the defendant denies responsibility for these abuses. It reveals, on the contrary quite clearly that neither the defendant nor the general administration of the Government-General can be held responsible for the said evils, but that the whole responsibility must be borne by the institutions mentioned above, in particular the Security Police and the SD, and/or the Higher SS and Policeleader East. If the defendant Frank had had the instruments of power wherewith to abolish the evils he condemned, it would not have been necessary for him to address that memorandum to Hitler at all. He would then himself have been able to take all necessary steps. In addition to this the evidence has shown that the memorandum of June 19, 1943, was not the only one addressed to the Fuehrer on the matter. It is clear from the testimony of the witnesses Dr. Lammers and Dr. Buehler and the defendant's own statements in the witness box that from the year 1940 onwards he (the defendant) sent protests and memoranda at regular intervals of a few months both to Hitler personally and to the Chief of the Reich Chancellery. These written protests were invariably on the subject of the violent measures taken and the excesses committed by the Higher SS and Policeleader and the Security Police including the SD. But none of the protests met with success.

As can also be said on the basis of the evidence, the defendant Frank continually made suggestions to Hitler on the subject of improving relations between the administration of the Government-General and the population. The memorandum of June 19, 1943, too is cast in the form of a comprehensive political program. It includes moreover all the essential points of protest contained in a memorandum presented in February 1943 to the Governor-General at his own desire, by the leader of the Ukrainian Chief Committee. This latter memorandum was put in evidence by the Prosecution as USA Exhibit 178 (1526-PS). Such suggestions were also consistently rejected by Hitler.

Under these circumstances it is pertinent to ask what else the defendant Frank could have done. Certainly he should have resigned. But that too he did. He offered his resignation no less than 14 times, the first time as early as 1939. His resignation was rejected by Hitler as often as it was tendered. But the defendant Frank did more. He approached Field-Marshal Keitel with the request that he be allowed to rejoin the Wehrmacht as lieutenant. That was in the year 1942. Hitler refused his consent to that too. These facts allow of only one conclusion, namely that Hitler saw in the defendant Frank a man behind whose back he (with the help of Himmler and the organs of the Security Police and the SD) could carry out the measures he considered requisite for attaining the aims of his power policy.

My Lords!

One thing the defendant Frank certainly did not do. He did not join the ranks of traitors to his country. He had no part in any scheme which had as its object the elimination of Hitler and which attempted to achieve that object by means which from the outset could only have been designated as ineffective. On the other hand, the defendant Frank undertook something else.

When it became more and more obvious that Hitler and Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler were about to abolish the last remnants of a state resting on law; when it became increasingly apparent that the power of the police knew no bounds and that a police-state of the purest water was in process of development, the defendant Frank came forward and addressed four great speeches to the German public with a last appeal on behalf of the idea of a state resting on law. He did that when Hitler stood at the summit of his power. He addressed this appeal to the German public at a time when the German forces were marching on Stalingrad and into the Caucasus, when the German panzer armies in Africa stood at El Alamein, barely 100 km from Alexandria. In the course of the evidence I read some extracts from these great speeches which the defendant Frank made in Berlin, Heidelberg, Vienna and Munich. Those speeches contained a clear repudiation of every form of police-state and championed the idea of the State resting on law, of the independence of the judiciary and of law as such. These speeches found a tremendous echo among lawyers, but unfortunately not in wider circles. Nor in particular were they echoed by the men who alone would have possessed the power to ward off the threatening catastrophe.

The consequences of this attempt to avert the extinction of the idea of the state resting on law by a last great effort are well-known. The defendant Frank was deprived of all his Party Offices, he was dismissed from his post as President of the Academy for German Law. The leadership of the National Socialist Lawyer's Association was conferred on Reich Minister of Justice Thierack. Frank himself was forbidden by Hitler to speak in public. Although the defendant Frank again on this occasion sent in his resignation as Governor-General, Hitler refused to accept it, as he had always done before. The reason for this, as given in a letter from the Reich Minister and Chief of the Reich Chancellery to the defendant Frank, was that considerations of foreign policy had caused the Fuehrer again to refuse this latest request of Frank to be allowed to resign. According to everything that has emerged from the evidence in this trial it may be looked upon as certain that it was not only (and probably not even mainly) for such reasons that Hitler refused to accept Frank's resignation.

DEFENSE

The decisive factor was obviously the consideration that it was better policy not to let the security police and Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler's other organs fulfill their appointed task openly, but rather to let them continue their work under cover, while maintaining a general civil administration under the Governor-General.

Naturally this open breach between the defendant Frank on the one hand, and Hitler and the state police system represented by Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler and the Higher SS and Policeleader East on the other, could not fail to have repercussions on the position of the defendant in his capacity as Governor-General. Still more than before the various Reich authorities now began to interfere in the administration of the Government-General. Above all however, it was quite clear from the summer of 1942 onwards that the Higher SS and Policeleader East, together with the organs of the Security Police and SD subordinated to him, took no more notice at all of any instructions issued by the Governor-General and the general administration.

Both in the Government-General and in the Reich itself legal institutions receded more and more into the background. The State was transformed into an unadulterated police-state, and developments took the inevitable course which the defendant Frank had foreseen and feared, the course which on November 19, 1941, he had outlined at a Congress of the principal section chiefs and Reich Group leaders of the National Socialist Lawyers Association in the following words:

"Law cannot be degraded to a position where it becomes an object of bargaining. Law cannot be sold. It is either there or it is not there. Law cannot be marketed on the Stock Exchange. If the law finds no support, then the State too loses its moral prop and sinks into the depths of night and horror."

2. FINAL PLEA by Hans Frank

May it please the Tribunal:

Adolf Hitler, the name predominant in this Trial, has not made, to all the German people in the world, his final statement. He in the deepest distress of his nation did not find a comforting word. He became rigid, and he did not take care of his position as a Fuehrer, but he disappeared into the dark through his suicide. Maybe it was stubbornness; maybe it was despair; or stubbornness against God and men. Perhaps he thought that he himself must perish, then the German people too may fall to the abyss. Who will ever know?

We,—and if I now speak in the term of we, then I mean myself and these National Socialists who will agree with me in this conviction, and not these fellow defendants on whose behalf I am not entitled to speak—we must surrender the German nation to its State without a word and in the same way. We merely want to say now, you will have to see to it how you can deal with this collapse with which we leave you. Even now, even today, and perhaps like never before, we have tremendous spiritual responsibility.

At the beginning of this long way of ours we did not think that the turning away from God would have such disastrous deathly consequences and that, as a matter of course, we might one day be involved deeply in this guilt. At that time we could not have known that so much faith and so much will to sacrifice on the part of the German people could have been so badly administered by us.

Thus, by turning away from God, we have come into shame and we had to perish. It was not because of technical deficiencies and unfortunate circumstances that we have lost this war, nor was it misfortune and treason. God, most of all, has passed sentence on Hitler and carried it out against him and the system which we served, far away from God as we were. Thus may our people be called back from the Road on which we and Hitler have led them.

I beg our people that they may not come to a standstill in this development, that they may not proceed in that direction, not with one single step; because Hitler's road was the way without God, the way of refusing to believe in Christ, and, in its final point, the way of political foolishness, the way of disaster, and the way of death. His walk, more and more, became the walk of a frightful adventurer without conscience, without honesty, as I know it today at the end of this trial.

We, the former bearers of power, call upon the German people to return from this road which, according to God's justice had to lead us into disaster and which will lead into disaster every one who would try to walk on it, or continue on it everywhere in this whole world.

Over the graves of the millions of dead of this frightful second world war this state trial occurred, lasting for many months, as the central, legal sequence. Their spirits and ghosts drifted across this room accusingly.

DEFENSE

I am grateful that I was given the possibility of a defense and with that the possibility of justification against the accusations raised against me.

I remember all the victims of force and horror of the dreadful events of war. Did not millions have to perish without ever being asked and ever being heard? I have surrendered the war diary dealing with my statements and activities, and that at an hour when I lost my liberty. If I really once have been hard, then it was at that moment of the unveiling of my actions in the war and everything that I have done.

I do not wish to leave behind me in this world the hidden guilt undealt with.

In the witness stand I have assumed responsibility for all those things for which I must be responsible. I also recognized that degree of guilt which it must be my part to assume as a fighter for Adolf Hitler, his movement, and his Reich. I have nothing to add to the words of my defense counsel.

There is yet one word which I have to rectify, spoken by me.

In the witness stand I mentioned a thousand years, which would not suffice to erase the guilt brought upon our people because of the actions of Adolf Hitler. Not only the activities of our opponents, carefully kept away from these proceedings, with reference to our people and our soldiers, but also tremendous masses of the most awful crimes, I have only now heard, have been committed, mostly in East Prussia, Silesia, Pomerania and the Sudetenland by Russians, Poles, and Czechs against Germans, and are still being committed. They have, even today completely balanced any possible guilt on the part of our people.

Who is to judge these crimes committed against the German people, one day?

With the certain hope that from all the horror of the time of war and all the developments even threatening today perhaps a lasting peace may yet arise in which even our nation may have its beneficial participation, I come to the end of my final statement.

God's eternal justice will be the force under which our people will flourish and to which alone I submit.

X. WILHELM FRICK

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Otto Pannenbecker, Defense Counsel

Mr. President, Gentlemen of the Tribunal:

The prosecution has charged defendant Frick with criminal actions according to Article 6, items a, b, and c of the Statute.

I should like first to examine the question whether Art. 6 of the Statute, with the series of penal cases contained therein, is to be considered as the authoritative criterion of the actual penal law which shall state, in a manner irrevocably binding for the Tribunal, those actions that are to be regarded as criminal, or whether Art. 6 of the Statute concerns a rule of procedure defining the competence of this Tribunal for specific situations.

This latter concept has been implied in the prosecution's exposition of the case by Sir Hartley Shawcross's remark that Art. 6 fills a gap in international penal procedure but that the actual penal law to be applied to the defendants has already been previously standardized by positive laws. Equally to the point is Part II of the Statute, beginning with Art. 6 and entitled: "Competence and general principles," and it may be inferred therefrom that Art. 6 purports to establish a ruling as to the competence of this Tribunal to engage in a procedure for specific series of crimes.

Sir Hartley Shawcross's statements were directed against the objection that it is inadmissible and in contradiction with a basic legal principle, to punish someone for an act which had not yet been forbidden at the time of its perpetration; an objection which has as a basis the conception that the Statute has created a new material penal law with retroactive effect.

It must be tested if the interdiction of retroaction of penal laws is so important a legal principle that it should not be infringed. I need not state to the Court the reasons for which this legal principle found general recognition in all civilized countries, as a presupposition and a basic precept of Justice.

In contradiction to this the Prosecution has in its speech charged the defendants with the fact that they themselves had continuously disregarded law and justice, and inferred from this that the defendants in this trial could not as far as they were concerned appeal to such a legal principle. I do not believe, however, that such an argument can be decisive in these legal proceedings.

The prosecution has denied the still more far reaching question if it would not have been better to repay a person with the same coin and not give the defendants of this trial any possibility at all to defend themselves in an ordered legal procedure. However such an attitude, simply to apply the power of the victor on the defendants, has purposely not been assumed by the signatory powers for reasons presented in detail by the prosecution. On the contrary, Sir Hartley Shawcross has appealed to the Tribunal to use in this procedure, I quote, "the undisputable basis of international custom."

DEFENSE

However, if one is to proceed in such a manner, then a trial must ensue according to equal principles of law in reference to the question whether the deeds with which the defendant is incriminated are to be regarded as criminal action for which, according to the recognized basis of international custom, punishment is possible. On the basis of international principles of law, there should be no argument if the use of a fundamental law, as is the prohibition of a retroactive law, in its application is to be made dependent on whether or not the defendants concerned themselves with justice and injustice. The decision of the signatory powers, on the basis of considerations which have been seriously weighed to subject the conduct of the defendants to a judicial examination observing all principles of international custom, signifies not only the adherence to legal procedure equipped with all assurances for fair trial, but this decision by the signatory powers also signifies the observance of the fundamental principles of a materialistic guarantee of justice and to these principles belongs the prohibition of retroactive laws.

In this connection I should also like to point to the fact that the decreeing of the retroactive validity of penal laws, when so ordered by the National Socialist government for certain, individual cases, aroused horror in the entire civilized world. At that time, the violation of such a principle of law was generally condemned as a deplorable retrogression in culture.

I also ask the Tribunal to bear in mind that one of the first measures taken by the occupation powers for delivery from National Socialist abuses of law, was to declare void any laws instituting retroactive application of the substantive penal code.

In view of this situation, there exist valid reasons, I believe, which argue that according to its caption, Article 6 of the Charter be regarded an agreement on the jurisdiction of this Tribunal, all the more so as the signatory powers have already and with so much emphasis gone on record for a strict and uniform reobservation of the prohibition against retroactive penal laws.

On the basis of such an interpretation, whereby Article 6 establishes the jurisdiction of this Tribunal, it is up to the Tribunal, through its own decision not only to determine whether the charges on which the indictment is based are substantiated, but also to rule on the legal question as to whether, for the facts established in each case by the prosecution, substantive criminal law provides a law which makes punishment possible. To revert in this way to provisions of substantive criminal law in existence at the time the act was committed does not mean it would be impossible for this Tribunal to call the accused, to account for offenses which are punishable under all circumstances. There are, however, a number of restrictions resulting from this which in the opinion of the defense, however, it would be better to accept rather than to violate a principle so essential to a just procedure as is the prohibition against retroactivity in criminal laws.

I am therefore of the opinion that it is entirely possible and not inconsistent with the need for a just expiation for actual war crimes to interpret Article 6 according to its caption as an agreement on the jurisdiction of this court to try criminal cases but not as a new kind of substantive criminal law.

[Defense Counsel omitted material pertaining to conspiracy since it had been pleaded by Dr. Stahmer.—Ed.]

The Charter does not compel the interpretation that a defendant is responsible also for such acts of commission as exceed the measure of his participation in the common plans. The wording of the Charter "in the execution of a common plan" does not contradict the interpretation that the Charter establishes responsibility for acts of commission which remained within the scope of the plan discussed.

The acceptance of responsibility for the actions of others corresponds to an equal extent to a judicial precept, but beyond it would violate essential legal principles.

The defense therefore advocates the conception that, as far as the actions of others are concerned and for which a defendant is supposed to be liable, the proof cannot be foregone that these actions, in the manner of their execution, have corresponded to the intention of the defendant.

To give an example:

The participation of a defendant in rearmament against the regulations of the Versailles Treaty does not in itself justify the assumption that this defendant has also desired a war of aggression, which was later on planned by others, in the further shaping of the plan to mobilize the German people.

I should like now to refer to the separate groups of crimes charged against the defendant Frick and namely first, the assertion of the prosecution that the defendant participated in the planning and preparation of wars of aggression. With regard to the problem, as to whether a war of aggression is a criminal offense according to the concepts of law for the period in question, I refer, in order to avoid repetitions, to the statements of Professor Jahrreiss, with which, in the name of the defendant Frick, I completely agree.

In virtue of these convincing statements, there is only one possibility of punishing cooperation in a war of aggression as a criminal offense that can be perpetrated by single persons, if, namely, in opposition to the statements of Sir Hartley Shawcross, the Charter is applied as a rule of substantive penal law, which has for the first time, formulated with retroactive effect that a war of aggression is a criminal offense by individual persons. Considering the other interpretation, which regards Article 6 of the Charter as a procedural regulation on jurisdiction of this court, the defense holds that the deduction is cogent that the court is indeed declared competent to judge offenses against peace, but that so far a criminal guilt of the individual defendants is not proven, because one condition for this is lacking, namely, the possibility of establishing that the defendants have offended against a principle of generally valid international custom or national law which characterized the war of aggression at the time of their act and declared it punishable as a crime of which a single individual could be guilty. For the statesmen during the period between the two world wars neglected to establish adequate measures of general validity by which it would have been made clear that anybody who after the first awful slaughter of nations organized second world war would run about with a rope around his neck.

DEFENSE

The corresponding statements of the prosecution that such rules of international law are necessary, are absolutely compelling, but the fact cannot be overlooked that such rules, however, were not created at the right time.

A missing rule of law cannot be subsequently cut out for a special case, and replaced by an order of procedure or by the sentence of a court, whose task is to apply the general law, but not to create for a single special case. I shall now turn to the actual statements of the prosecution concerning a participation by the defendant Frick in the planning and preparation of wars of aggression.

The prosecution sees such an activity in Frick's earliest cooperation with the Party which he continued until the year 1933, in order to bring Hitler to power.

The prosecution appraises in a similar way the subsequent activity of Frick after the taking over of the government by Hitler, when he worked to consolidate the power of the Party and its leader through measures of domestic policy especially by his participation to the legal measures, by which an armed force (Wehrmacht) was created, against the stipulations of the Treaty of Versailles, and finally his collaboration in measures by which direct preparations were made in case of war.

Proceeding from the interpretation that only a deliberate participation of the defendant in the preparation of a war of aggression is of penal importance, I shall now enter upon the question as to whether the prosecution has proved that the defendant recognized his by collaboration in the advancement of the Party and its aims as a preparation for war, and wanted it to be so, and therefore deliberately helped to bring about war himself.

In this connection the prosecution has stated that Hitler and his Party from the very beginning openly pursued the aim of bringing about a change in the foreign political situation of Germany, by means of war.

On the basis of this statement the prosecution has declared that no special proof is necessary that each of the defendants, in working for Hitler and his Party, also knowingly collaborated in the preparation of a war of aggression.

As proof that Hitler and his Party had from the beginning planned a war of aggression, the prosecution refers to the Party program, which names as one of its crimes, the abolition of the Treaty of Versailles. With not one word, however, is it said in the Party program that this aim should be achieved by force of arms.

From the Party program, however, as well as it has appeared, among others, from the testimony of the defendant von Neurath, there is nothing to prove an intention existing from the very beginning to wage a war of aggression. Nothing different is found in the official publications of the Party from the time of Hitler's assumption of the government.

As the Party did not, on the basis of its official publication, reveal the intention to compel the revision of the Treaty of Versailles by force of arms, it was therefore, ever before 1933 permitted outside the territory of the Reich, as in the year 1930 in Danzig with the assent of the High Commissioner of the League of Nations and of the Polish President.

Since the time of his assumption of power on January 30th 1933, Hitler as responsible head of the Government, took a quite unequivocal attitude in regard to the ways and aims of his foreign policy, whether in official speeches and discourses or in private conversations.

Unchangingly and upon every occasion he has, since his access to power, stressed his unconditional will for peace and his abhorrence of war, and he always defended this attitude with convincing reasons. He repeated again and again that he intended to obtain certain revisions of the Versailles treaty by peaceful means only.

I need not repeat the appropriate quotations from Hitler's speeches, which already have been submitted by the prosecution, to prove to what extent Hitler deceived the world and the people he ruled by his peace speeches, which were repeatedly supported by a peal of church bells to increase their effectiveness.

DEFENSE

And the world, including the German people has taken seriously these speeches which he, as responsible Government chief, made again and again.

Warning voices which at an early stage became convinced that Hitler wanted war remained, however, a hopeless minority throughout the world.

The Prosecution has repeatedly stressed this world belief which took Hitler's assertions of peaceful intentions seriously, and the best proof of this peace delusion of even the foreign statesmen who also knew the Party's program, lies certainly in the fact that these statesmen neglected to such a great extent to create defensive armaments against Hitler's war of aggression. Nobody in Germany and in the world who was not directly initiated into Hitler's most secret plans seriously believed in it.

From the Party program and from isolated wild speeches, made before 1933 in the period of parliamentary opposition, it is not possible to prove a continuous preparation for a war of aggression since the twenties, supposedly discernible by anybody who looked the Party program through. The Prosecution now pretends further that, even if the warlike intentions were not discernible in a general way, the intention of Hitler to prepare a war of aggression must have been clearly visible to defendant Frick by reason of the duties which the latter fulfilled since January 30th 1933 in his capacity as Reich Minister for the Interior.

These duties included measures towards the strengthening of the political power of Hitler and his Party at home. In this connection the Prosecution referred to the collaboration of Frick in the legal decrees by means of which the opposition against Hitler's system of government was destroyed in parliament and in the country, further the legislative measures which eliminated a true self-administration in the cities and rural communities, furthermore legislative and administrative decrees by which opponents of the National Socialist system were excluded from taking any part in the business of the State and in economic life.

The prosecution has submitted that, without these measures, Hitler could not have conducted another war, the beginning of which, promising such success, presupposed of necessity a complete destruction of opposition in the country and the establishment of the absolute dictatorship of Hitler.

Yet in all the measures I have enumerated, any direct connection with the preparation for war is lacking.

These measures had also their meaning and significance without any connection with a forthcoming war, if considered purely as projects on a National Socialist domestic policy. It has not been proved whether the defendant Frick had furthermore been informed of Hitler's further plans after a strengthening of power at home and for pursuing the aims of their foreign policy of the party by other than peaceful means, but to enforce them by war.

By establishing retrospective facts that the increase of his domestic authority was Hitler's presupposition for his later known war intentions, nothing has been achieved unless the proof is forthcoming, that Hitler had from the beginning aimed at authoritative power in the domestic sphere as a first step toward the carrying on of war, and that Frick was aware of this when he took part in the activities of the internal policy of which he was in charge.

Furthermore: as they were purely domestic measures, according to the provisions of the Charter, they do not come under the jurisdiction of this Tribunal.

There is no true evidence, and it must be admitted that Frick as a typical Home Office civil servant considered his measures as absolutely independent drives with us the scheme of domestic policy, which however had nothing whatsoever to do with the solutions by force of questions of foreign policy.

Neither does another view of the situation derive from the measures dealing directly with Germany's rearmament, i.e., the reintroduction of general conscription and the occupation of the demilitarized zone of the Rhineland.

In his capacity as Reich Minister for the Interior, the defendant issued the orders of the civil administration for the recruitment of men liable for military service, and he therefore himself signed the Armed Forces Law.

But these measures by themselves could not be considered preparative ones for a war of aggression.

The reintroduction of compulsory military service and the resumption of military sovereignty over the demilitarized Western Zone, was explained by Hitler himself to his collaborators and the world by arguments. The reasoning of which was then widely accepted, and after the first shock many foreign statesmen still believed in Hitler's well-founded assurances of peace, and advocated the presumption that there was no reason to fear any belligerent intentions of Hitler. I refer to the document 789-PS-USA Exhibit 23, according to which on 23 November 1939 Hitler personally declared to his Commanders-in-Chief that he had created the Wehrmacht in order to make war.

DEFENSE

But Hitler cleverly obscured this intention by another argumentation which even at that time still found credence in Germany and abroad and, as proved by the evidence, even his collaborators in his own Cabinet who had not been initiated into his secret plans, believed in it.

It thus happens that several defendants refer to the fact that they agreed in the reconstruction of the German Wehrmacht, though contrary to the provisions of the Versailles Treaty, but that they never wanted another war and did not consider that by collaborating they would contribute to the planning of a war of aggression.

As to the defendant Frick: According to the conception of his defense no proof was given that Hitler had informed him of his belligerent plans, and he therefore cannot be charged with collaborating in the reconstruction of the Wehrmacht as an intentional contribution to the planning of a war of aggression.

A similar situation arises from the defendant's activity in establishing the civil administration in general in the event of a possible war, a task with which the defendant was charged as a General Plenipotentiary for the Administration of the Reich by the second Reich Defense Law, dated 4 September 1938.

I beg to emphasize that the position of "General Plenipotentiary for the Administration of the Reich" was only created by the second Reich Defense Law of 4 September 1938, thus had not been included in the first one of 31 May 1935.

Long before, even before 1933 Ministerial Counsellors held conferences dealing with the subject: "Reich defense," and which, since 1933 met at irregular intervals as "Commission for the Defense of the Reich," as stated in the documents submitted by the prosecution. These meetings had nothing to do with an agreement to wage war of aggression, they dealt with general questions of Reich Defense Law of 21 May 1935 the organization for Reich Defense was more closely coordinated, particularly by the appointment of the General Plenipotentiary for the War Economy, and at his interrogation the defendant Schacht explained in detail, that the purpose of his assignment was not preparation for a war of aggression according to the tasks and regulations to be found in the first Reich Defense Law, but the organization of economy for defense, in the event of a war of aggression by other States.

It is not different with the position of the Plenipotentiary General for Reich Administration as it was created by the Reich Defense Law of 4 September 1938 which was delegated to the defendant Frick on the basis of his position as Reich Minister of the Interior.

This position meant the coordinated establishment of the entire civil administration for the purposes of Reich defense. According to documents which have been submitted to the Tribunal, it may have been that Hitler wanted the war at the time when he instigated, but it is nevertheless relevant for the defense of the defendant, whether Frick at that time was able to recognize the aggressive intentions of Hitler from the law itself and from its preliminary work or from other evidence or information which was communicated to him at that time.

The law itself does not allow the recognition of Hitler's intention to use it as an instrument of preparation for war of aggression in the scope of civil life.

The kind of tasks which were given to the defendant Frick in his capacity as Plenipotentiary General for Reich Administration had to do merely with the concentration on the domestic administration of Germany in case of a possible war or of a threat of war.

The mode of expression of the law is such that it speaks only about the defense of the Reich in case of a war. It speaks about the "state of defense" and mentions the case of a "surprise threat to the Reich territory," at which occurrence certain measures must be taken.

On the other hand the law does not indicate by any hint that Hitler himself planned to bring about a war and according to the repeatedly discussed principle of Hitler not to divulge his plans anymore to anyone than the respective person had to know for his own work—which principle was strictly adhered to even with his closest collaborators—it should not be assumed nor has it been proved that when giving the order for this law to the Ministry of Interior anything else was communicated than the requirement to take precautionary measures, by means of concentration of powers of the domestic administration of the country, against the possible attack of the Reich territory by other states.

It is not necessary for me to state in detail, that such a measure cannot be considered as premeditated preparation for a war of aggression when the former is declared essential to the competent agencies of the domestic administration for the defense of the Reich against the threatened attack by another state, which Hitler understood to feign very cleverly for all those who did not need to recognize his secret plans and who nevertheless should understand his armament and the organization of the state ordered by him for case of war.

I will deal now very shortly with some further documents which have as their object the activity of the defendant Frick as Plenipotentiary General for Reich Administration.

DEFENSE

Frick spoke in his speech on 7 March 1940 about this position—Document 2608-PS, USA Exhibit 714—and stated that the planned preparation of the administration for the possible event of a war has been made during the peace by the appointment a Plenipotentiary General for Reich Administration.

This speech therefore merely confirms that which is already revealed by the text of the law.

The same applies to Document 2986-PS, USA Exhibit 409, an affidavit by the defendant to the same effect.

Neither is, therefore, according to this law, the position of the General Plenipotentiary for the Reich Administration as combined with the appointment of a General Plenipotentiary for Economy and the function of the Chief of the OKW, susceptible of reference as a "Triumvirate" holding governmental authority in Germany.

Nothing has ever been known either inside or outside Germany of a government by such a Triumvirate and witness Lammers too has referred to the strictly subordinate tasks performed by these persons by virtue of orders received, tasks which had nothing to do with the preparation of a war of aggression.

Another field of activity of the defendant is likewise taxed by the prosecution as participation in preparation for a war of aggression, namely, Frick's work for the "Association for Maintaining Germanism Abroad." I am referring to Documents Frick Exhibit No. 4 and 3258-PS, the latter submitted as GB 262.

Both documents reveal that Frick supported the said Association and aided its cultural efforts as a union for the promotion of German cultural relations abroad. It cannot, however, be gathered from the documents that Frick extended any activity whatsoever for the furtherance of the aims of a so-called "Fifth Column" abroad.

Another document, from which the prosecution gathered the approval of the policy of the aggressive war by Frick, is the affidavit of Messersmith, 2385-PS, USA Exhibit No. 68. This affidavit has been characterized by several defendants as incorrect and the defendant Schacht in particular demonstrated at his examination that in essential points it cannot be correct at all. The prosecution has not been able to subject the witness to a cross-examination. I raise a protest for Frick against any use of the affidavit, all the more so as an additional clarifying questioning of the witness through written questionnaires only led to the result that the witness by using general phrases avoided giving concrete answers to the questions put to him. The answers in the questionnaires show plainly enough that Messersmith cannot make concrete declaration at all and that he obviously was considerably deceived by his memory in his affidavit. This may be due to his old age. I do not believe that his affidavit, which has been refuted in essential points, can be used for passing legal judgment.

As to the point to be established by evidence, that is whether the defendant Frick participated in conscious preparation for war of aggression, the prosecution submitted a further document, D-44, USA Exhibit 428. From this document it is seen that the Reich Ministry of the Interior is supposed to have given a directive in the year 1933, that official publications are not to be drawn up in a form, which might enable people abroad to infer an infraction of the Versailles Treaty from the publication.

This document does not reveal whether actual treaty violations were to be masked with the directives or whether it was only a matter of avoiding the appearance of treaty violations. The same problem exists for Document 1850-PS, USA Exhibit 742. This is the minutes of a conference between the Staff of the S.A. (Storm Troops) and the Reich Defense Minister, who proposed to the SA in the year 1933 to have the budgetary funds of the Reich designated by the Reich Ministry of the Interior for the military training of the SA.

The document does not throw any light upon the attitude of the Reich Ministry of the Interior towards this proposal and if they had accepted same, this again would have proved only that the Reich Ministry of the Interior furthered the Restoration of the Wehrmacht, a fact which, moreover, is already proved.

Thus, all these documents do not furnish proof that the defendant Frick recognized as a preparation for war of aggression the measures ordered by Hitler as necessary for the defense of the Reich.

During the war, in the year 1941, a few days before the start of the war with the Soviet Union, a conference certainly took place between the defendant Rosenberg and representatives of the ministries concerning measures in case of a possible occupation of territories of the Soviet Union.

This is shown in document 1039-PS, USA Exhibit 146, Rosenberg's report concerning these discussions in which is stated that negotiations took place with "Reich Minister Frick (State Secretary Stuckart)." These parentheses mean that the Reich Ministry of the Interior was represented in these negotiations by State Secretary Stuckart, therefore that Frick did not personally participate in the negotiations. Since the negotiations took place only a few days before the beginning of the war in the East, it is not proven by the document that Frick himself was informed yet about the negotiations before the beginning of the war, which was then, as it is generally known, proclaimed by Hitler as a necessary measure of defense against an imminent attack by the Soviet Union. It has been clarified by numerous proofs in this trial how much Hitler kept his true aggressive intentions secret, and understood generally how to cover up the true aim of all his political measures throughout the years with thousands of convincing reasons with which he justified the individual measures of his policy of aggression.

DEFENSE

There was a very small circle of assistants which Hitler informed about his war plans, but this circle was not selected according to the position of the person concerned in the cabinet or according to his position in the party hierarchy, but exclusively from the viewpoint whether the person concerned had to know the aggressive character of Hitler's general policy or even his detailed plans of aggression in respect to his own tasks in the framework of the preparation of the war.

Document 386-PS, USA Exhibit 25, shows with what consequence the principle of secrecy has been kept, even toward the older members of the Party and the administrators of important departments of the Reich Cabinet.

Whoever, as the Reich Minister of the Interior, had to carry out only measures in the framework of the preparation for war which could have been the same as tasks of a purely defensive character, was not informed concerning Hitler's aggressive intention in observance of the latter's principle.

For this reason, the presence of the defendant Frick is not listed in even a single one of these secret conferences in which Hitler informed a circle of selected men about his foreign political plans and his war aims. Hitler has especially accentuated and given reasons for the exclusion of the Reich Cabinet as a governmental body (Gremium) in the document 386-PS just mentioned. In another record concerning a similar conference, Document L-79, USA Exhibit 27, the additional principle is established that no one may be informed about any part of the war plans who does not have to know these plans for his tasks directly. Frick's name is not only missing from the list of those present in the conferences of Hitler concerning his policy of aggression which took place before the war, but the same applies also to the numerous conferences concerning further war aims and Hitler's aggressive intentions which had been held during the war.

The defendant Frick was also not informed or included in the work on them concerning the later attacks, as is shown by Hitler's lectures concerning his plans and the appropriate lists of those present. Frick, a true specialist of domestic administration who was not considered competent for military and foreign political questions, was good enough for the establishment of the civilian administration in case of any possible war—according to Hitler's opinion—the latter's foreign political and military plans were none of the former's business.

However, the prosecution asserts further that the defendant Frick had determined after the conquest of foreign territories and after their occupation the administrative policy in these territories and that he is responsible for it, and the prosecution considers this asserted activity of the defendant according to Article 6a of the Statute as "participation in the execution of wars of aggression." According to the presentations of the prosecution, Frick is said to have exercised an "over-all control" over the occupied territories, especially in his capacity as chief of the "Central Agency" for the occupied territories.

On the basis of the same function, he is also said to be responsible for all war crimes and crimes against humanity which have been committed in the occupied and incorporated territories before and during the war, until his recall as Reich Minister of the Interior on 22 August 1943. It is a question of legal interpretation whether the activity in the administration of occupied territories pursuant to Article 6a of the Statute is to be evaluated as the "execution of wars of aggression," or whether a criminal aspect comes into consideration only under the viewpoint of crimes against the rules of war or against humanity. It appears important to me for the decision of this question that it does not belong to the tasks of an official of a civil administration to examine, after the conclusion of military operations, whether there is a question of a legal or illegal occupation according to the standards of international law. Such an obligation of examination would mean an overburdening for the department of the civil administration as well as for the administrative chief whose activity cannot be designated as illegal for the reason that the territory administered by him had been annexed a short or even a long time ago in violations of the regulations of international law. There is no such obligation of examination in the practice of the civil administration:

The statute also does not force such an interpretation since, under unlimited interpretation, the military operations themselves are to be understood under an execution of wars of aggression, but not the later civil administration of conquered territories.

The punishment of crimes which occurred in the government of the occupied territories would not be made impossible, through such an interpretation. In any case, these crimes are subject to punishment as crimes against humanity or against the rules of war according to the Statute. In addition, it is to be mentioned for which territories in particular the defendant Frick bears a responsibility.

DEFENSE

These are, first, the territories which were incorporated according to the national law within the national borders of the German Reich, which are therefore called the "incorporated territories." With the national legal incorporation into the Reich, these territories came under the administration of the appropriate Reich Ministries for the departments of domestic administration, but only for these, thus under the authority of the Reich Ministry of the Interior, so that the defendant Frick bears until August 1943 the national legal responsibility of a minister for the domestic administration of these territories.

In the East, this is mostly a question of the territories West-Prussia-Posen-Danzig, thus the so-called incorporated Eastern territories which belonged until the Versailles treaty to the national entity of the German Reich.

In the East, the Memel district received the same constitutional treatment; in the West the Eupen-Malmedy district and in the Southeast, the Sudetenland. Furthermore, the country of Austria was incorporated into the national union of the German Reich.

For all these territories Frick has a share in the laws and administrative measures which were brought about by the incorporation, and he has the usual responsibility of a Minister of the Interior for the domestic administration of these territories until his dismissal in August 1943.

For the territory of Bohemia and Moravia, however, there was a special government of the protectorate which has been designated as autonomous by the decree concerning the establishment of the protectorate, document 2119-PS, and therefore was not controlled by the Reich Ministry of the Interior.

In a similar way, there was an administration not dependent on the Reich Ministry of the Interior, in the Polish territories which have been collected under the designation "General Government" and have been put under the jurisdiction of a "General Governor." Contrary to the so-called "incorporated Eastern territories," the Reich Ministry of the Interior had no right to issue orders or to take care of administrative matters for the General Government, document 3079-PS, which contains Hitler's decree concerning the administration of the occupied Polish territories.

The same is proved in numerous other documents, among them document USSR 223, the Frank diary where he states that no Reich central offices are authorized to intervene in the government of his territory.

The same applies to all other occupied territories for which a special administration was established under any legal form.

These separate administrations were not dependent on the corresponding administrative ministries in the Reich at any given time, but they were under the jurisdiction of the administrative chief of the corresponding territories, at any given time, and he himself was directly under Hitler's jurisdiction.

This applies to the occupied Soviet Russian territories the entire administration of which was under the jurisdiction of a Reich Minister for the Occupied Eastern Territories.

The same applies to Norway, where a Reich Commissioner was appointed.

In a similar way a Reich Commissioner was appointed for the Netherlands who was also independent from the Reich Ministry of the Interior and was directly under Hitler's jurisdiction.

In Luxembourg, in the Alsace and in Lorraine there were also chiefs of the civil administrations who were not dependent on the Reich Ministry of the Interior, while there was a military administration in Belgium and Northern France which also was not dependent on the Reich Ministry of the Interior.

In the same manner the administrative chiefs of the territories which were occupied in the Southeast of Europe were completely independent from the Reich Ministry of the Interior. For a part of the occupied territories there is now, in the appropriate decree concerning the creation of a separate civil administration, the order that the Reich Minister of the Interior is appointed as the central agency, and from this formulation the prosecution has deducted a responsibility of defendant Frick for the administration of all occupied territories as it is stated in the indictment.

The actual tasks of the central agency result from the order concerning the establishment of a central agency for Norway, Document 3082-PS, or 24 in the Frick document book. The witness Dr. Lammers has given a further explanation of the tasks. At that time, it was the primary task of the central agency to put personnel at the disposal of the chief of the civil administrations in the occupied territories, if requested. Therefore, if a civil official was needed for any district, the administration of the district concerned turned to the central agency in the Reich Ministry of the Interior which then put any official from the Reich at the disposal of the chief of the civil administration; the Reich Ministry of the Interior was especially suited for this, since it had at its disposal numerous officials of the domestic administration in Germany.

But the transfer of one official from the own department to another office which alone gives its orders to the official from this moment on, does not establish responsibility for the further activity of this official in his new department for which the Reich Ministry of the Interior could issue no orders whatsoever. An example: If the Minister of Justice lets the Foreign Minister have one of his officials naturally only the Foreign Minister has the responsibility for the further activity of this official, and not the Minister of Justice who has released the official. This activity of the central agency therefore does not justify the assumption of a responsibility for the administration of the occupied territories by Frick.

DEFENSE

The requisitioning of officials for the occupied territories was concentrated in the Reich Ministry of the Interior, that is, as the examination of the witness Lammers has proven, the—I quote from the just mentioned Document 3082-PS—"Unified cooperation of the supreme Reich authorities with each other and with the Reich Commissioner which is to be brought into unison with the needs of Norway."

Accordingly, the hearing of evidence for defendants Rosenberg, Frank and Seyss-Inquart, who functioned as chiefs of civil administrations in the occupied territories, has not, on any single occasion, revealed any cooperation of any kind with defendant Frick either in his capacity of Reich Minister of the Interior or of Director of the Central Office in this Ministry.

Now, the prosecution has referred to several documents in order to prove that defendant Frick exercised extensive control over all occupied territories. Actually, however, those documents as I have just demonstrated reveal no more extensive administrative activity. Document 3304-PS evidences administrative activity for the annexed Eastern territories. This coincides with my statement of the case, that the annexed Eastern territories for their internal administration were subject to the Reich Ministry of the Interior by virtue of their constitutional annexation to the Union of nations of the German Reich. The document, however, bears no reference to the administration of the Eastern occupied territories, i.e., the Government General, or to the occupied Soviet-Russian territories.

The other document submitted, 1039-PS, USA Exhibit 146, evidences the transfer of administrative personnel from the department of the Reich Ministry of the Interior to the Reich Minister for occupied Territories, a typical task of the Central Headquarters, which I have already discussed. The prosecution has submitted further documents which reveal that the Reich Ministry of the Interior had a hand in the bestowal of German citizenship upon so-called "racial Germans."

Neither does this circumstance, however, evidence any administrative authority of defendant Frick for the occupied territories but merely a typical activity of a Minister of the Interior, whose department is competent for the general regulations concerning German citizenship, including cases where persons living outside the Reich territory are involved. Neither, therefore, can this activity of the Minister of the Interior affecting specific persons in the occupied territories, evidence an extensive administrative policy and a general responsibility of defendant Frick for the administration of the occupied territories. In particular, in the occupied territories not annexed to the Reich Territory, Frick had no authority or competence whatsoever in the circle of tasks of the police.

Hitler directly commissioned Himmler to carry out the police work in the occupied territories. Reference can be made in this respect to Document 1997-PS, USA Exhibit 319, Hitler's decree concerning police safeguards of the Eastern territories, for which Himmler was directly commissioned.

The same is revealed by Document 447-PS, USA Exhibit 135, a directive of the OKW, dated 13 March 1941, to the effect that the Reichsfuehrer SS in the occupied Eastern territories is charged with certain duties regarding the execution of which he acts independently and on his own responsibility.

It is not any different with the police tasks in the other occupied territories, which at times were assigned either to the Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler or to the SS and Police chiefs who, I repeat, were exclusively under the discipline of Himmler, but were however, in many cases, actually classified in the range of activity of the civil administration chief involved, the Governor-General in Poland for instance. Compare the excerpt from Frank's Diary entered in the Frick Document Book under No. 25, also USSR 223.

In no case, therefore, were police tasks in the occupied territories under defendant Frick's jurisdiction. Consequently, defendant Frick bears no responsibility for crimes against the laws of war and against humanity in the occupied territories, since he could neither order crimes nor prevent them.

For the territory of the German Reich, I must now examine the claim of the prosecution as to the responsibility of defendant Frick for all the measures of the police, including the Gestapo, as well as for the establishment and administration of concentration camps.

May I first refer to the documents submitted by me in evidence which reveal that the Police, including the political police, was in 1933 still the concern of the individual Laender within the Reich, such as Prussia, Bavaria, etc.

DEFENSE

Accordingly, in Prussia, the Secret State Police (Gestapo) and the concentration camps were established and administered by Goering in his capacity as Prussian Minister of the Interior. The tasks of the political police were then transferred by a Prussian law, dated 30 November 1933, to the office of the Prussian prime minister, which was also managed by Goering, so that when the offices of Reich and Prussian Minister of the Interior were merged in Spring 1934, Frick did not assume political police duties in Prussia since these remained much more incumbent upon Goering in his capacity of Prime Minister.

A similar regulation prevailed in the other lands where Himmler was gradually appointed Special Deputy for Political Police. During this period, the Reich Minister of the Interior had only the right of so-called "Reich supervision" over the lands, which Frick made use of by the enactment of general instructions and legal ordinances, and this is the only point where Frick, as Minister of the Reich, could exercise any influence on the affairs of the political Police and of concentration camps.

Frick made use of this possibility, in accordance with his basic attitude as confirmed by witness Gisevius, to prevent and repress arbitrary actions of the political police insofar as this was in his power under the circumstances prevailing then. He endeavored, by the enactment of provisions of law and procedure to restrict the arbitrary practices of the political police of the states. I am referring to Document 779-PS submitted by me as Frick Exhibit 6. This is a decree dated 12 April 1934, containing such restrictive dispositions under the descriptive preamble, which I quote: "In order to counteract abuse occurring in application of protective custody . . ."

This is followed by directives to the state governments, forbidding the application of preventive custody in numerous cases in which it had been improperly applied by the Gestapo.

In this struggle of Frick against arbitrary actions of the Laender political police the latter were of course the more longwinded for they were under the direction of Goering and Himmler, of whom the "bureaucrat" Frick, as Hitler disdainfully called him, could not come within an ace as regards influence with the Party and State. For that reason the Political Police of the Laender in its practice frequently disregarded Frick's legal ordinances. As long as there was reason to hope that through his intervention the wild practice of the Political Police of the Laender could be directed into orderly channels and according to legal prescriptions, Frick did not stand by idly.

I refer to document 775-PS, Frick exhibit 9, a memorandum from Frick to Hitler, which clearly and unequivocally calls things by their correct name, mentioning legal insecurity, unrest and embitterment, and severely criticizing the Political Police of the Laender because of misuse of the right to order custody in individual cases. The same document also proves that the defendant in the struggle of the churches stood clearly on the side of the churches. This is also proved by Neurath Exhibit 1.

In his testimony the witness Gisevius refers to an additional memorandum which he himself drew up for Frick as a further attempt to restrain and legally control through severe criticism and suggestions the arbitrary practice of the Political Police of the Laender. None of these attempts was of avail because Frick's political influence was too insignificant and because he could not assert himself against Goering and Himmler, a thing which at the time could not yet become clear to Frick because the practice of Goering and Himmler was essentially in harmony with what Hitler actually wanted himself. Therefore, the documents submitted by the prosecution, taken in conjunction with the evidence offered by the defense show that in the domain of the Political Police and in ordering custody, Frick had a certain competency at a time when Police service still was a task entrusted to the individual states. However, this evidence also shows that during that time Frick's jurisdiction was very limited and it further shows that Frick, acting within the bounds of his competency became active only in order to take steps against the terror and arbitrary actions of the Gestapo through general instructions and through repeated complaints in individual cases so that the conclusion is not justified that Frick in any way positively participated in the Gestapo's measures of terror and compulsion. The legal situation changed at a later time.

With Hitler's decree of 17 June 1936, Document 2073-PS, Document book Frick 35, police tasks for the entire Reich were combined and uniformly transferred to Himmler whose department was formally made a part of the Ministry of the Interior under the title "Reichfuehrer SS and Chief of the German Police in the Ministry of the Interior."

The question now is whether this new regulation conferred on Frick in his capacity as Reich Minister of the Interior any authority of command or whether he was given any power to issue instructions on the Political Police, its offices and functionaries, which could be practically enforced. When Himmler in accordance with his own wish and because of his influence on Hitler was appointed Police Chief for the entire Reich there did not exist in Germany a police or security ministry, properly speaking.

DEFENSE

This is the reason why the uniform direction of the Police through Himmler in person was formally attached to the Reich Ministry of the Interior.

But Himmler wanted to be more than a chief of section in the Ministry of the Interior.

Therefore a position entirely novel in German administrative law was created for him and his purposes. The entire sphere of tasks of the Police was separated from the rest of the activities of the Ministry of the Interior and placed under Himmler's special jurisdiction under a newly created title of office which as a government office included the words "Reichfuehrer SS," thereby making it possible for Himmler by reason of a title of office characterizing him as Reichfuehrer SS (in other words a party office at highest level) to carry out State Police tasks in that capacity giving him apparent independence from any instructions issued by a minister of state.

In order to accentuate further the independence of his office within the hierarchy of government agencies Himmler was given the right, from the very beginning to represent Police matters before the Cabinet on his own responsibility, just like a Reich Minister, which is also brought out in the decree covering his appointment, 2073-PS. This decree is a prize sample for overlapping of competencies, something which Hitler favored so very much in his government system. Himmler was part of the Ministry of the Interior and as a functionary of the Ministry of the Interior, was formally bound to abide by instructions of the Minister. However, he also was an independent Police chief with the right to represent before the Cabinet on his own responsibility matters pertaining to the Police, thus eliminating Frick. In addition to that, his orders simultaneously carried the authority of a Reichfuehrer SS and Frick had no authority at all to interfere with them.

The actual effects of this involved arrangement brought out in even stronger measure the towering influence of Himmler on Hitler. Frick repeatedly undertook to intervene in behalf of a safeguard of a well ordered state apparatus, through over-all instructions, intended to restrain the arbitrary acts of the Political Police. As late as 25 January 1938 he tried to curtail admissibility of protective custody through a decree and in a series of cases it forbade its improper application.

I refer to Document 1723-PS, USA Exhibit 206, an extract of which under No. 36 is in the Frick document book. It prohibited protective custody in lieu of, or in addition to, legal penalty, forbidding its application by police authorities of the medium or lower level and making mandatory prior hearing of the accused person. He decreed periodical examination of continuance of reasons for confinement and on principle forbade application of protective custody against foreigners in regard to whom he left to the police only the authority to expel them from the Reich in case of acts endangering the state.

It is easy to object that the Gestapo in practice disregarded all these instructions of Frick and that Himmler and his subordinates had maintained an absolute power by terror and violence. This is correct and has been confirmed in detail by the witness Gisevius.

The matter of importance to me in the defense of Frick is something else—to show that Frick himself disapproved such arbitrary acts and that he tried to do all in his power to oppose such arbitrary acts.

Finally, however, Hitler forbade even this. He informed him through Lammers, as confirmed by him as witness, that he was not to concern himself with police matters, that Himmler was taking better care of it and that the Police was doing well in Himmler's hands.

This is how Himmler finally came to have the Police completely in his hands and he also gave outward expression to this, by later dropping with Hitler's consent the qualification in his official title "in the Ministry for the Interior," simply referring to it as "Reichfuehrer SS and Chief of the German Police" which also becomes evident from the testimony of Lammers.

I believe that, in view of the circumstances, the problem of defendant Frick's responsibility under criminal law for the political police and their arbitrary measures is not established by the fact that the entire police has been formally incorporated in the Reich Ministry of the Interior since the year 1936, as it has been proven that Frick himself did not participate in arbitrary acts, but tried on the contrary to intervene against such arbitrary practice with his might, which, however, was by no means a match for the personality and the influence of Himmler with Hitler.

In order to obtain a just judgment, I request consideration of the actual situation as to commands and power and not the purely external circumstance of a formal incorporation of the tasks involved in the Reich Ministry of the Interior.

The Prosecution during their presentation on 3 July 1946 brought out Document D-181, which has become GB 528. They stated in that connection that this document proved that the political police not only was a part of the Ministry of the Interior, but that Frick had in fact been responsible for the measures of the political police. Actually the document shows only that Frick had been included as Minister of the Interior in the proceedings employed during the sterilization of the so-called hereditary-diseased. The document has nothing to do with any measures of the police, and certainly nothing to do with any measures of the political police. And there is no information in it regarding Himmler's position in the Ministry of the Interior.

DEFENSE

In this connection, I must briefly deal with the reference of the prosecution to the fact that Hitler's decree concerning the appointment of Himmler as Chief of the German Police, document 2073-PS, had also been signed by Frick himself.

I believe that the relationship between Frick and Himmler, as well as the differing relation of both to Hitler is sufficiently clear to justify the conclusion, that the appointment of Himmler expressed solely an agreement between Hitler and Himmler, which Frick would have vetoed in vain.

We are confronted with the same problem which applies to so many defendants, namely, the problem of being one of the formal co-signers of an order which was issued by Hitler and which was also formally signed by the chief of a department, although the department chief had no means of exerting influence on the order and could not have prevented it either, since the order would have gone fully into effect as a Fuehrer decree.

I now have to deal more fully with several documents, which have been appraised by the prosecution as bearing on actual activity of defendant Frick within the sphere of tasks of the political police.

I have already dealt with Document 3304-PS, to which the prosecution has referred in this connection. It concerns an ordinance about the assignment of a higher Police Chief to the Reichstatthalter (Reich-Governor) in the Eastern territories which are incorporated in the State Union of the German Reich, and hence deals with the administrative structure of the Reichstatthalter's office in a part of the Reich.

The mentioned decree therefore falls within the frame-work of the general competence, of the Minister of the Interior and insofar does not prove a special police activity.

Moreover, this decree has nothing to do with any arbitrary acts of the Gestapo.

Along the same line is the decree of 20 September 1936, Document 2245-PS, concerning the appointment of police-consultants with the Prussian provincial administrations, which were also subordinate to the Reich Ministry of the Interior as offices of the general internal Reich administration.

The assignment of a police consultant to the office of the general administration in the province is a measure of the internal Reich administration.

This measure, too, had no connection with arbitrary acts of the Gestapo, and particularly it also does not prove the issuance of any instructions by the defendant to the Gestapo.

The same applies to the documents which have been appraised by the prosecution as bearing on participation of the defendant in the establishment and administration of concentration camps or as an approval of terror methods through the Gestapo.

In the presentation of 22 November 1945, the prosecution referred to document 2533-PS as proof of approval of these arrangements by the defendant Frick. I do not have to go any farther into the contents of the document. It concerns an article of defendant Frank in the magazine of the academy of German Law, of which Frick has erroneously been called the author by the prosecution.

Another document does not have enough value as evidence to be utilized for a legal judgment.

I refer to Document 2513-PS, Exhibit 235, which contains an excerpt of a speech, which Frick allegedly made in the year 1927, but the excerpt of this speech is taken from a provincial Social Democrat newspaper, a small paper opposed to Frick, the reporter of which thus had no authentic copy of the speech at his disposal, and we all know what mistakes and misunderstandings are also contained in such short reports, the composition of which cannot be checked by the speaker himself.

Thus this document, according to which Frick is said to have stated that history is written not only with the ballot, but with blood and iron, is not a reliable source.

The prosecution further submitted document 1643-PS, USA Exhibit 713. This document refers to the conferences concerning the expropriation of land in order to extend the grounds of the Auschwitz concentration camp.

The general domestic administration is always competent for expropriation and for this reason, an official from the Ministry of the Interior was called into the negotiations, who stated however —page 2 of the English translation of the document—that he was not authorized to dispose of real property. Thus, one cannot construe from this document any political-police activity of the defendant or an approval of the practice of concentration camps.

Finally, the prosecution in this connection pointed out that defendant Frick personally visited the Oranienburg and Dachau concentration camps. The defendant does not deny the visit in Oranienburg in the year 1938 about which witness Hoess testified. At that time, as witness Hoess himself testifies, the external framework of the camps was still that of military training areas. In any case, an official visitor to the camp at that time could not notice any murders, mistreatments or similar crimes, so that the visit is not a decisive argument for knowledge of crimes in the concentration camps.

DEFENSE

On the other hand, Frick never visited the Dachau concentration camp, contrary to the testimony of witness Blaha. In this, I refer to the testimony of Gillhuber, who as the constant companion of Frick would have had to know about such a visit if it had taken place. I take the liberty of pointing out also that the two other constant companions of Frick have also been mentioned by me as witnesses, but by the consent of the prosecution were considered as unnecessary by the Tribunal for the reason that one of the companions would be sufficient as witness.

At the conclusion of this chapter, I must still concern myself with an assertion of the prosecution which designated Frick at one time as the chief of the Reich Security Main Office.

I take the liberty of pointing out the testimony of the witness Ohlendorf who stated to the court that the Reich Security Main Office (RSHA) was a creation of Himmler, who combined in this office his state police tasks and his functions as Reichsfuehrer SS, with which Frick had no relationship of any kind and over which he had even less authority to command. The chief of this office was thus only Himmler himself.

I must go further into the charges which are being made against the defendant Frick in respect to the persecution of members of the Jewish race. Frick shared in the legal measures, particularly the Nurnberg Laws, and in administrative measures, which he regarded as an expression of National Socialist race policy. On the other hand there is no proof that Frick himself had shared in or had known of the measures of physical extermination which, on Hitler's direct orders, were carried out by Himmler and his organizations, and were being kept secret from those who themselves had no part in these frightful events. Furthermore, in his capacity as Minister of the Interior, the defendant is also accused of having participated in the killing of the sick and insane. Hitler's basic order is contained in Document 630-PS, USA Exhibit 342. This document shows that Hitler did not give a corresponding order to some governmental office but, completely outside of the governmental order system of the Ministries, to two single persons, namely Bouhler and Dr. Brandt. Contrary to all rules, Hitler did not sign this order himself in an official capacity as Fuehrer and Reichchancellor, but used personal stationery with the heading "Adolf Hitler."

This shows what the witness Lammers has confirmed, that Hitler did not give an order for these measures to the Ministry of the Interior or some other governmental office, but to two of his Party members, as also the Party symbol is the only mark on this stationery. On the other hand, the documents submitted by the Prosecution prove that complaints were made which also reached the Ministry of the Interior but they do not prove that, in contradiction to Document 630-PS, Frick had a share in the measures for the killings or that he could have stopped them.

After his departure from the Ministry of the Interior on 20 August 1943, Frick was appointed Reichprotector of Bohemia and Moravia. Here he was given an order which from the start was entirely unequivocal in its competence. I refer to Document 3443-PS also as USSR 60 and 29 in the Frick document book, further 1366-PS, submitted by me as Frick Exhibit 5a, furthermore the testimony of the witness Lammers. The office of the Reichprotector was originally the unified representative of the Reichpower in the Protectorate.

In actual practice however, the authoritative power passed more and more to Frank, the Secretary of State for the Reichprotectorate at that time. With the appointment of Frick in August 1943, through a Fuehrer decree which was not made public, the executive authority was now formally transferred to Frank, who from that time on received the official title "The German Minister of State in Bohemia and Moravia." The Reichprotector, retained substantially the privilege of representation and right of clemency, the improper use of which by Frick has neither been maintained nor proved by the prosecution. On the other hand, Frank, as "German Minister of State," according to the above mentioned Fuehrer decree, exercised his executive authority directly under Hitler, by whom he had been directly appointed, and from whom he received his directions without Frick's intervention, Frick being in no way authorized to exercise any influence thereon. Considering this state of affairs, a charge against the defendant Frick cannot be derived from Document 3589-PS, USA Exhibit 720.

I now come to the Prosecution's accusation that Frick, by his membership of certain organizations, is responsible for certain criminal actions.

The SS was one of these organizations emphasized by the Prosecution. Frick has never been a member of it.

Similarly, he was never a General in the SS, as stated by the Prosecution. I might assume this to be merely a mistake on the part of the Prosecution. In any case the Prosecution did not submit proof thereof.

DEFENSE

Frick was likewise never a member of the SA, as shown, probably by mistake, in the chart which indicated Frick's membership of various organizations. There is no proof of this.

The Prosecution has charged Frick with being the supreme chief of the Gestapo, and therefore designated him as its member, on the strength of the argument that since the appointment of Himmler in 1936 as Chief of the German Police, the Gestapo has been formally incorporated into the Reich Ministry of the Interior.

But the Gestapo had its own Chief in the person of Himmler, who alone issued orders, and his formal subordination to the Minister of the Interior, does not necessarily make him, the Minister of the Interior, a member of the organization which was exclusively under Himmler's orders. My colleague charged with the defense of the Gestapo will also have to deal with the character of this organization. As to the defendant Frick, I have only to state that he held the formal position of a Reichsleiter in his character of Chairman of the Reichstag fraction of the NSDAP.

The Reichstag having lost its political importance since 1933, which fact needs no further explanation, Frick's position had also practically lost its importance and could no longer be compared with the position of a Reichsleiter, who administered important political branches.

And finally Frick as Reich Minister was a member of the Reich Cabinet. Also with regard to the character and the authority of this organization I refer primarily to the statements which are yet to follow of my colleague, who has been named defense counsel of this organization.

I am referring here only to the testimony of Lammers and Gisevius, and furthermore to the excerpt from the book of this witness, which I have submitted as Exhibit 13 as evidence for the position and authority which the Reich Cabinet maintained toward the dictatorial practices of Hitler.

According to all this the defendant Frick appears as a personality, which certainly exerted a decisive influence on interior policy after this goal had been achieved.

All his measures, however, had inner-political aims; they were not intended to have anything to do with the foreign-political goal of a war of aggression and especially not with crimes against humanity, committed to further crimes against the peace or against the rules of warfare, and only in these cases would this court have jurisdiction according to Article 6 of the Statute, as has also been stated by the Prosecution.

When Frick realized that the policy had turned into a direction of which he could no longer approve, he tried to exert all his influence in order to introduce a change. However, he then had to see more and more that he could not find an audience in Hitler for his representations and complaints, and to the contrary, he had to realize that these complaints destroyed Hitler's confidence in him, as the latter preferred to have himself advised by Himmler and persons of similar attitudes, so that Frick finally was not received by Hitler any more since the year 1937. If he wanted to present any complaints Frick then gave up such hopeless attempts to introduce a change in the situation, which would not have been changed by his resignation either, which according to the results of the evidence he had repeatedly offered in vain.

In this way his tragedy lies in his entanglement in a system in the first steps of which he had participated enthusiastically and the development of which he had imagined to be different.

In any case it appears important to me in judging his personality and his actions, that this presentation of evidence which has gone on for months has not given any proof of the personal participation of the defendant in any crimes, either.

It is not without reason that John Gunther in the book "Inside Europe," which I have presented to the Tribunal as evidence, describes especially the defendant Frick as "the only honest Nazi." Gunther at the same place goes on to call him a "bureaucrat all the way through." Hitler himself always called him repeatedly the "paragraph scrounger," he whom Frick (just about typically of him) had not met in any public assembly but in his office with the police in Munich in the year 1923. This man felt enthusiasm for the suggestive power of Hitler, for himself so distant, who with his big word appealed to his senses, his honor, and his patriotism.

It was Hitler who made him proud to be able to participate in the reconstruction of a German nation, which through strong armed forces was to be in a position to play a peaceful but yet active part in world politics.

However, it was also Hitler who understood to throw a scare into the citizen Frick about the supposedly threatening Bolshevik danger and whatever more there existed of false phrases, twisted statements, and propaganda arts, and which also fooled men of greater mental height, who let themselves be driven along by the suggestive power of a Hitler, and who did not realize in time that they had subordinated themselves to the suggestive will of a criminal who was prepared to overthrow the pillars of civilization for his ideas and who finally would leave Germany behind in a monstrous spiritual and material field of rubble, to the overcoming of which this trial may also contribute through a sentence in accordance with law and justice.

DEFENSE

2. FINAL PLEA by Wilhelm Frick

I have a clear conscience with reference to the accusations. My entire life was spent in the service of my people and my fatherland. To them I have sacrificed my entire strength in faithful fulfillment of my duty.

I am convinced that no patriotic Americans or patriotic members of another country would act differently were his country in the same position, because any other action would have been a breach of my oath of allegiance, and high treason.

Regarding the fulfillment of my legal and moral duties, I believe that I deserve no more penalty than the tens of thousands of faithful German civil servants and employees of official state agencies who here today, as years and years ago, are detained in camps merely because they fulfilled their duties. To them I owe memory and faith which I, as a former, long-standing Minister of the Reich, consider it a particular honor to state.

XI. JULIUS STREICHER

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Hans Marx, Defense Counsel

When in May of the past year the final action of the greatest and most horrible war of all times came to an end, the German people was slow to rise again from the stupor in which it had for the most part spent the last months of the war. Like all the peoples of Europe for years it had suffered unspeakably, the last months in particular with their hail of bombs had brought so much misery to both country and people that it almost surpassed all human capacity.

This terror was increased by the knowledge that the war was lost and by the fear of the uncertain fate which the occupation period would bring. And when finally the period of first anxiety had passed, when the German people was slowly beginning to breathe again, paralyzing horror spread once more.

Through the press and radio, through newspapers and motion pictures knowledge was spread of the atrocities which had taken place in the East, in the steppes, and in the concentration camps. Germany learned that people, men of its own blood, millions and millions of innocent Jewish people had been slaughtered and destroyed. Most people felt instinctively that these deeds would necessarily be the greatest accusation among all the charges the world had to make against Germany.

The question of whether the German people in its totality had known and approved of these actions was and is the great question for its fate. It is the touchstone by which the decision must be made as to whether Germany will ever be able to return again as a nation with equal rights into the common cultural and spiritual cycle of the world.

As in every case of guilt, there immediately arose in this case as well the question as to who was responsible and a search for that person. Who had ordered these atrocities, who had carried them out, and how could such inconceivable things ever happen at all, or such actions be committed as have no equal even in the history of the earliest times.

During all this asking and guessing the news arrived that the former Gauleiter of Franconia and publisher of the "Stuermer," that is the present defendant Julius Streicher, had fallen into the hands of the American troops. From the echo this news aroused in the press which was exclusively directed and published by the occupying power and just as in the radio news, it could be gathered that the world imagined that in the person of Julius Streicher it had not only taken prisoner one of the numerous anti-Semitic propaganda agents of the third Reich, but in short enemy No. 1 of the Jews.

In the rest of the world it was evidently the prevailing opinion that in Julius Streicher they had seized not only the most active propaganda agent for the persecution and extermination of Jews, but that he had also participated to the highest degree in carrying out the acts of extermination.

He was said to have been, as one heard, not only the greatest hater of the Jews and the greatest preacher of extermination of the Jews, but also the person to whose direct influence one must trace back the extermination of European Jewry.

It is only from this viewpoint that it can be explained why the defendant Streicher sits here in the defendant's dock together with the other defendants among the chief responsible persons of the National-Socialists system. For in itself, neither according to his personality nor measured by his offices and positions does he belong to the circle of leaders of the NSDAP nor to the Party's decisive personalities.

This opinion which probably was shared in the beginning by the prosecution was abandoned by them, however, at an early stage for the written indictment no longer charged the defendant Streicher with any personal and direct part in the abominable mass murders, it rather stated on the other hand that there was less evidence to offer for him than for any of the other defendants in favor of a direct and personal guilt. Only his propaganda, his work both written and verbal, were made the subject of an accusation.

DEFENSE

As far as particulars are concerned, the counts of the indictment against the defendant Streicher were summed up as follows:

I. Support of seizure of power and consolidation of the power of the NSDAP after the latter's entry into the government.

II. Preparation of aggressive wars by propaganda aimed at the persecution of the Jews.

II. Intellectual and spiritual preparation and education to encourage hatred against the Jews.

a. In the German people.

b. In the German youth.

c. In the active annihilators of Jewry.

Without Julius Streicher no Auschwitz, no Mauthausen, no Maidanek, no Lublin—in such a manner the indictment may be summed up briefly.

I

As regards Count I of the indictment, the defendant does not deny that as regards the Party's later seizure of power he supported and promoted it with all his might from the very beginning. His support went to the extent of a whole movement which he had built up personally in Franconia, and which he put at the disposal of Adolf Hitler's party, the latter being extremely small, after the first world war and limited to southern Bavaria only. Furthermore, after Hitler's release from the fortress of Landsberg he immediately joined him again and subsequently championed his ideas and goals with the greatest determination.

Until 1933 the defendant's activity was limited to propaganda for the NSDAP and its goals, particularly in the field of the Jewish question.

There is nothing criminal to be seen in this attitude of the defendant as such. The participation in a party within a state which allows such an opposition party can be regarded as criminal only if, first of all, the goals of such a party are objectively criminal, and if subjectively a member of such a movement knows, approves of, and thereby supports these criminal goals.

The foundation of the entire charges against all the defendants lies in this very fact that the NSDAP is accused of having had criminal goals from the very beginning.

According to the assertion of the prosecution the members of this party started out with the plan of subjugating the world, of annihilating foreign races, and of setting the German master-race above the whole world. They are accused of having harbored the will to carry out these aims and plans from the very outset by means of aggressive wars, murder, and violence.

If, therefore, Streicher's mere participation in the NSDAP and his support of it are to be ascribed to him as a crime, it must be proved that the party had such plans and that the defendant knew and approved of them.

The gentlemen who took the floor before me have already demonstrated sufficiently that such a conspiracy with such aims did not exist. Therefore I can save myself the trouble of making further statements on this subject and I can refer to what has already been set forth by the other defense counsels. I have only to deal with the point that the defendant Streicher did not in any case participate in such a conspiracy, if the latter should be considered by the High Tribunal to have existed.

The official party program strove to attain power in a legitimate way. The aims advocated therein cannot be considered as criminal. Thus, if such aims did actually exist, they could only—given the nature of a conspiracy—be known in a restricted circle.

The party program was not kept secret but was announced at a public meeting in Munich, so that not only the whole public of Germany but also that of the entire world could be informed about the aims of the party.

Therefore, there is a complete absence of that momentum given by the secret agreement in a common aim, which is usually the characteristic sign of a conspiracy.

The hearing of evidence, too, has shown nothing to the effect that at that time already there existed a plan for a war of revenge or aggression, connected with the preceding or simultaneous extermination of the Jews. If nevertheless a conspiracy should have existed, the latter would have confined itself to the narrow circle which revolved exclusively around Hitler. But the defendant Streicher did not belong to this circle. None of the offices he occupied provides the least foothold for it. As an old party member he was just one among many thousands. As honorary Gauleiter, as honorary SA-Obergruppenfuehrer, he was also only an equal among equals. Thus one cannot find in any of the offices he held any link or entanglement with the innermost circle of the party. It is also impossible to discern after the end of 1938 any personal relations with the leading men of the movement, be it with Hitler himself, be it with the defendant Goering, be it Goebbels, Himmler, or Bormann.

DEFENSE

The prosecution did not offer any evidence on this point, nor did the proceedings produce any proof to that effect. Of all the material presented during all these months of the Trial, nothing can be taken even as a shadow of a proof that the defendant Streicher was so closely connected with the highest authority of the party that he could have or even must have known its ultimate aims.

The final aims of the NSDAP in the Jewish question, the effects of which were manifest in the concentration camps, had not been formulated and fixed the way they appeared in the end, neither before the seizure of power nor several years after. The party program itself provided for the Jews to be placed under a law for aliens, thus the laws issued in the third Reich followed this line. Only later on, it can be said here, the program became more severe and finally came head over heels under the influence of the war. But any proof of the fact that the defendant Streicher recognized other aims than those of the official party program has not been offered.

Accordingly, it has not been proved that the defendant being aware of the criminal aims of the party supported the seizure of power of the NSDAP, and only on such a basis could a penal charge be brought against him.

The fact that the defendant, as Gauleiter, further endeavored to increase and maintain the power of the NSDAP after the seizure of power is also not disputed by him. But here, too, only if the defendant knew at that time the objectionable aims of the party can his conduct be considered punishable.

From the purely factual standpoint it must be said here that the defendant Streicher, contrary to almost all other defendants, did not remain in his position until the end, not even until the war. Officially he was dismissed in 1940 from his position of Gauleiter, but actually and practically he had been without any influence and power for more than a year. But while he could still work within the modest framework which was at his disposal in his capacity of Gauleiter, no criminal plans of the NSDAP were recognizable. In any case not for somebody, who like the defendant Streicher was outside the close circle surrounding Adolf Hitler.

II

Count II of the indictment brought against the defendant Streicher, namely the persecution of Jews as a means of preparation for a war of aggression, can be included here. Up to 1937 the existence of a plan for a war of aggression was absolutely not noticeable. In any case, if Hitler should have entertained an intention to that effect, he did not let it be known to the outside. If, however, anybody should have been taken into his confidence at that time it would have been the leading men in politics and the Wehrmacht, who belonged to the closest circle around him. However, by no means did the defendant Streicher belong to those. Especially significant here is that at the outbreak of the war Streicher was not even appointed Wehrkreiskommissar of the Gau (Commissioner of military administrative area HQ). The individual conferences, from which the prosecution derives the evidence for the planning of the war which occurred later on, did not see the defendant Streicher as a participant. His name does not appear anywhere, neither in a written decree, nor in a protocol. Consequently, no proof has been offered that Streicher knew of any alleged plans for waging war.

But this eliminates the reproach that he preached hatred against the Jews in order to facilitate thereby the conduct of the war planned for some time after. In this connection the following is to be said: One of the main points in the program of the NSDAP has been the call "away from Versailles." The defendant adopted this program-point which, however, does not mean that he expected to do away with the Treaty by means of a war.

The former German democratic governments in the course of their negotiations with former opponents from the world war also stressed the fact at all times that the Versailles Treaty is no proper basis for a permanent world peace and particularly for an economic adjustment. Not only in Germany but everywhere in the entire world the attitude of clear thinking economic circles toward the Versailles Treaty was to reject it. We may point especially to the United States of America as an example.

All German political parties in Germany, irrespective of their other aims, concurred in the opinion that the Treaty of Versailles should be revised. Neither was there any doubt that such revision was possible only on the basis of a new agreement. To even consider any other possibility of a solution would seem like Utopia, since the German Reich lacked all military power. The NSDAP strove, at any rate so far as the outer signs indicated, to find a solution to the problem in just this way. The supporting of such aim, however, cannot be looked upon as a violation of treaty obligations, and made the object of a charge against the defendant. No proof has been offered that he expected military complications and that he desired them.

DEFENSE

I am about to take up the matter of the defendant's attitude in the Jewish question. He is accused of having incited and instigated through decades the persecution of the Jews and of being responsible for the final extermination of Europe's Jewry.

It is clear that this accusation constitutes the focal point of the indictment against Julius Streicher and perhaps of the total indictment, for in this connection the position of the German people to this question must be tried and judged as well. The Prosecution takes the point of view that there is just as little doubt as to the responsibility of the defendant, as there is doubt about the guilty involvement of the German people. As evidence the Prosecution brought up—

a. The speeches by Streicher before and after the seizure of power, namely, one speech in April 1925 in which he spoke about the extermination of the Jews. In the Prosecutor's opinion the altogether first evidence regarding the final solution of the Jewish question planned by the Party, namely the extermination of all Jews, is to be seen in these speeches.

b. Active commitment of the personality and authority of the defendant, namely on the boycott-day, on 1 April 1933.

c. Numerous articles published in the weekly "Der Stuermer," among them especially such dealing with the ritual murder and with quotations from the Talmud. He knowingly and intentionally described in them the Jews as a criminal and inferior race and created and wanted to create hatred and the will to annihilate this people.

The defendant's reply to these points is as follows:

He states that he worked in the capacity of a private writer only. His aim was to enlighten the German people on the Jewish question as he saw it. His description of the Jews merely had the purpose to show that they are different and of a foreign race and to make it clear that they are living according to laws alien to the German conception. It was by no means his intention to incite and instigate his listeners and readers. Besides, he only propagated the thought that the Jews should be extricated from the German national and economic life and eliminated from the close association with the body of German people.

He had, further, an international solution of the Jewish question in mind, he thought nothing of a German or even European part-solution and rejected it. So it happened that he suggested in an editorial of the Stuermer of 1941 that the French island of Madagascar should be taken into consideration as a Jewish settlement. Accordingly, he did not see the final solution of the Jewish question in the physical extermination but in the resettlement of the Jews.

It cannot be the aim of the Defense to go into further details of the defendant's actions as journalist and speaker, namely regarding his Stuermer and his answer to the accusations lodged against him. His ideology and attitude shall likewise remain unexplained, unexcused, or defended, also his way of writing and speaking. The examination and decision in this respect is the Tribunal's duty exclusively. That much may be said, that there is a gap between the defendant's actions and the expressions frequently employed by him which cannot be bridged. It can be stated that the defendant when assigned to take charge of some anti-Semitic enterprise never let coercive measures prevail against the Jewish population, and might necessarily be expected of him, if the accusations made by the Prosecution were true.

I see my duty as defense counsel in examining and clarifying the question of whether the defendant Streicher with his speeches, actions, and with his publications not only strove for but actually attained the success claimed by the Prosecution.

In the following the question should be examined whether Streicher actually educated the German people for anti-Semitism to a degree which made it possible for the leadership of the German people to commit such criminal acts as actually occurred.

Furthermore, it should be examined whether the defendant filled the German youth with hatred against the Jews to such an extent as charged by the Prosecution.

Finally, it should be decided whether Streicher was actually the man who prepared spiritually and morally the executive organs of the persecution of the Jews to commit their acts.

At the beginning of this presentation it seems important to point out that a great many "Stuermer" articles from which the Prosecution endeavors to deduce an invitation to exterminate and annihilate the Jews were not written by Streicher himself but by his collaborators, especially by the deputy Gauleiter Karl Holz, well known for his extremely radical tendencies.

Even though the defendant Streicher carries the formal responsibility for these articles which responsibility he expressly assumed before the Tribunal, this point of view still appears very essential for the extent of his criminal responsibility.

Further it may be said in this connection that according to the unrefuted statement of the defendant, the sharpest articles were written in reply to articles and writings in the foreign press, which contained very radical suggestions of destruction against the German nation, also no doubt due to the existing war psychosis.

DEFENSE

The defendant Streicher—it cannot be denied and is not to be defended—continually wrote articles in the “Stuermer” and also held public speeches, which were strongly anti-Jewish and which at least aimed at the elimination of Jewish influence in Germany.

During the first 5 years Streicher found a comparatively favorable soil for his anti-Jewish tendencies. The first world war finished with Germany's defeat, but wide circles did not want to admit the fact of a military victory of Germany's opponents of that time, they imputed this defeat to a decomposition of the national will of defense and resistance from within and designated Jewry as being the main culprit for this undermining from within. In doing so, one intentionally overlooked the errors which had been committed by the Government of that time before and during the war with respect to domestic and foreign policy as well as the errors of strategy.

A scapegoat was sought on which to blame the loss of the war and one believed to have found it in the Jews. Jealousy, envy, and also forgetfulness of one's own insufficiencies accomplished the rest in order to influence unfavorably the feelings towards the Jewish population. In addition to that, the inflation occurred and in the following years the economic depression with its steadily increasing misery which, as experience shows, makes any nation ripe for any form of radicalism. On this ground and from this medium arose the “Stuermer.” For these reasons it met with a certain amount of interest and attracted a considerable number of readers. But even during the last years before the accession to power it did not have a great influence. Its distribution did not go beyond Nurnberg and its close vicinity. By means of attacks against personalities locally known in Nurnberg and in the others places it managed to arouse in these localities from time to time a certain amount of interest and to extend thereby its circle of readers. Certain groups of the population were interested in the propagation of such scandal stories and for these reasons subscribed to the “Stuermer.”

But a criminal way of action can be seen in this—and this is probably the conception of the prosecution also—only if this sort of literary and oratory activity led to criminal results. But was the German nation really filled with the hatred of the Jews in the sense and to the extent asserted by the prosecution through the “Stuermer” and through Streicher's speeches?

The prosecution produced the evidence on this point in a very brief manner. It draws conclusions but it has not produced actual evidence. It alleges indeed the achievement of a result, but it cannot produce factual evidence for its assumption. .

The prosecutor maintained that without Streicher's incitements which lasted for years, the German people would not have approved the persecution of the Jews and that Himmler would not have found among the German people any tool for the execution of the measures taken for the extermination of the Jews. Should however the defendant Streicher be made legally responsible for this, then not only must it be proved that the incitement as such was actually carried through and that a result was achieved in this direction but—and this is the decisive point—a conclusive proof must be produced that the facts exposed can be traced back to the incitement. It is not the question of the result obtained which has first to be proved with such accuracy, but the causative connection between the incitement and result.

But how is the influence of the "Stuermer" upon the German people to be estimated, and what picture do we get when we look at the Jewish problem during the years between 1920 and 1944?

It is easy to recognize here three stages of development.

The first period comprises the interval in the defendant's activity between 1922 and 1933, the second that between 1933 and 1 September 1933 or February 1940, the third that between 1940 and the collapse.

As regards the first period, it would show a considerable lack of appreciation of the tendencies which had already existed in Germany for a long time, and thereby a completely groundless exaggeration of Streicher's influence if no mention were made of the fact that long before Streicher there was already a certain anti-Semitism in Germany. For instance a certain Theodor Fritsch touched on the Jewish question in his publication "Der Hammer" long before Streicher's time and referred especially to the alleged menace offered by the immigration of Jewish elements from the East which might overflow the country and acquire too much control in it.

Immediately after the end of the first world war the so-called "German-Ethnical Protective and Defensive League (Deutsch-Voelkischer Schutz und Trutzbund)" appeared which, in contrast to the "Stuermer" and the movement brought into existence by Streicher, was spread over the whole of Germany and had set up as its aim the repression of the Jewish influence. Long before Streicher, anti-Semitic groups existed in the South as well as in the North. In relation to these large-scale efforts, the "Stuermer" could only have a regional importance. For this reason alone, it is easy to explain why its influence was never at any time or in any place of great importance. It is a decisive fact however that the German nation in its totality could not be influenced by all these groups either in its business relations or in its attitude to Jewry and that even during the last years before the NSDAP came to power no violent actions against the Jews occurred anywhere—of the people's own volition.

DEFENSE

However, when toward the end of the second decade after the first world war a considerable gain of the NSDAP became noticeable, it was not due to anti-Semitic reasons, but to the fact that the prevailing confusion in the various parties had been unable to show a way out of the ever increasing economic misery. The call for a strong man became ever more urgent. The conviction became more and more compelling among the broad masses that only a personality who would not be dependent on the change of majorities would be able to master the situation.

The NSDAP understood how to exploit this general trend for its own ends and to win over the nation who had sunk in despair by disseminating promises in all directions. But never did the masses think, when electing the NSDAP at that time, that their program would develop in such a way as we have witnessed.

With the accession to power by the NSDAP in 1933, the second epoch was introduced. The power of the state was in the hands of the party and nobody could have prevented the use of violence against the Jewish circles of the population.

Thus it should have been just the right moment for the defendant Streicher to effect his baiting as the prosecution has maintained. If at that time wide circles of the people or at least the veteran members of the NSDAP had been brought up as radical Jew haters as stated by the prosecution, acts of violence against the Jewish population should necessarily have taken place on a greater scale, due to the accumulation of that mood of hatred. Pogroms of the greatest scope would have been the natural result of a truly anti-Semitic attitude of the people. But nothing like that happened. Apart from some minor incidents, evidently caused by local or personal conditions, no attacks against Jews or their property took place anywhere.

It is quite clear that an atmosphere of hatred against the Jewish people did not prevail anywhere at least up to 1933 and the charge brought by the prosecution against the defendant that he successfully educated the German people to hate the Jews ever since the very start of his fight can thus be dropped. The year of the seizure of power by the NSDAP also put the "Stuermer" to a decisive test. Had the "Stuermer" been considered by the broad masses of the German nation as the authoritative champion against the Jews and therefore indispensable to that fight, an extraordinary increase in the demand for the publication would have followed.

No such interest was displayed, however, in any way. On the contrary, even in party circles demands were heard to discontinue the "Stuermer" entirely or at least to change its illustrations, style, and tone. It became more and more clear that the interest in Streicher's Jewish policy was steadily declining, an interest which was limited anyway.

It must be added that with the seizure of power by the Party the total press apparatus got under the control of the party, which immediately undertook to coordinate the press, i.e., to direct it from a central agency in the spirit of a National-Socialist policy and ideology. This was done through the Minister of Propaganda and chief of the Reich Press via the official "National Socialist party correspondence." Particularly Dr. Goebbels, the Minister of Propaganda, designated by different witnesses such as Goering, Schirach, Neurath, and others as the most inveterate representative of the anti-Semitic trend in the government was credited with giving each week to the entire press several anti-Jewish editorials, which were printed by more than 3,000 newspapers and magazines. If we realize that Dr. Goebbels in addition was making broadcasts in an anti-Semitic spirit, we do not need any further explanations for the fact that the interest in a onesided anti-Semitic journal should disappear and that did in fact happen.

It is particularly significant that at that time it has been repeatedly suggested to forbid "The Stuermer" altogether. This is brought out clearly in the testimony of Fritzsche as a witness on 27 June 1946, who stated in addition that neither Streicher nor the "Stuermer" had any influence in the Ministry of Propaganda and that the paper was considered to a certain extent as non-existent.

It might have been for the same reason that the "Stuermer" was not even declared as a press organ of the NSDAP, and was not even entitled to bear the party's insignia (Hoheitszeichen). It was considered, from the viewpoint of party and state administration, contrary to all papers which were held to be of any significance, as a private paper belonging to a mere private writer.

The firm which published the "Stuermer" and which belonged at that time to a certain Haerdel was not inclined, however, to accept so simply the shrinking circle of its readers, for it was now aided by the fact that Streicher had become the highest political leader in Franconia, and it knew how to make the most of this circumstance. Already at that time pressure was exerted on many sections of the population to the effect that they should prove their loyal political attitude and trustworthiness by taking out a subscription to the "Stuermer." The witness Fritzsche had also pointed out this circumstance and has stated that many Germans only decided to subscribe to the Stuermer because they thought it would be a means of paving the way for their intended membership in the Party. In order not to give a false impression of the number of editions of the "Stuermer" during the years 1923 to 1933, the following analysis will show the different stages of its development:

DEFENSE

In the years 1923 to 1933 the "Stuermer" was able to increase its circulation from some 3,000 to some 10,000 copies, and this went up again to some 20,000 shortly before the seizure of power. On the average, however, between 1923 and 1931 the publication could only claim some 6,000 copies. With the transfer of power by the end of 1933 it had reached an average of some 28,000 copies. It was only in 1935 that the publishing firm of the "Stuermer" became the property of the defendant Streicher, who according to his statement bought it from the widow of the previous owner for 40,000 RM. From 1935 on the management of the firm was taken over by a professional, who succeeded by clever technical propaganda in increasing the number of copies to well over 200,000 and this figure was later surpassed in ever increasing proportion until it reached more than the double. The relatively low number of copies of the "Stuermer" up to the beginning of 1935 shows that despite the party's rise to power, popular interest in the "Stuermer" was present only in a minor degree. The extraordinary increase in the circulation which began in 1935 is to be traced back to the adroit propaganda methods already mentioned, which were employed by the new director Fink. The use of the Labor Front declared in the proclamation of Dr. Ley in No. 36 of the "Stuermer" of 1935 and the acquisition thereby of many thousands of forced subscribers must be ascribed to the personal relations of the manager with Dr. Ley.

In that connection I, furthermore, refer to a quotation from the Pariser Tageblatt of 29 March 1935 which is printed in the "Stuermer" copy of May 1935. Here too, it is stated that the increase of the "Stuermer" circulation cannot be ascribed to the desire of the German people for such kind of spiritual food. It is neither presumable nor probable in any way that the subscription to the "Stuermer," forced on the members of the Labor Front in such a manner, could have actually turned the subscribers into readers of the "Stuermer" and followers of its way of thinking. On the contrary, it is well known that bundles of "Stuermer" copies in their original wrappings were stored in cellars and attics and that they were brought to light again only when the paper shortage became more acute.

When, therefore, the defendant Streicher wrote in his paper in 1935—Document GB 169—that the 15 years work of enlightenment of the “Stuermer” attracted to National Socialism an army of a million of “enlightened” members, he did claim a success for which there was no foundation whatsoever. The men and women who joined the party after 1933 did not apply for membership as a result of the so-called enlightenment work of the “Stuermer,” but either because they believed the Party’s promises, hoping to derive advantages from it or, as the witness Severing expressed it, because by belonging to the Party they wanted to insure themselves against political persecutions.

The sympathy for the party and its leadership very soon decreased considerably. Also the defendant Streicher, lost authority and influence in an ever-increasing measure even in his own district (Gau) of Franconia, at least from 1937 on. The reasons herefore are sufficiently known.

Toward the end of 1938 he saw himself deprived of practically all political influence even in his own district. The controversy between him and Goering ended with the victory of the latter. Hitler, upon the urgent request of the defendant Goering, had dropped Streicher completely, as the Commander in Chief of the Luftwaffe at that time was naturally more important and far more influential than Gauleiter Streicher. The defendant even had to tolerate that the aryanization carried out in the district of Franconia was being re-examined for its correctness by a special commission sent by Goering. In the course of the year 1939 Streicher was completely pushed aside and was even forbidden to talk in public. At the outbreak of the war, in contrast to all other Gauleiters, he was not even appointed to the position of Wehrkreiskomissar of his own district.

During the last phase, in the years of the war, the defendant Streicher had no political influence whatsoever. As of February 1940 he was removed from his position as a Gauleiter and lived on his estate in Pleikershof, cut off from all connections. Even party-members were forbidden to visit him there. From the end of 1938, he had no connections whatsoever with Hitler, by whom he had been completely abandoned from that time on.

In what way now did the “Stuermer” exert any influence during the war period?

It can be said that during the war the “Stuermer” aroused no considerable attention any more. The grimness of the time, the anxiety for relatives on the front, the battles at the front, and finally the heavy air attacks completely diverted the German people’s interest from questions dealt with in the “Stuermer.”

DEFENSE

The people were fed up with the continuous repetition of the same assertions. The best proof of how little the "Stuermer" was desired as reading matter is ascertained by the fact that in restaurants and cafes the "Stuermer" was always readily available at the news stands, whereas other papers and magazines were forever taken up.

The circulation total decreased steadily and irresistibly. The influence of the "Stuermer" in the political sphere became non-existent. During the already mentioned periods the "Stuermer" was being rejected by large circles of the population from the very start. There can be no idea of the exertion of an influence by the "Stuermer" upon the German people or even upon the party. Its crude style, its often pornographic illustrations, and its one-sidedness aroused manifold displeasure.

Although the German people, for years, had been practically deluged with Nazi propaganda, or rather because of that very fact, a journal such as the "Stuermer" could exert no influence upon its inner attitude. Had the German people—as is maintained by the prosecution—actually been saturated with the spirit of racial hatred, other factors certainly would have been far more responsible for it than the "Stuermer" and would have contributed far more essentially to a hostile attitude toward the Jews.

But nothing of such nature can be established. The general attitude of the German people was not anti-Semitic, at any rate not in such a sense or to such a degree that they would have desired or approved of physical annihilation of the Jews. The official Party propaganda in regard to the Jewish problem had exerted no influence upon the broad masses of the German people and it had not educated them in the direction desired by the State leadership.

This can already be ascertained from the fact that it was necessary to decree a number of legal regulations in order to segregate the German population from the Jewish. The first example of this is the so-called Law for the Protection of German Blood and Honor (Rassenschutzgesetz) of September 1935, by the provisions of which any racial intermingling of German people with sectors of the Jewish population was subjected to the death penalty. The passing of such laws would not have been necessary had the German people been predisposed to an anti-Semitic attitude, for they would then of their own accord have insisted upon a segregation from Jews.

The law for the elimination of Jews from the German economic life, promulgated in November 1938, is running along the same line. In a people hostile toward the Jews, any trade with Jewish circles would have necessarily ceased and their business would have automatically come to a stand-still.

In reality, however, the intervention of the state was required to eliminate Jewry from the economic life.

The same conclusion can be drawn from the reaction of the greater part of the German populace to the demonstrations carried out against the Jews during the night from 9th to 10th November 1938.

It is proven that these acts of violence were not committed spontaneously by the German people but that they were organized and executed with the aid of the state and party apparatus upon instructions of Dr. Goebbels in Berlin.

The result and the effect of these demonstrations directed by the state, which in a cynical way were portrayed abroad as an expression of indignation of the German people over the assassination of the secretary of the Embassy in Paris, von Rath, were totally different than had been visualized by the originators of this demonstration.

These acts of violence and excesses, based upon the lowest instincts, were unanimously rejected in the circles of the party and even of its leadership.

In place of creating hostility toward the Jewish population they roused pity and compassion with their fate.

Hardly any other measure taken by the NSDAP was ever rejected in such a way on all hands. The effect upon the public was so incisive that the defendant Rosenberg in his capacity of "Gau-leiter" found it necessary to make an address in Nurnberg, warning against an exaggerated sympathy for the Jews. According to his deposition he did not do this because he approved these measures but only in order to strengthen by his influence the heavily impaired prestige of the party.

Previously, as it follows from the testimony of the witness Fritz Herrwerth examined here, he refused to SA-Obergruppenfuehrer v. Obernitz to take part personally in the planned demonstration and designated the latter as being useless and prejudicial. He publicly expressed this standpoint later also, during a meeting of the League of Jurists at Nurnberg. In doing so he took the risk of placing himself in an open opposition to the official policy of the State.

All these facts show that despite the anti-Jewish propaganda carried on by the Government, an actual hostility against the Jewish population did not exist in the people itself. Thus it is proved already that Streicher's publications in the "Stuermer" as well as his speeches have neither had a provoking effect upon the German people in the sense upheld by the prosecution.

DEFENSE

Therefore the proof for an incitement to the hatred of Jews, successfully carried out and leading to a criminal end, cannot be furnished by pointing to the general attitude of the German nation. But the prosecution has supported its reproach to that effect by the specific assertion that only a nation educated to the absolute hatred of Jews by men like the defendant could approve of such measures like the mass extermination of Jews. Thereby the reproach is made to the totality of the Germans that they knew about the extermination of the Jews and they approved of it, a reproach, the severity and consequences of which upon the whole future of the German nation, cannot be estimated at all.

But did really the German nation approve of these measures?

Only an occurrence which is known can be approved of. Therefore, should this assertion of the prosecution be considered as proved, logically it must also be considered as proved that the German nation actually knew of these occurrences.

However, the hearing of evidence to that effect has shown that the "Reichsfuehrer" SS Himmler, charged with the mass assassinations by Hitler, and his close collaborators have surrounded this whole story with the veil of deepest secrecy. By threatening with the most severe punishments any violation of the absolute commandment of silence which was imposed, they managed to lower before the events in the East in the extermination camps, an iron curtain which hermetically shut off these facts from the public.

Hitler and Himmler prevented even the corps of highest leaders of party and state from gaining any insight and information. Hitler did not hesitate to supply with false informations even his closest collaborators like Reich Minister Dr. Lammers, who was heard here as a witness, and to make him believe that the removal of the European Jews to the East meant their settlement in the Eastern territories and not at all their extermination. Although the statements of the defendants may deviate in many points, yet in this connection they all agree so completely one with the other and with the statements of other witnesses, that the veracity of their testimonies simply can not be questioned. If it was not even possible for the defendant Frank in his capacity as Governor General of Poland to get through to Auschwitz, because without Himmler's special consent he himself was denied entrance, then this fact speaks for itself.

If, however, even the leading personalities of the Third Reich with the exception of a very small circle were not informed and if even they had at best very vague informations, then how could the public at large have known it! Under these circumstances the possibilities for finding out what was going on in the camps were extremely scanty.

For the majority of the people, foreign news was eliminated as a source of information. Listening to foreign radio stations was threatened with the heaviest penalties and therefore did not take place. And when it did, the news broadcast by foreign radio stations concerning events in the East were, however or rather because they corresponded to facts, so coarse, so horrible beyond any human understanding, that they were bound to appear to any normal individual, and in fact did, as intentional propaganda.

On the whole, Germany could gain knowledge of the extermination measures against Jewry only from people which either themselves were working in the camps or came in contact with the camp or its inmates, and, lastly, from former concentration camp inmates.

There is no need to explain that members of the camp personnel kept silent, not only because they were strictly compelled to do so, but also in their own interest. Furthermore, it is known that Himmler had threatened death penalty for any information from the camps and the spreading of information about the camps, and that not only the actual culprit, but also his relatives, were threatened with this punishment. Finally, it is known that the extermination camps proper were so hermetically cut off from any contact with the world that nothing concerning the events which took place therein could penetrate to the public. The camp inmates who came into contact during their work with fellow-workers kept silence because they had to keep silent. People who came to the camps were also under the threat of this punishment, inasmuch as they were at all able to obtain some insight, a thing which was all but impossible in the extermination camps.

From these sources, accordingly, a knowledge for the German people could not flow.

But the absolute order for silence was compulsory to a still greater measure for every concentration camp inmate who had been released. Anyhow, hardly anybody ever came back to life from the actual murder camps. But if, once in a time, a man or a woman was released, the danger of their being sent back into the camp was hovering above them if they infringed on order for silence, and this in addition to the other threatened punishments, and this renewed detention would have been tantamount to gruesome death.

It was therefore nearly impossible to learn from released concentration camp prisoners positive facts concerning the occurrences in the camps. This being the case with regard to normal concentration camps in Germany, it applied in a still greater measure to the extermination camps.

DEFENSE

Every lawyer who, as I did, defended people before their detention in a concentration camp and who was visited by them again after their release will be able to confirm that it was not possible, even for a man holding such a position of trust and under the protection of a lawyer's professional secret, to get former concentration camp inmates to talk.

If men such as Severing, who testified here, a social democrat of long standing who was highly trusted by his party comrades and who was, because of this, in touch with many former concentration camp inmates came to know the real facts connected with the extermination of the Jews but very late and even then to a very restricted extent, then such considerations ought to apply even more to any normal German.

It can be derived with absolute certainty from these facts that the government, that Hitler and Himmler wanted under all circumstances to keep secret the genocide (Ausbildung) of the Jews, and this forms the base for another argument—in my opinion, a cogent one—against the anti-Semitism of the German people asserted by the prosecution.

If the German people had indeed been filled with such a hate against Jewry as the prosecution affirms, then such rigorous methods for secrecy would have been superfluous. On the contrary, if Hitler had been convinced that the German nation saw in the Jews its principal enemy, that it approved of and desired the extermination of Jewry, then he would have been forced, of needs, to publish the plans for and likewise the accomplishment of the extermination of this very enemy. Under the sign of total war as constantly propagandized by Hitler and Goebbels, there would indeed have been no better means to strengthen the faith in victory and the will of the people to fight than the information, that Germany's principal enemy, this very Jewish people, had already been annihilated.

An unscrupulous propagandist such as Goebbels certainly would not have failed to use such a striking argument if he could have taken as a basis the necessary presupposition, that is, the German people's determined will to exterminate the Jews.

However, the "final solution" of the Jewish question had by all means to be kept secret even from the German people who had, for years, stood under the hardest possible pressure by the Gestapo. Even leading persons of state and party were not allowed to learn of the "final solution."

It seems that Hitler and Himmler were themselves convinced that even in the midst of a total war and after decades of education and gagging by National Socialism, the German nation and, above all, its armed forces would have reacted most violently to the publication of such a policy against the Jews.

The policy of secrecy followed here cannot be explained by any consideration for enemy nations. In the years 1942 and 1943 the whole world was already engaged in a bitter war against National Socialist Germany. An aggravation of this struggle hardly seemed possible, certainly not by publishing facts which had long since become known abroad. Aside from this, the consideration of making a still worse impression on the enemy countries could hardly influence men as Hitler, Goebbels, and Himmler.

If they would have counted even upon the smallest possible positive result of a publication of the genocide of the Jews, then they certainly would not have omitted such publications, on the contrary, they would have tried by all means to strengthen the faith in victory of the German people therewith. The fact that they have not done so is the best proof that even they did not consider the German people as radically anti-Semitic, and it is the best proof too, that one cannot speak of such anti-Semitism on the part of the German people.

Therefore, even had the defendant, with his publications, aimed at such an end, he did not reach such a goal.

In this connection, light should be thrown upon the part attributed by the prosecution to the defendant Streicher, that he had educated the German youth in an anti-Semitic spirit and that he had sunk the poison of anti-Semitism so deeply into the hearts of the youth that this pernicious result would make itself felt a long time after actual life yet.

What the defendant is mainly blamed for in this connection, reproach is to be seen in the fact that young people, due to the Streicher education in hatred toward Jews, were supposed to have been ready to commit crimes against Jews, which otherwise they would not have committed and that youth thus educated might be expected to perpetrate such crimes in the future too.

The prosecution here relies mainly on the juvenile books which were put out by the publishing house of the Stuermer and some announcements addressed to Youth which appeared in this paper.

Far be it from me to extenuate or defend these products. Evaluation of them can and must be left to the Tribunal. In accordance with the basic principle of the defense the only question to be taken up here will be whether or not the defendant, in one way or another, influenced the education of Youth toward criminal hatred of Jews.

DEFENSE

As far as the books which have been mentioned are concerned, it must be said that for the greater part German Youth did not know them at all, much less read them. No evidence has been produced to substantiate the contrary which is assumed by the prosecution.

The healthy common sense of German Youth refused such stuff. German boys and girls preferred other reading material. It may well be emphasized here, that neither the contents of nor the illustrations in these books could prove in any way attractive to youth. They were of necessity much more likely to be avoided. Of special importance in regard to this point is the fact that defendant Baldur von Schirach, the man responsible for the education of the whole body of German youth, as a witness declared under oath that the mentioned juvenile books of the publishing company were neither circulated by the Hitler Youth leaders nor found a circle of readers among the Hitler Youth.

The witness made the same assertions for the "Stuermer." One of his closest co-workers, witness Lauterbacher, declared on this subject that the "Stuermer" was actually forbidden for the Hitler Youth by defendant von Schirach.

It is clear that the very style and the pictures of the "Stuermer" were not suited to attract the interest of a young person or even to offer him ethical support. The measure taken by the Reich Youth leaders is therefore quite understandable.

If some of the "Stuermer" articles submitted by the prosecution seem to indicate that the "Stuermer" was read in youth circles and there produced a certain effect, then it should be said on this point that typical works, that is, works ordered for propaganda purposes were concerned. No proof whatsoever has been furnished for the assertion of the prosecution that German youth harbored criminal hate toward Jews.

Accordingly, neither the German nation nor its youth can be termed criminally anti-Semitic in the sense of the indictment, and so all foundation is taken from the charge made against the defendant Streicher that he educated the youth and the nation on these lines.

Now, one might be tempted to assume that the "Stuermer" exercised an especially great influence upon the organizations of the party, the SA and SS, but this was not the case either.

The SA, the largest mass organization of the party, rejected the "Stuermer" in the same way as the mass of the people did. Its publications were "The SA Leader" and "The SA." From these, the mass of the SA drew the foundation of their ideology. These publications do not contain even one article written by the pen of the defendant Streicher. If the latter had really been the man the prosecution thinks him, the authoritative and most influential propagandist of anti-Semitism, he would necessarily have been called in for collaboration in these publications, which were issued to instruct the SA in the Jewish question. A publication, aiming at ideological education, would never have been able to dispense with the collaboration of such a man.

The fact that Julius Streicher never once made an utterance of any kind in these papers demonstrates again that the picture, drawn of him by the prosecution, does not correspond in any way to the actual facts. Through his own publication, the defendant Streicher could not gain any influence over the SA, and the columns of "The SA Leader" and "The SA" were closed to him. Even the highest SA leaders declined to advocate his ideas. With regard to this the SA deputy chief of staff "SA-Obergruppenfuehrer" Juettner, made the following statement when he was heard as witness before the commission on 21 May 1946, he said:

"At a leader conference, the former SA chief of staff, Lutze, expressed his wish that there should be no propaganda for the "Stuermer" in the SA. In certain groups the "Stuermer" was even prohibited. The contents of the "Stuermer" disgusted and repelled most of the SA men. The policy of the SA with regard to the Jewish question was in no way directed at the extermination of the Jews, the fight aimed only at preventing a large scale immigration of Jews from the East."

Thus the ideology of the "Stuermer" was rejected on principle by the individual SA man as well as by the SA leaders, and it is, therefore, out of the question to speak of any influence of Streicher upon the SA.

Not only was the defendant Streicher not asked to collaborate in SA publications, his articles did not appear in any other newspapers and publications. Neither in the "Voelkischer Beobachter" nor in other leading organs of the German press was he allowed to say a word, although, according to the will of the propaganda ministry, the enlightenment in the Jewish question was supposed to belong to the noblest tasks of the German press.

Even otherwise, the defendant Streicher did not get any opportunity from the state leadership or the propaganda ministry to impress his ideas upon a wider circle. The defendant Fritzsche, the man who had also the right of decision in the propaganda ministry declared as a witness that Streicher never exerted any influence upon propaganda, that he was completely disregarded.

DEFENSE

Thus, in particular, he was not entrusted with broadcasting speeches, although just an address over the radio would have had an entirely different mass effect than an article in the "Stuermer" which necessarily affected only a limited circle. The fact that even the official propaganda of the third Reich did not utilize the defendant Streicher makes apparent that his activity would not have promised any effect, that in fact he did not exert any influence at all. The official German state government recognized Streicher as what he actually was, the unimportant publisher of a really unimportant weekly.

The fundamental attitude of the German people, as once more it must be said with all clarity, was as little radically anti-Semitic as that of the German Youth and also that of the party organizations. Any success in instigating and inciting to criminal anti-Semitism is therefore not proven.

I now come to the last and decisive part of the accusation, i.e., to the examination of the question: Who were the persons mainly responsible for the orders given for the mass-extinction of Jewry, how was it possible that men were found ready to execute these orders and whether, without the influence of defendant Streicher, such orders would have neither been given nor executed.

The main person responsible for the final solution of the Jewish question, the extermination of Jewry in Europe, is without doubt Hitler himself. Though this greatest trial of all in world history suffers from the deficiency that the chief offenders are not sitting in the defendants' box, because they are either dead or not to be found. The facts ascertained have, nevertheless, resulted in cogent conclusions concerning the actual responsibility.

It can be considered as proved that beyond any doubt Hitler was a man of unique and even demoniacal brutality and disregard, whereto was added in the latter years that he had lost all sense of proportion and all self-control.

Ruthless brutality was the principal feature of his character, this became apparent for the first time in its full force when the so-called Roehm Rebellion was suppressed in June 1934. On this occasion Hitler did not hesitate to have his oldest fellow-combatants shot without any process of law. His unrestrained radicalism was further revealed in the way the war with Poland was conducted. Only because he feared an antagonistic attitude toward Germany on the part of leading circles in the Polish nation did he order their ruthless extermination. His orders at the beginning of the Russian campaign were still more drastic. Already at that time he ordered the extermination of Jewry in separate actions.

These examples show beyond doubt that respect for any principles of humanity was alien to this man. Furthermore the proceedings, through the depositions of all defendants, have corroborated the fact that Hitler in basic decisions was not open to any outside influence.

Hitler's basic attitude toward the Jewish question is known. He had become an anti-Semite already during his time in Vienna in the years before the first world war. However, no actual proofs exist that Hitler from the very beginning had such a radical solution of the Jewish question in mind as was finally effected in the annihilation of European Jewry. When the prosecution declares that from the book "Mein Kampf" there was a direct road leading to the crematories of Mauthausen and Auschwitz, that is only an assumption, but no evidence for it has been given. The evidence speaks much rather for the fact that Hitler too wanted to see the Jewish problem in Germany solved by way of emigration. This thought, as well as the position of the Jewish part of the population under alien laws, was the official state policy of the Third Reich.

Many of the leading anti-Semites considered the Jewish question as settled after the laws of 1935 had been passed. The defendant Streicher shared this opinion. A more severe attitude of Hitler's in the Jewish question cannot be traced further back than to the end of 1938, or beginning of 1939. Then only it became apparent that in case of war—which he believed was propagated by the Jews—he planned a different solution.

In his speech at the Reichstag on 30 January 1939 he predicted the extermination of the Jewry in case a second world war was let loose against Germany.

He expressed the same ideas in a speech made in February 1942, at the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the day the party was founded. And finally also his testament confirms his exclusive responsibility for the murdering of European Jewry as a whole.

Though a more severe attitude on the Jewish question had been taken up by Hitler since the beginning of the war there is nothing that goes to show that he visualized the extermination of the Jews right at the beginning of the war. It can be clearly seen that this last resolution, no doubt, came about when Hitler, presumably as early as 1942, saw that it was impossible to bring the war to a victorious end for Germany.

It can be assumed almost with certainty that the decision for exterminating the Jews was made by—as were almost all of Hitler's plans—and originated exclusively from himself. It can not be ascertained with certainty to what extent others, who were closely attached to Hitler, brought their influence to bear on him.

DEFENSE

If such influences did exist they can have only come from Himmler, Bormann, and Goebbels. That much can be stated beyond any doubt at any rate that during the decisive period from September 1939 to October 1942 Streicher—things being as they were—neither influenced Hitler nor would have been able to influence him.

At this time Streicher was living, deprived of all his offices and completely left in the cold, at his farm in Pleikershof. He had no connection with Hitler neither personally nor by correspondence. This has been proved beyond doubt by the statements of witness Fritz Herrwerth, Adele Streicher, and the statement under oath of the defendant himself. But that Hitler was instigated to his orders of wholesale murder by his reading of the "Stuermer" can, I believe, not be maintained in earnest.

So it has been made clear that defendant Streicher had no influence at all on the man who made the decision and on the decisive order to exterminate the Jewry.

In October 1942 Bormann's decree came out ordering the extermination of Jewry (Doc. 3244-PS). This order came from Hitler, there is no doubt about that, and went to Reichsfuehrer SS Heinrich Himmler who was charged with the actual execution of the extermination of the Jews.

He, for his part, charged with the final execution Chief of the Gestapo Mueller and his commissioner for Jewish affairs Eichmann. So after Hitler, these three men are the main responsible ones.

That Streicher had any possibility of influencing them or actually supposedly influenced them has not been proved.

He ascertains irrefutably that he never knew either Eichmann or Mueller, and that his connection to Himmler was but loose and far from being friendly.

That Himmler was one of the most radical anti-Semites of the party need merely be mentioned. From the beginning he had advocated a merciless fight against Jews and was moreover, from all that we know of him, not a man who would have allowed himself to be influenced by another in matters of principle. But aside from that, a comparison of the two personalities shows a priori that Himmler was in every way the stronger and more superior man so that even for this reason the exertion of any influence by defendant Streicher on Himmler may be ruled out.

I believe I may refrain from further illustration of this point.

I now come to the question whether the activity of defendant Streicher had a decisive influence on the men actually executing the orders that is on the one hand on members of special purpose groups (Einsatzgruppen) and on the other hand on the executive commandos in the concentration camps (KZ's) and whether it was at all necessary to prepare these men spiritually and intellectually to make them willing to execute such measures.

The Reichsfuehrer SS stated unequivocally in his speeches in Nikolajew, Posen, and Charkow, which already have often been mentioned here, not only, that he with Hitler was responsible for the final solution of the Jewish question, but also that the execution of the orders had been possible only by the utilization of forces selected by himself among the SS.

We know from Ohlendorf's testimony that the so-called Einsatzgruppen (Task force) consisted of members of the Gestapo and the SD, of companies of the Waffen SS, of members of the police force with long years of service, and of natives.

It must be stated as a primary statement that the defendant Streicher never had the slightest influence on the ideological attitude of the SS. There is no shadow of a proof among the extensive material of evidence of this trial that Streicher had any connections with the SS. The alleged enemy No. 1 of the Jews, the great propagandist for the persecution of the Jews as he has been pictured by the prosecution, the defendant Streicher, never had the opportunity to write in the periodical "Das Schwarze Korps" (The Black Corps) or even in "SS-Leithefte" (SS-Guide Magazine). These periodicals alone, however, as the official mouthpieces of the Reichsfuehrer SS, determined the ideological attitude of the Schutzstaffel. These SS periodicals determined their attitude toward the Jewish question. In these circles the "Stuermer" was read just as little as in other circles, it was rejected.

Himmler himself rejected Streicher ironically as an ideologist. Therefore, the defendant Streicher could not have influenced ideologically the SS members of the "Einsatzgruppen," far less the old soldiers of the police and the least of all the foreign units.

Also the execution squads in the concentration camps could not be ideologically determined by him. Those men originated for the most part from the Totenkopfverbaende (scull units), that is, the old guard units, for whom the above mentioned is true in a higher degree. Added to this is the fact that the experienced police soldiers, as well as the SS men with long years of service were trained in absolute obedience to their leaders. Absolute obedience to a Fuehrer command was a foregone conclusion for both.

Even those experienced police men, accustomed to absolute obedience, even the experienced SS could not be without any more ado entrusted by Himmler to carry out the execution of Jews.

DEFENSE

Rather, Himmler had to select men in which he trusted as heads of those execution squads and make them personally responsible for their duties, he pointed out explicitly that he would take all responsibility and that he himself did not but pass on a definite order of Hitler.

So little did even those men, who were supposed to be, according to the assertion of the prosecution, the Elite of Nazism become enemies of the Jews in the sense as asserted by the indictment, that the entire authority of the head of State and Fuehrer and of his most brutal follower Himmler was necessary to force upon the men responsible for carrying out the execution orders the conviction that their order was based on the will of the authoritarian Head of the State; an order which, according to their conviction, had the power of a fundamental State law, therefore was above all criticism.

Thus it was not ideological reasons nor Streicher's instigation of those who were, as the prosecution contends, commissioned with the carrying out of annihilation that made these men carry out orders, but exclusively and solely the obedience to an order from Hitler transmitted to them by Himmler, and the knowledge that not to carry out a Fuehrer order meant death.

Thus in this respect too Streicher's influence has not been proved.

The accusations brought against the defendant by the prosecution are herewith exhausted.

But in order to reach a conclusion, to form a judgment of the defendant that does full justice to the actual findings, it seems necessary to give once more a short summary of his personality and his activity under the Hitler regime.

The prosecution considers him to be the leading anti-Semite and the leading advocate of the most violent determination to annihilate Jewry.

This conception, however, does no more justice to the role of the defendant and his actual influence than it does to his personality. Already the manner in which the defendant was used in the Third Reich and called in for the propagandizing and for the final solution of the Jewish question shows the incorrectness of the conception held by the prosecution. The only time the defendant was called upon to take an active part in the fight against Jewry was in his capacity of a chairman of the action-committee for the anti-Jewish boycott-day on 1 April 1933. He showed an attitude on that day which stands in direct contrast to his utterances in the "Stuermer." One can see from it that the utterances in his paper which are under scrutiny were purely for the purpose of creating a tendency. In spite of the fact that on that day he could have used the entire power of the state and of the party against Jewry, he merely ordered the identification of Jewish places of business and the guarding of Jewish business places. In connection with this he gave explicit orders that any molestation or act of violence against the Jews as well as damaging of Jewish property was forbidden and punishable.

In the time which followed no further use at all was made of the defendant. Not even for the ideological founding of the showdown with Jewry was he consulted. Neither through the press nor over the radio could he express his ideas. Neither the Party in its training letters (Schulungsbriefe) nor the organizations in their periodicals availed themselves of his pen for the clarification of the Jewish question.

Hitler did not charge him, but the defendant Rosenberg, with the ideological training of the German people. The latter was responsible for the Institute for the Investigation into the Jewish Question, not the defendant Streicher, he was not even contemplated as collaborator in this institute.

The defendant Rosenberg was commissioned with the arrangement of an anti-Jewish congress in 1944. This assembly, however, never took place, but it is significant that the participation of the defendant Streicher was not even planned.

The entire anti-Jewish laws and decrees of the Third Reich were drafted without his participation. He was not even called in for the drafting of the race laws which were proclaimed on the Party rally in Nurnberg in 1935. The defendant Streicher did not take part in any conference concerning a question of some importance during peace and war. His name is not on any list of participants, on any protocol. Not even in the actual discussions is his name mentioned once.

The fight against Jewry in the Third Reich became more severe from year to year, especially after the outbreak and in the course of the war. In contrast to this, however, the influence of the defendant Streicher decreased from year to year. Already during the year 1939 he was almost entirely pushed aside, without any connection to Hitler or other leading men of State and party. Since 1940 he was relieved of his office as Gau-Leader and politically a dead man since.

If the defendant Streicher really had been the man whom the prosecution believes him to be, his influence and his activity would have increased automatically with the intensification of the fight against the Jews. The end would not have been, as it actually was, political impotence and banishment, but the commission to carry out the destruction of Jewry.

DEFENSE

By writing ad nauseam on the same subject for years in a clumsy, crude, and violent manner the defendant Streicher—as cannot be denied—has brought upon himself the hatred of the world. He has hereby created a strong feeling against him which resulted in rating his importance and his influence far beyond his real importance and which now entails the danger for him that his responsibility will be misjudged likewise.

The defendant who in this case has an ungrateful and difficult task had to limit himself to presenting those aspects and facts which allow a clear recognition in its true extent of the importance of this man and of the role which he played in the tragedy of National Socialism.

But it cannot be the task of the defense to deny undeniable facts and to shield actions for which simply no excuse exists.

The fact remains that this defendant took part in the destruction of the Main Synagogue of Nurnberg and thus allowed a place of religious worship to fall into decay.

The defendant states as an excuse that his aim hereby was not the demolition of a building destined for religious worship but the removal of an edifice which did not fit into the style of the Nurnberg old city and had a disturbing effect and that this, his opinion, had been shared by art experts. That this is truth was proved by the fact that he had left the second Jewish house of worship untouched until it finally and without him having anything to do with it went up in flames in the night from the 9th to the 10th November. However that may be, the defendant has shown here the same ruthlessness as in his other actions. He himself has to account here for his actions, the defense cannot shield him. But here too it must be said that the population of Nurnberg disapproved of these actions clearly and unmistakably. It was clear to any impartial observer that the people viewed such actions with icy coldness and only by brutal force could be made to put up with such measures and to witness such absurdities.

It is just as impossible for the defense to express any opinion regarding the reopening of the question of the ritual murder myth. These articles, to be sure, found no interest whatsoever, but their tendency is clear. The only point which, beside the good faith which we have to grant him, is extenuating for the defendant is the fact that it was not he who wrote these articles, but Holz; he cannot avoid however that the fact is held against him that he allowed it to happen.

It must be hard to understand that the defendant still took part in publication of the “Stuermer” after having long since been politically crippled and sent into exile. This very fact better than anything else reveals his one track mind.

When the prosecution accuses the defendant of having aimed at physical annihilation of the Jews and of having prepared the way for this later result with the things he published, then I would like to refer to the statements of the defendant given under oath when he was interrogated as a witness to which I am here referring to their full extent.

The defendant claims that in the long series of "Stuermer" articles published since its beginning there was none which asked for real acts of violence against Jews. Furthermore, that among the more than thousand issues there could be found only about 15 which contained expressions which could be held against him in the meaning of the indictment.

On the contrary, the defendant argued that his articles and his speeches always had displayed an unmistakable tendency to bring about a wholesale and universal solution of the Jewish problem, since a partial solution of any kind could not have any purpose and did not get at the heart of the problem. Even from this view point he had always expressed himself unequivocally against measures of violence of any kind and he would never have approved of an action, as was finally carried out by Hitler in such a gruesome manner.

There must be serious doubts, whether this appears to prove to the defendant that he ever approved of the resultant mass murder of Jewry and I leave the decision about this to the Tribunal. He personally however refers to the fact that he did not receive certain knowledge of these wholesale murders before 1944, a fact which was corroborated by the statements of the witnesses Adele Streicher and Hiemer.

He considered the articles published in the Isr. Wochenblatt (Zionist Periodical) as a means of propaganda and consequently did not believe them. In his favor is the fact that up to the fall of 1943 he did not express in any article a satisfaction over the fate of Jewry in the East.

When he wrote at that time about the vanishing of the Jewish reservoir in the East it cannot be surmised that he had available any source for an authentic confirmation. He might of course have been of the opinion that this vanishing process was not identical with physical annihilation but was rather to be considered in the light of evacuation of the collected Jewish population to foreign countries or into territory of the Soviet Union.

As no proof has been presented for the fact that the defendant had received hints from any quarters with regard to the intended extermination of Jewry, he could not have conceived such a satanic occurrence, as it appears to be absolutely inconceivable to the human mind. Certainly, it can not be assumed that the mental capacity of the defendant should have put him into a position to foresee such a solution of the Jewish question, which could only have originated from the brain of a person no longer a master of his mind.

DEFENSE

The defendant describes himself as a fanatic and seeker of truth. He professes to have written nothing and to have expressed nothing in his speeches, which he had not taken from some authentic source and corroborated accordingly.

There is no doubt he was a fanatic. The fanatic, however, is a man who is so possessed or convinced of an idea or an illusion that he will not be open to any other consideration and is convinced of the correctness of his idea and nothing else. For the psychiatrist it is a sort of mental cramp.

Every kind of fanaticism is not far from the ideas of a maniac. Together with it there is to be found as a rule a remarkable overestimation and overvaluation of one's own personality and of its influence on the world around it. Not one of the defendants here on trial shows such a discrepancy between fact and fancy as does the defendant Streicher.

The prosecution presented what he appeared to be to the outside world. What he actually was and is, has been shown by the trial.

But only actual facts can form the basis for the judgment. Consider in your judgment also that the defendant in his position as Gau-leader of Franconia showed also many humane features, that he had a great number of political prisoners released from concentration camps, which even resulted in criminal proceedings against him. It should also be mentioned that he treated the prisoners of war, and foreign workers working on his estate, very well in every respect.

Whatever the judgment against the defendant Streicher may be, it only will be concerned with the fate of an individual.

It seems to be established, however, that the German people and this defendant were never in agreement on this important question. The German people always disapproved the aims of this defendant as he expressed them in his publications and retained its own opinion of and attitude toward the Jews. The assumption of the prosecution that the biased articles in the "Stuermer" had found any echo or ready acceptance among the German population or even an attitude ready to accept criminal measures is herewith fully refuted.

The overwhelming majority in the German nation preserved their sound sense and showed themselves disinclined toward all acts of violence.

It may therefore assume that it will be declared free of all moral complicity and co-responsibility of those crimes before the public tribunal of the world and will again take its place in the ranks of the nations.

The decision as to guilt or innocence of this defendant I shall however place in the hands of the Tribunal.

2. FINAL PLEA by Julius Streicher

Gentlemen of the Tribunal.

At the beginning of this trial I was asked by the President whether I pleaded guilty in the sense of the Indictment. I answered that question in the negative.

The accomplished proceedings and the taking of evidence have confirmed the correctness of my statement given at that time.

It has been established:

1. Mass killings exclusively and without influence were carried through by order of the head of the State, Adolf Hitler.

2. The execution of the mass killings was carried through without the knowledge of the German people and under complete secrecy by the Reichsfuehrer SS, Heinrich Himmler.

The Prosecution asserted that the mass killings would not have been possible without Streicher and his "Stuermer." The Prosecution neither offered nor submitted proof for this assertion.

It is clearly established that on the occasion of the anti-Boycott Day in the year 1933, which I was given the order to lead, and on the occasion of the demonstration of 1938 ordered by Reichsminister Dr. Goebbels, I, in my capacity as Gauleiter, neither ordered, demanded, nor participated in any violations against Jews.

It is further established that in many articles in my periodical, the "Stuermer," I represented the Zionist demand for the creation of a Jewish state as the natural solution of the Jewish problem.

These facts prove that I did not wish for a solution of the Jewish problem in a forcible manner.

If I, or other authors, in some articles of my weekly paper, the "Stuermer," mentioned a destruction or extermination of Jewry, then these words were sharp utterances in reply to provoking statements of Jewish authors in which the extermination of the German people was demanded. The mass killings ordered by the leader of the State, Adolf Hitler, according to his last testament, were to be a revenge, a reprisal which was only carried through because of the then recognizable unfavorable course of the war.

DEFENSE

These actions of the leader of the State against the Jews can be explained by his attitude upon the Jewish question, which thoroughly differs from mine. Hitler wanted to punish Jewry because he held them responsible for the unleashing of the war and for the bombs dropped on the German civilian population.

It is deeply regrettable that the mass killings which can be traced back to a personal decision of the leader of the State, Adolf Hitler, have led to a treatment of the German people which also must be considered as being inhumane. The executed mass killings I reject in the same way as they are being rejected by every decent German.

Gentlemen of the Tribunal.

Neither in my capacity as Gauleiter nor as political author have I committed a crime, and I therefore look toward your judgment with good conscience.

I have no request to make for myself. I only have a request for the people from whom I originate. Gentlemen of the Tribunal, fate has given you power to pronounce every judgment. Do not pronounce a judgment which would imprint the stamp of dishonesty upon the forehead of an entire nation.

XII. WALTER FUNK

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Fritz Sauter, Defense Counsel

Gentlemen of the Tribunal:

I have the task to examine the case of the defendant Dr. Walter Funk, that is to say, I am to deal with a topic which unfortunately is especially dry and prosaic.

General

The total course of this trial and the particular evidence offered in his own case have proven that the defendant Funk, at no time of the National Socialist regime and in none of the cases indicted here, played a decisive role.

Funk's authority of decision, was always limited by superior power of authority. The statement of the defendant during his personal examination, that he was allowed to proceed as far as to the door, but was never permitted to enter, has been proven by the evidence to be quite correct.

In the Party Funk was entrusted with several tasks only during the last year prior to the seizure of power, that is in 1932. These however were of no practical significance, as they were of short duration. From the seizure of power on Funk was never appointed to an office in the Party. He was never a member of any party organization, neither of the SS nor the SA, nor of the Corps of Political leaders. Funk held a Reichstag-Mandate only for the brief space of slightly more than six months prior to seizure of power. Consequently he was not a member of the Reichstag at the time when the fundamental laws for the consolidation of National Socialist power were passed.

The laws of that time, especially the Enabling Act, presented under 2962-PS and 2963-PS, with the responsibility for which Funk is also charged, were accepted by the Reichs Cabinet at a time when Funk was not yet a member of the Cabinet. He became a member only at the close of 1937, by virtue of his appointment as Minister of Economy (Reichswirtschaftsminister), that is at a time when Cabinet sessions took place no longer. Funk, as press chief of the Reich-Cabinet, had neither a seat nor a vote in the cabinet and could not exert any influence whatsoever upon the contents of the bills. (Statement of Lammers, on pages 7394 and 7395 of the official transcript of 8 April 1946.) The same applies to racial laws, the so-called Nurnberg laws.

Funk had closer relations to the Fuehrer only during the period of 1½ years, in which he held regular press conferences at Hitler's in his capacity as Press-chief of the Reich-Cabinet from February 1933 through August 1934, that is up to the death of Reich President von Hindenburg. Later, Funk met Hitler only very rarely. The witness Dr. Lammers in this respect states the following: Later he, (Funk) in his capacity as Reich Minister of Economy came to see Hitler only extremely rarely. He was not consulted in many conferences, conferences at which he should have been consulted. He complained to me about this frequently. The Fuehrer often raised objections. There were various reasons against Funk. He viewed Funk sceptically and did not want him (p. 7398 of the official transcript of 8 April 1946). Upon the question to the witness Dr. Lammers whether Funk had often expressed to him his grief about his unsatisfactory position as a Reich Minister for Economy and about his anxiety weighing heavily upon him due to the general conditions, Dr. Lammers replied: "I know that Funk had great worries and he was looking for an opportunity to discuss these with the Fuehrer. He had the fervent desire to have a discourse with the Fuehrer in order to be at least partially informed about the war situation." (That was in 1943 and 1944.) "With the best will, it was not possible for Funk to be received by the Fuehrer and it was not possible for me to get him to the Fuehrer." (Pp. 7401 and 7402 of the official German transcript of the afternoon of 8 April 1946.)

DEFENSE

Funk, for the striking fact that during all his ministerial activity he was called to the Fuehrer conferences but four or five times, gives the explanation that Hitler did not need him. Hitler, up to 1942, issued his instructions in economic affairs to Goering, who, in his capacity as Plenipotentiary for the Four-Year-Plan, was responsible for the entire economy and, from the beginning of 1942, to Speer, who as Armament Minister, upon the grant of special authority could issue directives to all branches of production and who as of 1943 personally directed the entire production.

Therefore Funk never played the main part but rather a subaltern role in the economy of the National Socialist Reich. The co-defendant Goering specifically verifies this in his statement of 16 March (p. 6009 of the official German transcript) with the following words: By reason of the special authorities vested in me, he, Funk, certainly had to follow my instructions of economic nature in the sphere of the Ministry of Economy and of the Reichsbank. "I fully and exclusively assume responsibility for any instructions, issued by and any economic policy executed by Funk in his capacity as the Reich-Minister for Economy and President of the Reichsbank." In the session of 20 June even the defendant Speer, as witness declared, that in his capacity as Armament Minister he claimed for himself from the very beginning any authority of decision in the most important economical spheres, such as coal, iron and steel, metal, aluminum, and production of machinery. The entire management of energy and the total building program prior to Speer's commissioning at the beginning of 1942 was under the jurisdiction of Armament Minister Todt.

The evidence submitted by the prosecution in the case of defendant Funk, does not for the greater part bear on personal acts of Funk or instructions issued by him, but it bears rather on the various and manifold positions he occupied. On page 29 of the trial brief the prosecutor himself declares that the argument offered against Funk may be said to be inferential. The prosecution starts from the assumption that Funk, upon the basis of the many positions held by him, must have had knowledge of the various happenings, which are the subject of the accusation. The indictment refers, broadly spoken, to instructions and directives, issued by Funk personally only where the decrees of execution, issued by Funk for the carrying out of the Four-Year-Plan for the elimination of Jews from the economic life in November 1938, were concerned. This chapter will have to be dealt with separately.

At political and military conferences, Funk was not consulted. His position was one of a ministerial expert with far narrow limitations on authority of decisions.

As Reich-Minister for Economy Funk was subordinated to the Four-Year-Plan. Later the Armament Minister had superior authorities. And finally, as was proven by the testimony of witnesses Goering, Lammers, and Hayler, the Ministry for Economy assumed the state of a regular Trade-Ministry, which dealt essentially with the distribution of the consumer goods production and with technical problems in carrying out Foreign trade.

The Four-Year-Plan determined the use of gold and foreign currency in the Reichsbank. The decision about the amount of credits to be granted to the Reich with respect to the internal financing of the war was taken away from the Reichsbank at the time of Funk's assuming office as Reichsbank president. Thereby Funk is exonerated of any responsibility in the financing of the war. The responsible agency therefore was always the Reich-Finance-Minister.

Finally, as General Plenipotentiary for Economy Funk's task in August 1939 solely existed in coordinating civil agencies of economy for such measures as would guarantee a smooth reconversion from peace to war-time economy. The result of these consultations were the proposals which Funk presented to Hitler on 25 August 1939 in the letter which has been quoted several times under 699-PS, GB Exhibit 49. At his examination Funk stated that this letter did not portray matters correctly, since it was a purely private letter, a letter of appreciation for Hitler's birthday congratulations. This point will have to be taken up again later, since the prosecution especially emphasized the position of Funk as General Plenipotentiary for Economy.

Evidence shows that this was the most disputed but also the weakest position of Funk. With regard to the occupied territories Funk had no decisive authority whatsoever. This was demonstrated by all witnesses interrogated regarding this question. But all witnesses equally confirmed that Funk always turned against the pillage of the occupied territories. He fought against the purchases in the black markets, he was against abolishing the foreign exchange regulations in connection with Holland, by which measure the German purchases in Holland were to be facilitated, he organized export to Greece from Germany and from the Eastern European states and even sent gold there (compare testimony of Dr. Neubacher). He repeatedly rose against overburdening the occupied territories financially, especially in 1942 and 1944 against raising the occupation costs in France. He defended the currency of the occupied countries against repeating attempts of devaluation. In the case of Denmark he achieved, even in spite of all opposition, a revalorization. Furthermore Funk fought an arbitrary stabilization of exchange on the occasion of currency regulations in occupied countries. Germany's clearing debt was always recognized by Funk as legitimate commercial debt also with regard to the occupied countries. This is shown especially by his proposal to commercialize this clearing debt by a loan by Germany issued for subscription in all European countries. Funk was opposed to too strong and compulsory an employment of foreign labor in Germany.

DEFENSE

This was also testified by the defendant Sauckel at his interrogation here. All these facts favorably affecting the occupied countries were confirmed by the witnesses Hayler, Landfried, Puhl, Neubacher, and Seyss-Inquart.

According to these statements Funk always strove to keep order in the economic and social life of the occupied territories and protect them from shocks and disturbances. He always was opposed and disinclined to radical and arbitrary measures. He rather was in favor of agreements and compromises. Even during the war Funk always thought of peace. This was stated by the witnesses Landfried and Hayler and they added that Funk was repeatedly reproached for his attitude by the leading state and party offices. Also the defendant Speer testified at his interrogation that Funk, during the war, had occupied too many workers in the consumer goods economy and that this was a reason that Funk had to give up the management of the consumer goods production in 1943.

That Funk the same as Speer has revolted against the horrible "scorched earth" policy has been proved to the Court beside by Speer himself also by the witness Hayler on 7 May 1946. This witness declared that he never saw Funk so upset as in that moment when he was informed of this order for destruction. Funk gave directions, as Hayler had testified, as Reichswirtschaftsminister (Minister for Reich economy) as well as Reichsbankpraesident (President of the Reichbank) to protect the warehouses from the ordered destruction and to assure the supply of commodities necessary for the life of the population, also the currency transactions in the territories which were abandoned.

Funk's economic political goal, one may, indeed, say the contents of his lifework was a European economic community on the basis of just and natural balance of interests of the sovereign countries. Relentlessly even during the war he strove to reach this goal, although the elementary war necessities and the developments brought on by the war naturally hindered these efforts everywhere. The economic Europe, as Funk saw and endeavored to see it, was impressively represented by him in some major economic-political speeches. Extracts from some of these speeches, often also recognized in neutral and enemy countries, are contained in Document Book Funk 9, 10, and 11.

When reviewing the acts of the defendant his whole personality naturally plays a role if the motives from which this defendant acted are to be ascertained. The German people never looked upon Funk, that is as far as he was known, as a Party man who would be capable of participating in brutal outrages, violence, and terror or to amass fortunes at the cost of others. He rather shared his preference for art and literature with his friend Baldur von Schirach. Originally he wanted to become a musician and in later times he much rather saw in his house poets and artists than the men from the Party and the State. In professional circles he was known and considered as an economist, as a man with an extensive theoretical and historical knowledge who rose from journalism and was a brilliant stylist. He had an economically secure position as chief editor with the distinguished Berliner Boersen Zeitung so that he deprived himself financially when he accepted the office of press chief in the Reich Cabinet at the beginning of 1933 after Hitler's assumption of power. Therefore he was not one of those desperadoes who had to be glad to get into a well paid position through Hitler. On the contrary, he brought a financial sacrifice when he took over the state office offered to him and therefore it seems entirely credible that he did this out of patriotism, a sense of duty toward his people, to put himself at the service of the country during hard times of distress. To judge the personality and character of defendant Funk it is further of some importance that he never held or strove toward any rank in the Party. Other people who took over high state offices in the Third Reich were, for example, bestowed with the title of a SS-Gruppenfuehrer or given the rank of a SA-Obergruppenfuehrer. Funk on the contrary was from 1931 until the end of the Third Reich only a plain Party member, although he took pains for a scrupulous management of his state offices he endeavored no honors in the Party whatsoever. The only thing the defendant Funk was reproached on in this connection was the fact that he accepted an endowment in 1940 on his 50th birthday. That in itself of course was no punishable act but was evidently valued by the Tribunal as a moral charge against the defendant. Therefore we shall define our position with regard to this briefly. We remember how this endowment came about: The president and board of the Reich Chamber of Economy (Reichswirtschaftskammer), that is the highest representatives of German economic life, presented him on his 50th birthday with a farm of 55 hectares in Upper Bavaria. This estate, of course, existed for the time being only on the paper of the presentation document and had to be erected first. This presentation was expressly approved by the Head of State, Adolf Hitler, therefore not made secretly to the Reich Minister of Economy but in all official form without anything being suppressed or concealed. The gift consequently turned out to be for Funk a fatal one, because the construction of the building was much more expensive than was expected and because Funk had to pay a very high gift tax. Funk, who until then never had any debts and always lived in regulated conditions, came now because of this "donation" of an estate into debts; Goering, who heard about this, helped Funk out with a generous sum. When Hitler heard through Minister Lammers of Funk's financial difficulties, he had transferred to him as endowment, the cash necessary for the arrangement of his economic affairs. With that Funk was able to pay his taxes and his debts. The rest was used by Funk to donate to two public establishments, one for the dependents of the officials of the Reichsbank killed in action, the other for the personnel of the Ministry of Economy for the same purpose. The estate too was to be a donation some day. Thus Funk demonstrated that he had tact also in this point. Even though such an endowment cannot be legally disputed he felt that it is more correct to distance oneself from such endowments and to give them rather to public uses, as the gift could not possibly be turned down flatly considering it came from the head of the state. Henceforth I wish to turn toward the criminal responsibility of the defendant Funk on the individual points of accusation.

DEFENSE

Support of the seizure of power by the Party (Party activity 1931/32)

The defendant Funk is supposed to have promoted the seizure of power by the conspirators. This point of the indictment deals with the activity of the defendant Funk from the time when he joined the party in June 1931 until the seizure of power on 30 January 1933. The indictment maintains that Funk through interceding for the Party during that time had expedited the seizure of power by the National Socialists. This is correct. The defendant Funk himself during his interrogation on 4 May declared and explained in detail that he considered the seizure of the ruling power by the National Socialists the only possibility for the deliverance of the German people from the grave, intellectual, economical, and social distress of that time. The economic program of the Party was, in his opinion, vague and mainly designated for propaganda. He himself wanted to bring to bear his own economic principles in order to work through the Party for the benefit of the German people. Funk described this viewpoint to the court in detail during his examination. It is based on the idea of private property which is inseparable from the perception of the differentiation of human efficiency. Funk demanded the acknowledgment of private initiative and of the responsibility of the creative entrepreneur, free competition, and a balancing of social contrasts. He aimed at the elimination of party and class warfare, at a strong government with full authority and responsibility, and at a uniform political will of the people. Through his conversations with Adolf Hitler and with other party leaders he became convinced that the Party positively recognized these principles and ideas of his. In Funk's opinion he cannot be blamed for his support of the Party in its struggle for power. Funk believes especially that the discussions in this trial furnished absolute proof that the Party came to power absolutely legally. But even the way and means by which Funk assisted the Party cannot in his conviction be condemned. The role thereby, however, which the prosecution attributes to him does not correspond with the facts. Funk's activity is in part considerably overestimated in its importance, partly also is there an incorrect opinion about it.

The evidence of the prosecution consists mainly of references and extracts of reference books and especially of a book by Dr. Paul Oestreich: "Walter Funk, a life dedicated to economics" which was presented in evidence to the Tribunal under 3505-PS USA Exhibit 653. The core of this evidence is an "Economic Reconstruction Program" of the defendant Funk, printed on page 81 of this book which the prosecution calls "the official party declaration concerning the economic field" and "the economic bible for the party organization." This "Economic Reconstruction Program" forms the basis for the wrong accusation of Funk, on page 3 of the trial brief, that the defendant Funk assisted "in the formulating of the program which was publicly proclaimed by the Nazi Party and by Hitler." This "Economic Reconstruction Program" which during the testimony of the defendant Funk was read word for word (pages 8902 and 8903 of the official transcript) did indeed contain nothing extraordinary or even revolutionary nor really anything which was in any way characteristic for the National Socialist ideology. The program points to the necessity of providing work, of creating productive credits without inflationary consequences; to the necessity of balancing the public finances; further to the need for protective measures for the agriculture as well as for the urban real estate and for a rearrangement of the economic relations with foreign countries. It is a program of which Funk in his testimony quite correctly said that any liberal or democratic party and government could advocate. The defendant Funk only regrets that the party did not fully subscribe to these principles. Due to his economic viewpoint Funk later on had constant difficulties and differences with different party offices, especially with the German Labor Front; the Party Chancery, with Himmler, and with most of the district leaders (Gauleiter). This was also confirmed by the witness Dr. Landfried, who in his questionnaire submitted as Funk Exhibit 16, described these differences of Funk with the Party in detail. Funk had a reputation in the party predominantly as a liberal and as an outsider. During that time, that is essentially in 1932, he established relations between Hitler and some leading personalities of the German economy. He also worked for an understanding of the National Socialist ideas and for the support of the Party by the economy. By virtue of this activity he was described as Hitler's economic adviser. But this was not a party office, not a party title.

DEFENSE

In Document EC-440, USA Exhibit 874, submitted by the American prosecution in the cross-examination of the defendant Funk, Funk states that the later Under Secretary Keppler was considered the economic adviser of the Fuehrer for many years before him (Funk). Funk wanted to show by this reference that the designation "Economic adviser of the Fuehrer" was given by the public to other persons also.

It was only for a very short period that Funk was commissioned with Party tasks during that time. This activity never gained any considerable importance which follows from the fact that with the assumption of power the party activity of Funk ceased completely. In the other sectors, such as Food and Agriculture, Finances, etc., the Party incumbents who entered the Civil Service as a Minister, Under Secretary, etc., retained their Party offices which generally even gained in importance. The elimination of the defendant Funk from every party office at the moment of the assumption of power shows clearly that the Party leaders did not especially care for the party activity of Funk.

In the cross-examination of the defendant Funk the Soviet Russian prosecution showed him an article which had appeared in the magazine "Das Reich" (18 August 1940) on the occasion of Funk's 50th birthday (USSR 450). In this birthday article the author, an economist by the name of Dr. Herle, emphasizes that Funk "as intermediary between Party and Economy had become a pace maker for a new spiritual attitude of the German entrepreneur."

In this respect it can be said: Funk never denied that he regarded it his task to find a synthesis for an economy which on the one hand has an obligation toward state and community, but on the other hand is based on private ownership and private initiative and responsibility. Funk always recognized the political aims and ideals of National Socialism.

The German people in its majority had embraced these goals and ideologies as was proven by several plebiscites. And Funk could not suspect that all these good intentions and ideal aims so often emphasized by Hitler, with which National Socialism began its reign, would later sink in the blood and smoke of war and in an inconceivable inadequacy and inhumanity. Funk testified on the stand expressly that he considered the authoritative form of government, the strong state, a responsible cabinet, the social community, and a socially minded economy a prerequisite for a removal of the then grave intellectual and economic crisis of the German people. He always clearly emphasized the primacy of politics before the primacy of the economy. To-day, after the terrible collapse of the National Socialistic state these things are indeed regarded differently. This goes for Funk, too.

As press chief of the Reich Government, on 30 January 1933, he took up the state office of a Ministerial director in the Reich Chancery. The direction of the press policies however passed already after 1½ months into the hands of Dr. Goebbels when the latter became Reichsminister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, and the press department of the Reich Government, which Funk should have had directed up to now, was merged into the newly established Ministry for Propaganda. Only for the time being he retained the personal news report to the Reich President v. Hindenburg and to the Reich Chancellor Adolf Hitler, until the death of Hindenburg. Then this activity stopped altogether also. The office of the Press Chief of the Reich Government existed practically only on paper. This was expressly confirmed also by the defendant Fritzsche upon his examination as a witness on 28 June.

Consolidation of Control of Government and Party

Persecution of the Jews of liberal professions (Reich Ministry of propaganda)

As to defendant's activity in the Reich Ministry of propaganda, the prosecution charges him as follows:

"By means of such an activity in the Ministry of Propaganda, the defendant Funk participated in establishing the power of the conspirators over Germany, and is particularly responsible for the persecution of 'political dissenters' and Jews, for the psychological preparation of the people for war, and for the weakening of the strength of and will for resistance of the victims selected by the conspirators."

DEFENSE

Also in this point of the accusation, the guilt of the defendant Funk has been derived almost exclusively from the fact that he occupied the position of a secretary of state in the Ministry of Propaganda. The hearing of evidence, however, has shown that Funk had nothing to do with actual propaganda activity in his position as secretary of state. Funk did not deliver any speeches either through the radio or in public meetings. The press policy was directed by Dr. Goebbels, in person, ever since the ministry had been established. However, Funk took care, to a large extent, of the wishes and complaints of the journalists. He protected the press against trespassing by government offices and tried to secure for the press an individual look and an activity conscious of its responsibilities. This is expressed by the digest from the book written by Dr. Paul Oestreich: "Walther Funk, ein Leben fuer die Wirtschaft" (cf. 3505-PS, USA 653—Document book Funk 4b). Some of Funk's wordings from that period of his activity in the Ministry of Propaganda, as e.g. the sentence "the press is not a barrel-organ" and the further saying "the press should not be the scapegoat of the government" have become later all but household words.

As secretary of state, Funk had, on the whole, only organizational and economical tasks. He managed the financial side of the activity of the numerous organizations and institutes which were controlled by the Ministry of Propaganda, such as, particularly, the Reich broadcasting company, further the German Trade Publicity Council (Werberat der deutschen Wirtschaft), the state-owned film combines, the state-owned theaters and orchestras and the state-owned press agencies and newspapers. As to art, and according to his artistic tastes, he occupied himself with music and theater. In the direction of the Ministry of Propaganda, a complete separation between political tasks on the one hand and organizational and economical tasks on the other hand took place. This has been stated in unison by all witnesses examined on this point. Minister Dr. Goebbels in person directed the propaganda policy, exercising complete, absolute, and exclusive control. His assistants herein were, not his secretary of state Funk, but his old collaborators from the propaganda organization of the party, who for the most part were taken over by him in a personal union into the newly created Ministry of Propaganda. Funk, however, did not belong to the propaganda department of the party, neither before nor after the ministry was established. The assertion of Mr. Messersmith in his affidavit submitted under 1760-PS, according to which Goebbels had incorporated Funk into the party organization, is erroneous, and can obviously be attributed to the fact that Messersmith had, as an outsider, no insight into the division of work within the Ministry of Propaganda, and moreover, apparently identified readily the propaganda activity of the party with the propaganda of the state ministry. This has been confirmed by the questionnaire submitted by Messersmith, as asked for by the defendant Funk, on 7 May 1946. (Doc. Book Funk, Supplement 5.) This questionnaire shows that Messersmith cannot even state whether he has had a conversation with the defendant Funk a few times or only once, furthermore, that he does not remember any more what topic was discussed at that time, nor in what capacity Funk was present at this meeting. With such vague and unreliable statements of a witness nothing, of course, can be proved.

As a proof of the fact that Funk had nothing to do with the actual propaganda activity and—as the defendant Goering has asserted here as a witness—did not play any important part at all in comparison to Goebbels, I refer to the affidavit of the former Reichsleiter for the press, Max Amann, of April 17, 1946 (Doc. Book Walther Funk Exhibit 14). At first the prosecution has submitted an affidavit sworn by this witness, of 19 December 1945 (3501-PS); the statements contained therein have been, in the new affidavit of April 17, 1946, supplemented and corrected in essential points. In this new statement submitted to the prosecution and to the defense, the witness Amann gives evidence that also, according to his knowledge, Funk, as secretary of state in the Ministry of Propaganda, had nothing to do with the actual propaganda activity. For the rest, the witness confirms the statements of the defendant Funk, viz., that he (Amann) did not know in person the distribution of activities and the interior management of the ministry, and that his statements are exclusively based on informations by other persons. The witness Heinz Kallus, on the other hand, worked for some years as an official of the Ministry of Propaganda. Kallus, too, confirms under oath in the answers in the questionnaire addressed to him (Exhibit Funk 19), that on the whole Funk was engaged in administration and financial questions. And the same was testified by the defendant Hans Fritzsche during his examination as a witness before this Tribunal on June 27 and 28.

In the trial brief of the defendant Funk (p. 9, 3566-PS) the prosecution submitted the notes of a SS-Scharfuehrer Sigismund as evidence for the importance of the position which Funk is supposed to have held in the Ministry of Propaganda. An official of this ministry by the name of Weinbrenner is supposed to have declared to that SS-Scharfuehrer that it was impossible to know whom Minister Goebbels would entrust with the office of radio superintendent, as Goebbels took most of the important decisions only in agreement with Under Secretary Funk. Now Dr. Goebbels did not as a matter of course undertake the appointment to the leading post in broadcasting without getting in touch with Funk, the chairman of the administrative board of the Reich Broadcasting Corporation (Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft); this, however, does not prove anything concerning the nature and the significance of the activity of the defendant Funk nor of the aims he pursued thereby. After all, the prosecution has been able to submit but one single document bearing the signature of Funk as Under Secretary, viz., the fixing of a date for the coming into force of a decree for the execution of a law concerning the Reichskulturrkammer of 9 November 1933 (3503-PS).

DEFENSE

Among the persons for whom Funk interceded were not only Jewish editors, but also many prominent German artists, and the witness Kallus (cf. his questionnaire in the Doc. Book—Funk 18) mentions in this connection the Jewish proprietors of a big Berlin directory publishing firm whom Funk had given permission to carry on with their business against considerable resistance of the competent section of the ministry and of the German trade publicity council (Werberat der deutschen Wirtschaft). The witness Kallus stated further that, owing to this attitude toward the Jewish cultural workers, Funk was "suspect" to Dr. Goebbels and to the chief of the press section, Berndt, who was known to be particularly radical. Editor-in-chief Oeser explicitly states, as a witness, in his affidavit (Doc. Book, Funk 1) that he has made his statements voluntarily to prove the "human attitude" of the defendant Funk, and gives the names of eight Jewish editors of the "Frankfurter Zeitung" whom Funk had given permission to carry on with their profession. In this connection, Oeser further remarks: "He (Funk) herewith proved his human understanding. Indeed, I have never heard from him (Funk), in the course of our conversations, any inhuman utterances. Owing to his (Funk's) concessions, the endangered people obtained, in part repeatedly, the possibility to hope and to work anew with us and to prepare, without loss of income, their change of profession and their emigration." Oeser, a well-known economic journalist, who always kept completely aloof from the party, explicitly states that Funk without any doubt exposed himself by his attitude toward the Jews. Hereof the prosecution deduces a responsibility or, at any rate, a co-responsibility of the defendant Funk for the entire legislation for the control and coordination of the cultural professions (Kulturerufe).

This conclusion appears to be wrong; quite apart from the fact that the point in question is the fixing of a date for a decree concerning execution, therefore a purely formal act, it must be emphasized that this law was decided by the Reich Cabinet of which the defendant Funk at that time was not a member.

Funk stated in his examination that during the entire duration of his activity in the Ministry of Propaganda he hardly gave his signature more than three times representing Dr. Goebbels. For the rest, the defendant Fritzsche testified here as a witness, on June 28, 1946, that the position of Dr. Goebbel's long-time collaborator and personal adviser Hanke, who later on became Under Secretary and Gauleiter, corresponded far more to the usual position of an Under Secretary in the ministry than the one of the defendant Funk. It was Hanke, too, who maintained the liaison of Minister Goebbels with the section heads and advisers of the ministry, a task adhering otherwise to the Under Secretary in a ministry, but which was never entrusted to the defendant Funk, although he was an Under Secretary.

It is proven by the affidavit of the former editor-in-chief of the "Frankfurter Zeitung," Albert Oeser (Funk Exhibit 1), and of the attorney-at-law Dr. Karl Roosen (Funk Exhibit 2), as well as by the affidavits of the witness Heinz Kallus (Document Book Suppl. 18), that the defendant Funk, in his position as an Under Secretary of the Ministry of Propaganda, energetically undertook to help Jews and other persons who were oppressed and thwarted in their intellectual or artistic activities by the National Socialist legislation and cultural policy, and that he did this under heavy risks to his own position.

In the cross-examination of the defendant Funk the prosecution referred to an affidavit, produced by the prosecution, of an editor called Franz Wolf; this witness expressed (3954-PS) the opinion that Funk may well have given those exceptional permissions not out of human sentiments, but rather in order to maintain the high standard of the "Frankfurter Zeitung." By the way, the author of the affidavit was actually one of the Jewish editors who were given permission to further exercise their profession by Funk. The assumption of the witness Wolf is in direct contradiction to the positive statements of the witness Oeser. The defendant Funk too opposed this interpretation and has pointed out that at that time such considerations were of no importance to him. In later years, when the "Frankfurter Zeitung" was to disappear, he had, so he said, used his influence in order to ensure the further publishing out of material considerations too, as this newspaper was, as an economic paper, highly esteemed abroad and was the best commercial newspaper of the country. However, this does not alter the fact that Funk had, at a time, used his influence repeatedly and with success in favor of Oeser and his collaborators, for purely humanitarian reasons.

DEFENSE

The witness Kallus finally declared in his questionnaire (p. 3 of Doc. Book Funk, supp. 4, No. 18) that he remembers several occasions where Funk made possible the emigration of Jewish people at tolerable conditions. Kallus confirms hereby the statements of the witness Luise Funk (Doc. Book Funk, exh. 3), according to which the defendant Funk has often received, in the years when he was under secretary of state in the Ministry of Propaganda, letters of thanks from Jews who had emigrated at that time from Germany and who thanked Funk for having given them facilities for liquidating their businesses and for having procured them permission to take along abroad considerable parts of their fortune. Evidence concerning this second part of the indictment has accordingly shown that Funk is guilty in the sense of this part of the indictment neither in his official capacity nor by his actions. He has helped, as far as it was within his power, many Jews and many individuals, who were endangered and hindered in their cultural work, out of their material and spiritual distress, although by doing so he jeopardized his own position.

Preparation of wars of aggression (Point IV of the indictment)

Point IV of the indictment reproaches the defendant Funk with "having actively participated, while fully cognizant of the aggression plans of the conspirators, in the mobilization of German economy for the war of aggression." As proof of this assertion, the indictment points out at first that the Ministry of Economy (Wirtschaftsministerium) was "made part of the Four-Year-Plan by Goering" as High command of the German war economy and then put under Funk's command.

Further on, the indictment states that, by the law of defense of the Reich of 4 September 1938, Funk was, in his capacity of high "commissioner of economy," explicitly entrusted with the mobilization of German economy in time of war. The statement of the indictment that the Reich Ministry of Economy was made a part of the Four-Year-Plan before its transfer by Goering to Funk is quite correct. But the high command of the German economy was not exercised by the Reich Minister of Economy, Funk, but by the commissioner for the Four-Year-Plan exclusively, viz., the co-defendant Goering, whose instructions Funk had to follow.

Besides, the most important branches of production, as coal, iron, machines, motors, chemicals, and others, were managed by special general commissioners of the Four-Year-Plan, who were controlled directly by Goering and received their instructions from Goering, but not from Funk. The Reich ministry of economy was but the office which executed the directives of the Four-Year-Plan.

The defendant Funk, as a witness, has pointed out that some offices, as the Reich Office for Economic development (Reichsamt fuer wirtschaftlichen Ausbau) under Professor Krauch and the Reich Office for Soil Investigation (Reichsamt fuer Bodenforschung) under secretary of state Keppler, were only formally under the supervision of the Reich minister of economy, but did, in fact, function as autonomous institutions of the Four-Year-Plan.

Funk's position as Plenipotentiary for Economy was vigorously attacked from the beginning. During the cross-examination of the defendant Funk by the American prosecution a Document EC-255 was submitted, a letter of the Reich War Minister von Blomberg to the commissioner for the Four-Year-Plan Goering, dated 29 November 1937, wherein Blomberg proposes that the defendant Funk, who on 27 November 1937 had just been appointed Reich minister of economy should also be appointed general commissioner for war economy. However this was not done.

At first, Goering himself took over the Reich Ministry of economy and handed it over only in February 1938, after 3 months, to the defendant Funk. Then the high command of the armed forces, more especially the Wehrwirtschaftsstab (General Thomas), requested that the Plenipotentiary for War Economy should be bound, for the future, to follow the directives of the high command for all questions connected with the supplying of the armed forces (Doc. EC-270, USA Exhibit 840). In this letter the high command of the armed forces, Wehrwirtschaftsstab, claims a right to direct the general commissioner for war economy on nearly everyone of his fields of activity.

The defendant Funk tried by a conversation with Reich Marshal Goering and a letter to Reich Minister Dr. Lammers to clarify his position as general commissioner for war economy, and asked to be placed, as Plenipotentiary for War Economy, under direct command of Hitler, and not to be compelled to obey the directives of the command of the armed forces. Goering and Lammers agreed with Funk's opinion. But this has nothing to do with Funk's being put under command of Goering, as all other supreme Reich offices and ministers which were put under Hitler's direct command were required to follow the directives of the commissioner for the Four-Year-Plan.

DEFENSE

It is, however, remarkable that according to the act for the Reich defense of September 4, 1938, the defendant Funk did not become Plenipotentiary General for War Economy, but Plenipotentiary for Economy (without war), and that this act explicitly stated that Funk had to obey the requests of the supreme command of the armed forces. Accordingly, the supreme command of the armed forces has at last carried through its wish.

But also the individual Economic departments, which according to the Reich Defense Law were under the direction of the Plenipotentiary General for the Economy for his special tasks, were not willing to recognize him. During the cross-examination of the defendant Funk an interrogation of the former Under Secretary Dr. Hans Posse, Funk's deputy as Plenipotentiary General for economics (3894-PS, USA piece of conviction 843) was produced in which the latter declared that the Plenipotentiary General for the Economy "in reality never entered into function!" The ministers and under secretaries of the individual economic departments (Finance, Agriculture, Transportation, etc.) did not, according to the statement of Posse, wish to be placed under Funk's control and protested against it. Posse then speaks of the difference concerning the Four-Year-Plan. He calls these conflicts "the struggle for power," whereby in this connection nothing else is meant but the authority to make decisions with regard to the other economic departments. This was not a difference between Goering and Funk, this is wrong, because it was evident that Funk even as a Plenipotentiary General for the Economy was reporting to Goering. Actually this was a quarrel of the under secretaries. The individual economic departments declared they reported to the Plenipotentiary for the Four-Year-Plan and refused to recognize the right of the Plenipotentiary General for the Economy to give them directives, because he himself was under the direction of the Four-Year-Plan. The under secretaries of the Four-Year-Plan supported the departments in this interpretation. This lack of clearness and the over-lapping of competencies were the reasons why the authority to issue directives passed already a few months after the outbreak of the war from the Plenipotentiary General for the Economy also formally into the hands of the Plenipotentiary for the Four-Year Plan.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

But nowhere in the material presented by the prosecution is to be found a single indication for the fact that defendant Funk knew anything about political and military conversations in which a planned war, in particular a war of aggression of Germany, was discussed. Funk was never invited to any conversations of this kind. He was, in particular, not present at the conversation at Goering's on 14 October 1938, which was treated exhaustively by the prosecution on page 24 of the Trial-brief (1301-PS.) According to the prosecution, Goering referred at this meeting to an order of Hitler to increase armament unusually, especially with regard to arms of attack. The prosecutor declared (p. 2447 of the German transcript) at the session of 11 January 1946 that Goering at that meeting had addressed words to Funk, "which were the words of a man already at war." However, by several documents (Doc. Book 5, 6, 7, and 8) it is unequivocally proved that defendant Funk was not present at that meeting, as he was in Sofia at that time in order to conduct economical negotiations with Bulgaria. This exhibit of the prosecution, which clearly was meant to be a main exhibit, is thereby invalidated.

When Funk wrote his letter, dated 25 August 1939, to Hitler, the German and Polish Armies were already facing one another completely mobilized. Therefore he was compelled to act that way and could, at that moment, no longer retract any preparations. Compare thereto the interrogatory Kallus item 5 (Doc. Book Funk 18).

Defendant Funk declared here on the witness stand: "It was naturally my duty (as a Plenipotentiary General for the Economy) to do all I could to prevent, in case of war, shocks in the civilian sector of economy and it was further my duty as a president of the Reichsbank to reinforce, as much as possible, the supply of gold and foreign currency in the Reichsbank. That was necessary on account of the general political tension at the time and it would also have been necessary if war had been avoided and only economic sanctions had been brought to bear which, in view of the tension of the political situation at the time, were to be expected. And it was just as well my duty as Reich Minister for the Economy to do all I could to increase the production." (P. 8931 of the German transcript.) To this subject witness Puhl states in his answers in the questionnaire of 1 May (Funk Exhibit 17) that the position of the Reichsbank in the last seven months of Funk's presidency before the outbreak of the war had not been essentially reinforced and that the exchange of foreign assets for gold, since January 1939, had only been executed in a modest way. The providential gold and foreign currency policy of the Reichsbank corresponded to customary practice.

These statements of Puhl are important for the correct appreciation of Funk's references to the changing of foreign assets into gold in his letter to Hitler from 25 August 1939 (699-PS, GB Exhibit 49). The transactions were, in any case at the time when

DEFENSE

Funk was president of the Reichsbank, hardly longer of any importance. Funk's excessive way of expressing himself in this letter to Hitler makes the contents appear more important than they actually were. Funk explained these facts at his interrogation by the fact that this letter was a letter of thanks and that in those days every German was under highest tension on account of the political occurrences that were getting all Europe very much excited and that at this moment of danger of war for his country, he wanted to let his chancellor know that he (Funk) too had done his duty. This was the first and it remained the only time that Funk as Plenipotentiary for Economy got active and busy and, somewhat sad, the defendant continues: "Every man wants to be somebody once in his life."

Here I must insert something which is based upon a protocol which the defendant submitted only after the end of the hearing of evidence. It is Document 3787-PS. That is the minutes of the second meeting of the Reich Defense Council on 23 June 1939.

During that meeting of the Reich Defense Council, which occurred about two months before the beginning of the War, Funk, as General Plenipotentiary for Economy, participated. However, judging from the way it was proposed, the minutes leave no doubt whatever that we are here concerned with general, and therefore more theoretical, preparations for the event of some war or other.

Furthermore, to appreciate this document, it must not be overlooked that during the war which broke out three months later, the tasks of the defendant Funk in the sector of distributing labor were transferred entirely to the Four-Year-Plan, since the General Plenipotentiary for Economy, in his chief functions was, soon after the beginning of the war, completely and formally abolished, as I have previously shown.

The defendant Funk has explicitly stated at his interrogation before the Tribunal that he, right to the end, did not believe war would come and why he did not believe it, on the contrary that he counted on the Polish conflict being settled by diplomatic means. The correctness of this statement is also confirmed by the witnesses Landfried, Posse, and Puhl in answering of the questionnaires presented to the court as exhibit by the Defense or by the Prosecution (Funk Exhibit 16 and 17 and 3894-PS). The danger of war with Russia came to Funk's knowledge for the first time when he heard of Rosenberg having been appointed Delegate for the unified treatment of East-European problems in April 1941.

At that time the defendant Funk was given the same explanations by Lammers and Rosenberg as were expressed in general before the Tribunal here by witnesses heard on this question. He was told the reason for the preparations for war against Soviet Russia was that the Soviet Russians were massing strong troops along the entire border, that they had invaded Bessarabia and that Molotov in his discussions regarding the territory of the Baltic Sea and the Balkan had made demands which Germany could not fulfill.

Since Rosenberg stated that the commission given by Hitler included also economic measures, Funk placed Ministerialdirector Dr. Schlotterer as liaison-man at Rosenberg's disposal. Later Schlotterer took over the direction of the economic section of the ministry Rosenberg and he also joined the Economic-Operations-Staff East (Wirtschaftsfuehrungsstab) of the Four-Year-Plan. The Ministry for Economy itself had practically nothing to do with the economic questions of the occupied East and concerned itself merely with questions which had bearings on internal German economy. The Ministry for Economy had no authority whatever for decisions in the occupied Eastern territories.

During the cross-examination the defendant Funk, on the subject "Preparations of war against Russia," was shown an extract from an interrogation of 19 October 1945 (3952-PS, USA Exhibit 875). In this interrogation Funk stated that the defendant Hess had asked him at the end of April 1941 if he had heard anything about an impending war against Russia? Funk replied: "I have not heard anything definite, but it seems as if there is some talk along that line." The explanation for this conversation at the end of April 1941 between two who were not initiated is most likely that on this date Funk did not yet exactly know the reason for Rosenberg's commission, and was going only on presumptions and by rumors.

On 28 May 1941 Rosenberg had a meeting with Funk (Doc. 1031-PS). In this meeting the question was discussed how the money problem in the East was to be regulated, if a war against Russia should break out and if those territories should be occupied by our forces. It certainly is a most natural procedure that in view of an imminent war the authorities responsible for money matters should discuss the question of how, in the case of occupation of enemy territory, money matters should be handled there! Funk was against any regulation which might cause speculations and called the suggested rate of exchange for mark and ruble an arbitrary act. He joined Rosenberg in his conception that the Russian territory should have its own national currency as soon as conditions would permit it. For the rest he demanded further investigation of these problems, especially since the matter could not be determined in advance. So here too Funk approached matters with his characteristic precaution and endeavored to find a solution which would bring about stable conditions.

DEFENSE

If it was mentioned in this discussion (but not by Funk) that ruble bills had to be printed in order to meet the most urgent demands for currency, then Funk saw neither anything unusual nor criminal therein. If a country has been depleted of its currency, then a new currency simply must be created by that power which is responsible for the maintenance of a stable monetary system. Who produced the banknotes was entirely unimportant. Important for him was by whom the banknotes were issued and in what quantity.

Moreover the production of a new banknote requires months of preparation, so that the execution of such a plan could have been intended only for a much later date. Actually war broke out already a few weeks after this discussion. The defendant Funk knew that war with Russia was imminent. That Germany had been preparing for such a war for a long time was as little known to him as the fact that Germany would attack, and thus wage a preventive war.

Funk was informed neither on the march into Austria nor about the negotiations on Sudetenland (in September and October 1939 he was not in Germany at all) nor on the seizure of the remainder of Czechoslovakia. About Poland he knew that the conflict was acute. Likewise about Russia. But in both cases only a short time before the actual outbreak of war. Regarding wars with other countries Funk received no information whatsoever before the opening of hostilities.

From all the above-mentioned facts it can be clearly seen that Funk knew nothing of Hitler's intentions in the line of foreign policy, and had no knowledge whatsoever of the fact that Hitler was making any kind of plans for aggressive war. Truly Funk concerned himself in the summer of 1939 especially with the conversion of German economy from a peace- to a war-time basis. But to prepare the German people for a defensive war and to take economic measures necessary for a defensive war, Funk considered it not only as his right but as his duty as official of the Reich.

Now the prosecution believes that it can get around all these deliberations by calling the Reichsregierung or the National-Socialist Party or preferably all of the German people a criminal organization, who conspired against other nations and whose sole task had been to plan and wage wars of aggression, to subjugate and enslave foreign nations, to plunder and to germanize other countries. This deduction is erroneous because only Hitler himself and a few of those men closest to him, of the type of a Goebbels, Himmler, and Bormann, devised and executed these criminal plans. According to the evidence heard it cannot be doubted that even the highest officials of the state and of the Armed Forces were not initiated into these plans, but rather that these plans were concealed from them by a cunning system of secrecy. A comparison with secret societies, which in other countries banded together in criminal organizations, as for example the Ku-Klux-Klan in America, cannot be made, also for another reason.

The Ku-Klux-Klan for instance was from the start organized as a secret society with the purpose of terrorizing and committing crimes. In 1871, after scarcely 6 years of existence, it was, by a special law, the Ku-Klux-Klan Act, expressly forbidden by the North American Government. At that time the Government even declared martial law against it and fought it with every possible means. It was an organization with which the Government and the parliament of the United States never had any dealings at all. A man like Funk would, of course, never have joined such a secret society, a criminal organization against which the government was fighting. However the National-Socialist Party in Germany never was a secret organization, but was a party recognized by the government and considered lawful; in a special Reich law expression was given to the unity between this party and the state. The leader of this party was at the same time from 1934 the elected head of the Reich and this head of the state and his government have from 1933 on constantly been officially recognized as a government by the entire world. It was just because of this international recognition of Hitler by all the foreign countries, a recognition which was still maintained even during the second world-war, that Funk and millions of other Germans never doubted the lawfulness of the government and that such doubts, if they ever tried to enter his mind, were nipped in the bud, and millions of German officials and German soldiers assumed exactly like Funk that they were only doing their duty in not denying this head of the state the recognition which all the countries of the world gave him.

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Funk has never denied, as has already been mentioned, that in his plans and regulations he naturally also thought of the possibility of wars which Germany perhaps some day might have to wage, exactly as every general staff as a matter of duty has to give consideration to such possibilities. At that time there existed for Funk every reason thereto; for the world situation since the first world-war was so tense and the conflicting interests of the individual nations appeared often insurmountable to such an extent that every statesman had to make the necessary preparations for war if he did not want to be accused of negligence or of betrayal of the interests of his own people. Therefore such preparatory activity in itself had no criminal significance, and Funk does not doubt at all that the ministers of economics and the bank presidents of other countries also during those years made preparations similar to his for the event of war, and had to make them. For the question of legal punishment in Funk's case it is not essential whether or not he, for his part, ordered such preparations, but exclusively whether or not he knew that Hitler was planning aggressive wars and that he intended to wage such aggressive wars in violation of existing treaties and under disregard of international law. But Funk, as he declared under oath, did not know this and did not go on such assumptions either. Due to Hitler's constant affirmations of peace such possibilities never entered his mind. Today of course we know, on the basis of the actual events of the time that followed and on the basis of the facts established by this proceedings, that those peace assertions of Hitler's, which were on his lips yet when he committed suicide, were in reality only lies and deception. But, at that time, Funk took these peace affirmations of Hitler's to be the absolute truth. It never entered Funk's mind at that time that he and the whole German nation could be deceived by Hitler; but rather did Funk trust Hitler's words exactly as did the whole world, and thus became a victim of that deception as did the whole world. If foreign statesmen and generals are not reproached for having believed Hitler's peace affirmations, although they surely must have been much better informed about Germany's rearmament than Funk, then one cannot now because of the faith he had in the head of the state accuse him of a crime.

DEFENSE

Occupied Territories—Forced Labor

The evidence which the prosecution brought against Funk on the subject of "Forced Labor," or "Slave-Labor-Program," (as the prosecution calls it) is only scanty. In the main he is held responsible for the forcible employment of foreign man-power on the grounds that, since autumn 1943, he was a member of the "Central Planning." He attended a session of Central Planning Board for the first time on 22 November 1943 and later only very rarely, as was stated by the defendant Speer as witness and as is shown by the minutes of this board. With questions of direction of labor Funk never concerned himself at all. He was in principle opposed to drawing too many laborers, especially by force, out of the occupied territories because this disturbed the economic life and the social order of these territories. Sauckel, Landfried, and Hayler have affirmed this, and the same is disclosed by Funk's personal remarks in the here frequently mentioned conference with Lammers on 11 July 1944 (Doc. 3819-PS), where, for example, Funk expressed himself against "ruthless police raids."

When Funk sent representatives to Central Planning, he did it only for the purpose that they should see to it that the necessary raw materials were assigned to the industries of the consumer's goods and for export, but never on account of the questions of foreign labor. If the prosecution confronted the witness Hayler during a cross-examination on 7 May 1946 (p. 9070 of the German transcript) with a statement by Funk from the preliminary interrogation of 22 October 1945 (3544-PS), wherein Funk declared that he had "not racked his brain" over these labor problems, then it must also be stated that in the next sentence of this protocol, so to speak under the same breath, Funk declared that he had always done his utmost to prevent the hauling away of laborers from their homeland, e. g. France. This second sentence, although it was not quoted, is important because it also reveals Funk's declining attitude against the forcible measures used in connection with direction of labor. Now it has been deposed by the defendant Speer in the session of the Tribunal on 20 June that Central Planning made no plans at all for direction of labor. Only occasionally discussions on direction of labor questions took place here. Not the stenographic notes introduced here, but rather the protocols, contain the actual results of the negotiations and the decisions of the Central Planning. But these protocols have not been introduced by the prosecution. As has been proved, Funk, who attended the sessions of Central Planning only a few times, never received the stenographic notes, but only the protocols for his information. Previous to the time when Speer made the decisions regarding war production, and before Sauckel became Plenipotentiary General for Direction of Labor, i.e., before 1942, were questions of procurement of manpower for production discussed in the Four-Year-Plan. Later too, demands for the labor required were, in the main, as Speer has testified, presented in direct negotiations between the industries and the offices for direction of labor. While the production of the Reich-Ministry for Economy, according to the instructions of the Four-Year-Plan, still was under the care of Funk, these directions of labor questions were not dealt with by the Reich-Ministry for Economy but rather by the Plenipotentiaries-General of the Four-Year-Plan, appointed for the various branches of industry negotiated directly with the Plenipotentiary-General for Direction of Labor or with his competent offices. Speer rectified this in regard to the document Sauckel Exhibit 12 and likewise the fact that several branches of industry such as the construction department, which do not belong there, were in this document cited as coming under the competency of the Reich-Minister of Economy.

DEFENSE

[At this point, material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Finally it must be concluded that Funk, at the time he joined the Central Planning, no longer had any tasks to fulfill in the production and consequently could no longer demand workers for such.

[At this point material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

Summarily it must be said that the evidence submitted has proved beyond doubt that the defendant Funk always opposed the exploitation of occupied territories by various measures, and that by the very fact that he succeeded in preventing the devaluation of currency in occupied countries they were protected from harm, the extent of which cannot be evaluated individually.

Elimination of Jews from Economic Life (Point 3 of the Trial Brief)

In view of the time at my disposal I cannot afford to go into further details with respect to accusations raised against Funk by the Indictment but I shall refer to statements given by Funk with respect hereto; I must first, however, deal more fully with a problem, which to me seems the most important in the whole of the accusation against Funk, namely the reproach that he participated in any manner in the persecution of the Jews. This question appears to me to be the most decisive for judging of defendant Funk before this Tribunal.

Of course it was never asserted in Germany that Funk belonged to those fanatic anti-Semites who participated in or approved of the pogroms against the Jews or who derived benefit from these actions; Funk always declined that sort of thing. The explanation for this fact is to be found not only in his natural disposition and the surroundings in which he grew up but also in his decades of journalistic activity mostly in that part of the press which dealt with economic policies and, consequently, kept him in continuous touch with the valuable circle of Jews in economic life. Experts know and speak highly about it even today that Funk, at that time already, showed an attitude that was free of all anti-Semitism and appeared to be far more friendly toward the Jews than hostile. It is somehow tragic that in spite of this Funk's name in this trial has been repeatedly connected with the decree of November 1938 by which the elimination of Jews from economic life was carried out. Whether he liked it or not, all questions which concerned the treatment of Jews in the economic life of Germany were under the jurisdiction of his departments as Minister for Economy. As an official it was his duty to issue the necessary decrees for execution.

This must surely have been very difficult especially for Funk in view of his tolerant attitude. He had, at that time, been a state official of the Reich Propaganda Ministry and the Ministry for Economy for 8 years already, and yet the prosecution could not ascertain a single case during that time in which Funk had shown an anti-Semitic attitude, where he had incited people toward the Jews. It could not cite a single instance when he would have approved of or preached violence, terror, or injustice. On the contrary, we know, from statements of various witnesses, that Funk interceded on behalf of Jewish fellow-citizens in those years time and again, that he was concerned about them, and in their interests sought to alleviate hardships, to prevent encroachments on their rights and to rescue the existence of human beings, even if they were Jews or political opponents.

It is therefore not too surprising that this man of rich experience in the economic field, this man of far-reaching knowledge with his outspoken tolerant views was most painfully affected when on 10 November 1938 he had to witness the destruction of Jewish homes and shops in Berlin. One incoming report upon another confirmed the fact that Goebbels and his clique exploited the excitement of the populace over the assassination by a Jew of a German diplomat in Paris, organized such programs throughout Germany, and that the outrages led not only to the destruction of Jewish property but also to the murder of many Jews and to the persecution of many thousands of innocent fellow-citizens.

The affidavit of his Ministerialrat Kallus (Doc. Book Funk 15) of 9 December 1945 and Frau Luise Funk's statement made in place of oath of 5 November 1945 (Doc. Book Funk 3) prove clearly, that Funk condemned such excesses to the utmost and that he called them swinish in the face of Minister Dr. Goebbels, in great excitement, and in the event of a repetition of such he threatened to resign his office. He had, at that time already, told the almighty Goebbels into his face that one had to be ashamed of being a German.

All this expressed the just indignation of a man who for decades had exerted himself for moderation toward the Jews and political opponents and had thus earned many a letter of appreciation, a man who had fought for years to prevent any terror, to raise the standard of German economic life and who now, in a single night, saw all his efforts frustrated by the brutal fanaticism of a Dr. Goebbels.

DEFENSE

Funk himself during his interrogation clearly described how, from entering upon his office as a Minister of the Economy from February 1938, he was being pressed continuously by Dr. Goebbels and Dr. Ley to eliminate the Jews also from the economic life; the witness Dr. Hayler stated here that Himmler also reproached Funk of this; Funk himself as a witness stated how in those years repeated difficulties arose with the workers stirred up by propaganda who sometimes no longer wanted to work with Jewish managers or did not dare to do so, and how, under the pressure of these conditions, it occurred that numerous Jewish business owners sold their business, and quite often at ruinous prices, to people who to the Minister of Economy Funk appeared to be entirely unfit for acquiring and managing of such businesses. Time and again Funk tried to oppose this irresistible condition; he strove continually to slow down, at least, this process of aryantization, to provide for a suitable and just settlement for the Jewish business owners, and to make possible their emigration from Germany together with allowing them to take along their belongings. But day after day Funk came to recognize more and more that he was too weak to stop this movement and that the radical elements around Dr. Goebbels and Dr. Ley increasingly won the upper hand and in so doing unfortunately even were able to lean on Hitler's authority. The latter in the course of time was won more and more for the radical treatment of the Jewish question by a few irresponsible advisers who today do not sit in the prisoners dock.

Into this fight between Funk and other considerate people on one side and Goebbels and Ley on the other side, the events of 9 November 1938 burst which, as Dr. Goebbels himself later admitted toward Fritzsche, were aimed directly against the person of the defendant Funk, who thereby was to be confronted with accomplished facts. And through this action of November 1938 Dr. Goebbels actually reached his goal as the witness Dr. Landfried testified. Goebbels was in the future able to refer to Hitler's own order that the Jews be completely excluded from the German economic life, although Funk, as the minister concerned, repeatedly pointed to the relations with foreign countries from which the German Reich and its economy were dependent.

Goering, in his capacity as a plenipotentiary of the Four-Year-Plan, gave the orders necessary for carrying out this program, namely upon Hitler's direct orders. Funk never had any doubt that therewith Goering also was to a certain degree only a figure-head because he always knew Goering as the man who just in the Jewish question had previously rejected extreme radicalism. This conception of Funk was shared by wide circles of the German people and it proved to be correct in the fateful Goering meeting on 12 November 1938 (1816-PS).

At a preceding meeting, Goering sharply condemned the terror acts which had occurred and declared to the Gauleiters present that he would make responsible every Gauleiter personally for the acts of violence committed in his district. But what was the good of that? Goebbels, in the course of the second meeting, the minutes of which have been submitted to the Tribunal (1816-PS), succeeded after all with his radical demands, and Funk, from the result of this meeting, finally had to come to the conclusion that the complete elimination of the Jews from German economic life could simply not be delayed any longer because the authoritative circles had become far too fanatic. It became evident to Funk that legal decisions would now have to be taken if the Jews were to be protected from further acts of terror, plunder, and violence and if they were to get at least some proper compensation. Funk, during this Goering meeting of 12 November 1938, strove along that line time and again. Due to the efforts made by the defendant Funk supported by Goering, the Jewish businesses first were reopened, the whole procedure was taken out of the arbitrary hands of local agencies and put on a legal basis all through Germany, and finally, this liquidation was spread over a certain period of time in order to gain time for carrying out this action. If the minutes of the Goering meeting of 12 November 1938 are read then one will over and over again be able to find, in spite of its incorrect and incomplete formulation, distinct clues which prove Funk's moderating influence, namely his urging, mentioned in the minutes repeatedly, to reopen the Jewish stores, and his proposal to let the Jews retain at least their securities, and his rejection of Heydrich's demand to place the Jews in ghettos. It is a fact proved by the minutes of 12 November 1938, that Funk opposed Heydrich's proposal and said: "One did not need ghettos, the Jews could move closer together among themselves, the life of 3 million Jewish people among not less than 70 million Germans could surely be regulated without ghettos." Funk thereby wanted to prevent the Jews from being interned in ghettos. Of course at that time Funk did not succeed completely in his point of view. And so, for example, his proposal to let the Jews keep their securities was refused although Funk called attention to the fact that a realization of the Jewish securities would suddenly flood the German stock market with securities valued at half a billion and therefore would inflict serious consequences upon the German stock market. Decisive for the judgment of the defendant Funk is his obvious effort to save for the Jews what could be saved under the given circumstances, and thereby we must not lose sight that in all those measures Funk acted only in his capacity as Minister of the Economy, that is, as official, who merely gave the order to execute the command which Goering, as plenipotentiary of the Four-Year-Plan, had issued on Hitler's orders. Funk thereby found himself on the very same position of constraint as, for example, the Reich Finance Minister Graf Schwerin-Krosigk, who, at the same time, had to issue the orders regarding the punitive levy of 1 billion Reichsmark to be paid by the Jews or as the Reich Minister of Justice and the Reich Minister of the Interior, both of whom had issued analogous orders for execution in their respective sphere of business.

DEFENSE

It is now for the Tribunal to give a fundamental ruling on the difficult legal question whether an official of a State, the government of which has been legally recognized by all governments of the world, is liable to legal punishment for putting into effect a law which has been passed in accordance with the legal order of this State. This legal problem is entirely different from the other question whether or not the fact that an official order when given by a superior can serve as an excuse.

Our sense of justice fully admits that a citizen, an official, or even a soldier cannot defend himself by pointing to the official order given to him by his superior, if this order obviously implies an illegal act and, especially, a crime, and if the subordinate under the existing circumstances and in due consideration of all the accompanying facts realizes or should realize that the official order is contrary to the law. If this latter prerequisite exists, one may in general fully approve that the right is not accorded to the subordinate to refer to an official order of his superior as an excuse and to maintain that he was only carrying it out. In that respect this stipulation of the Charter does not practically contain anything new, but only the confirmation and further development of legal principles which to a varying extent are recognized in the penal law of most of the civilized nations to-day. A certain precaution, however, seems to be indicated in this matter, as on the other hand it should not be forgotten that obedience to the orders of one's superiors is and must in future remain the foundation of every government in all nations if an orderly functioning of the state administrative apparatus is to be safeguarded, and that it is very dangerous if the civil servant himself is to decide for himself whether he should keep his oath of allegiance.

But in our case something different is involved. Here we are concerned with the obedience of the citizen and specially of the civil servant to the law of the state which was lawfully promulgated in accordance with the constitutional rules of this state. If we want to obtain a just and correct answer to this question, it will be pertinent to disregard entirely the German conditions and to pose the question what the decision would be if the civil servant of another, not German country, carries out a law. Let us assume for instance, some foreign country embracing a minority promulgated in accordance with its constitution a law according to which all members of this minority are to be exiled from its territory or the property of such inhabitants is to be confiscated for the benefit of the state or that the large agricultural estates of such inhabitants are to be turned over to the state or to be partitioned among other citizens. Now does the civil servant in this nation really commit a crime if he carries out this lawful order? Is it really the duty of the official who is in charge of the execution of this law, or for that matter has he even the right to refuse obedience to the law and to declare that in his personal opinion the law concerned was a crime against humanity? Would to-day in such a case any state grant its civil servants the authority to examine whether the promulgated law is contrary to the principles of humanity or to the fluctuating norms of international law? Which state would tolerate that its civil servants based upon this argument refuse the execution of a promulgated law?

[At this point material was omitted voluntarily by Defense Counsel.—Ed.]

The Tribunal will have to decide these legal problems. But Funk in his defense may point out the fact that according to his entire ideology and to his entire background it was especially difficult for him to issue those decrees for execution, although he believed he was only doing his duty as a civil servant.

In this connection I wish to remind of Funk's circular of 6 February 1939 (3498-PS, Trial Brief, p. 19), where he emphasizes to his officials that they had the duty to safeguard "in every way an unobjectionable execution" and where he mentally already declines the personal responsibility for these measures by expressly emphasizing: "To what extent and speed the authorities given by the Four-Year-Plan are to be used will depend on the decisions made by me in accordance with the directives of the Plenipotentiary for the Four-Year-Plan." This special reference to the legal decrees of the Four-Year-Plan, which was authorized to promulgate laws, originated in the desire of the defendant to express formally and solemnly and to establish for the times to come that in issuing the decrees for the execution, he fell, in the last analysis, victim to his obedience to the state, victim to his loyalty to the laws of the state to which he had sworn allegiance.

DEFENSE

Especially in Funk's circular of 6 February 1939 (3498-PS) mentioned before, qualms of conscience are clearly expressed which had gripped Funk in those days, those qualms which, during his interrogation by an American officer on 22 October 1945 resulted in a complete nervous collapse so that Funk could not suppress his tears any more and told the interrogating officer: "Yes, I am guilty, I should have resigned at that time." These same qualms of conscience occupied the defendant during the entire trial and we remember that Funk in the session of 6 May 1946, when this point was discussed, was so deeply shaken that he could hardly continue to talk and that he finally declared that at this moment he fully realized that from here the disaster had started on its way until those horrible and frightful things which we have learned here and of parts of which he learned already during his imprisonment. He felt, as he said during his interrogation on 22 October 1945, a deep shame and a heavy guilt before himself and he still felt it to-day in the same way; but he had put the will of the state, the laws of the state above his own feelings and his warning voice, for he as a civil servant was duty bound to the state. He felt all the more bound, as these legal measures were necessary first of all for the protection of the Jews in order to save them from being completely without any rights and from further despotism and force.

Funk still to-day feels that it was a terrible tragedy that just he of all persons was charged with these things, he who never said a spiteful word against a Jew but had wherever he could always worked for tolerance and equality even toward Jews.

Funk, on his interrogation on 22 October 1945, said: "I am guilty," and it is not intended to investigate here, whether the defendant, when saying this thought in any way of a criminal or only of a moral guilt which he saw in the fact that he remained in an office, which compelled him to execute laws which were incompatible with his own philosophy of life. Funk is no jurist and was, therefore, not in a position to decide for himself the complicated legal question, whether an official of state which had been internationally acknowledged can be punished at all, when doing nothing else but executing laws which had been passed in accordance with the laws of this state. He did not see any "guilt" of his in the fact that he had signed, in November 1938, the executive regulations, as this had been his duty as an official. Rather, he considered himself guilty because he had remained a member of the government, although he found the acts of terror which had occurred intolerable and abhorred them; he did not get into the "conflict of conscience," whereof he spoke when he was interrogated because he acted according to the laws which he considered as necessary under the then prevailing condition but he got into such a conflict of conscience because he had not, in such a difficult situation, listened to the voice of his conscience and had not resigned his ministerial office. Surely no material considerations prompted his decision to stay in office in spite of his moral scruples; his renown as a journalist and his abilities in this respect would have made it easy for him to find another suitable position. Much is to be said for the opinion that the defendant was kept in office above all by the thought that his resignation would improve nothing, that on the contrary the administration would get still more radical under an unsuitable, fanatical successor, while he could hope, if staying in office, to alleviate much distress.

These considerations, which may have guided the defendant Funk in the first place, were certainly correct up to a certain point.

His secretary of state, Dr. Landfried, at least has stated as witness that further on too, Funk, time and again, had serious misgivings concerning this action against the Jews and very strongly showed his disapproval of all excesses and infringements of law committed by various government agencies in the course of execution. Funk could talk openly to his confidant Landfried, and he often complained to him that he had not had the power to prevent such excesses. But, as he said to Landfried: "We of the Ministry of Economy should take particular care that nobody is getting unwarranted enrichment out of the Jews on the occasion of the aryanization of business firms, i.e., of their transfer into non-Jewish hands." And Ministerial Councillor Kallus stated in his deposition of 19 April 1946 of the various measures which were taken at that time by Funk to protect the interests of Jewish business owners, and Kallus told us too, that Funk even personally endeavored to ensure that his orders were correctly carried out by subordinate authorities.

Sense of duty on the one hand and human feeling on the other were the motives, accordingly, which let the defendant stay in office and brought him thus into a situation he is charged with to-day as being the result of criminal action.

SS-Gold deliveries to the Reichsbank and concentration camps

It is really a particular tragedy in the life of the defendant Funk that he was not only condemned by fate, in the year 1938, to issue executive regulations of laws which he condemned inwardly and disapproved of as no other man, but that he got associated once more, in the year 1942, in a particularly terrible manner with the persecution of the Jews. I am thinking now of the depot of the SS at the Reichsbank, of a matter for the elucidation of which a moving picture was produced of the steel safe of the Frankfurt branch of the Reichsbank and two witnesses were heard, Vice President Emil Puhl and Reichsbank councillor Albert Thoms.

DEFENSE

The defendant Funk had already been examined about this matter at the preliminary proceedings on the occasion of his interrogation, on 4 June 1945 (2828-PS); at that time, however, no details were disclosed to him, and Funk has then made the same statement as he did before this Tribunal, viz., that he had to deal with the matter in question but a few times and shortly, and that he had not attached any importance to it. This is the reason too why he could, at first, not clearly remember those happenings any more. Accordingly, he did not know anything more about them than he had mentioned. Still he would have to expect that this matter would be brought up in the cross-examination in course of the proceedings. And this was done in fact by the American prosecution on 7 May 1946, and the said prosecution has submitted an affidavit of the witness Emil Puhl, which at first seemed to charge heavily the defendant Funk. Now it is remarkable that since the beginning of this trial the defendant Funk always actually referred to this witness Puhl for various points, and that he several times asked for his hearing since December 1945. Measured by ordinary human standards, Funk would not have done so if he had had a bad conscience and if he must have reckoned with the possibility of his being accused in the most serious way by his own witness in the matter of those concentration camp stories. But the oral examination of the witness Emil Puhl at this Tribunal showed beyond doubt that Puhl could not uphold at all the originally incriminating statements of his affidavit, as far as the personality of Funk and his knowledge of the particulars of the deposits of the SS were concerned.

It is true that Funk, as he remembered after the hearing of Puhl (cf. on this point the rectification of his statement in the declaration of the defense counsel to the Tribunal of 17 June 1946), had been asked at the time, occasionally by the Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler whether articles of value could be deposited in the strong rooms of the Reichsbank, which had been seized by the SS in the Eastern territories. This question of Himmler's was at that time confirmed by Funk who also told Himmler that he should delegate somebody in order to discuss the matter with Vice President Puhl and settle it. Himmler at that time declared that Gruppenfuehrer Pohl could do this and that the latter would get in touch with Vice President Puhl. That was all that Funk had discussed with Reich Leader SS Himmler and occasionally he also mentioned this to his Vice President Puhl because Puhl was actually directing the business of the Reichsbank and was concerned with this affair.

Nothing extraordinary was contained or recognizable for Funk in this question of Reich Leader SS Himmler because, as far as Funk knew, the SS was at the time in charge of the entire police service in the occupied territories in the East; for that reason it often had to confiscate valuables just as the ordinary police had done in the interior country. Moreover all gold coins, foreign currency, etc., in the occupied territories of the East had to be turned in according to the law and these deliveries in the East Territories were naturally made to the SS because no other state offices there were equipped for that purpose. Funk also knew that the concentration camps were under the direction of the SS and thought that the valuables the SS were to deposit with the Reichsbank for safe-keeping belonged very probably to that category of valuables which the whole population was obliged to deliver.

Finally as it is known the SS always participated in the combats, just as the German army; just as the latter the SS had collected so-called booty in the abandoned and destroyed towns of the east and had delivered it to the Reich. Therefore there was nothing extraordinary for Funk in the fact that the SS possessed gold and foreign currency and turned it in, in a regular way.

Essential in this entire matter is the question, whether Funk knew or saw that there were, among the objects delivered by the SS, gold frames of spectacles, gold teeth, and similar objects in extraordinary quantities, which did not fall into the hands of the SS by means of legal confiscations but by criminal acts.

If it could be proved that defendant Funk saw such objects in the deposit of the SS these objects should naturally have roused his suspicion. But we heard from the witness Puhl in all certainty that defendant Funk had no knowledge of this, yes, also that the Vice President himself did not know any particulars about it. In any case Funk never saw what particular gold objects and what quantities were delivered for the SS.

Now it was stated against Funk that he had several times entered the vaults of the Berlin Reichsbank and one felt entitled to the conclusion therefrom that he could not have helped seeing what objects had been delivered by the SS. This conclusion is obviously wrong, because the evidence shows that during the entire war Funk went to the vaults of the Reichsbank only very few times in order to show these vaults and the bullion of the Reichsbank stored therein to visitors, especially to foreign guests. But during these few visits he never saw the deposit of the SS. He never observed what in particular the SS had deposited in his bank. This is established without doubt, not only by the deposition of defendant Funk himself, but also by the testimony of Vice President Puhl and the Councillor of the Reichsbank Thoms. This, certainly, unsuspecting prosecution witness who offered himself as a witness declared under oath that the valuables were delivered by the SS in locked trunks, boxes, and bags and were stored in these containers and that Funk was never present in the vaults when the contents of an individual box or trunk were sorted out by the employees of the bank. Thoms, who supervised the vaults, never saw defendant Funk there. Therefore Funk neither had knowledge of the amount that the deliveries of the SS gradually had formed nor did he know that the depot contained jewelry, pearls, precious stones, spectacle frames, and gold teeth. All that, he never saw and none of his officials ever reported to him about these things.

DEFENSE

Now it is the opinion of the prosecution that Funk, being president of the Reichsbank, surely must have known what was kept in the vaults of his bank; but also this conclusion is evidently false and does not take into consideration the actual conditions in a central bank of issue. Funk, who besides was Reich Minister for the Economy, had in his position of a president of the Reichsbank, no occasion whatever to look after a single deposit, even if it happened to belong to the SS. As a president of the Reichsbank he did not look after any deposits of other clients of his bank as this was not his task. He only once, owing to an inquiry of his Vice President Puhl, asked Reich Fuehrer SS Himmler whether the valuables deposited by the SS at the Reichsbank could be realized, i.e., in the legal course of business of the Reichsbank. Himmler answered in the positive and Funk passed this answer on to his Vice President Puhl.

But in this matter he only thought of gold coins and foreign currency, that is to say of such values which quite generally in the German Reich had to be turned in to the Reichsbank and which were and had to be realized by the latter. Never did the idea occur to Funk that the deposit contained gold teeth or similar objects originating from criminal actions in concentration camps. He heard of this, with great horror, during the trial.

The only part of the statement of witness Puhl that yet remained in a way suspect was the question of secrecy: Vice President Puhl as a witness declared in the beginning that Funk had told him the matter of the deposits of the SS should be kept strictly secret. Funk on the other hand always denied this very decidedly and declared under oath that he never talked with Puhl about such secrecy at all. Now at first sight one statement was pitted against the other. Vice President Puhl's statements referring to this point seemed slightly contradictory from the beginning. At one time he said that this secrecy had not been anything extraordinary because, after all, secrecy applies to everything that occurs in a bank; answering a special question Puhl stated repeatedly that he did not notice whether the defendant Funk had spoken of secrecy.

When, however, the affidavit of the witness Thoms of 8 May 1945 was read and pointed out to the witness Puhl, Puhl finally deposited upon oath on 15 May 1946, that it was clearly evident therefrom, that the desire for secrecy emanated from the SS. The SS made a point of having this business treated with secrecy, the SS had been the originator of the obligation for secrecy. Thus reads the literal wording of the end of the statement of the witness Puhl to which he swore and at the conclusion of which he again confirmed that the obligation for secrecy was desired and imposed by the SS.

Herewith the initial contradiction regarding this point between the statements of the defendant Funk and those of the witness Puhl was altogether accounted for. Puhl himself no longer maintained his original assertion that it was Funk who had ordered the maintenance of secrecy with regard to the SS deposit. Thus we must assume that the statement of the defendant Funk is correct also in this point and deserves preference; for he had declared from the very beginning and under oath that he himself knew nothing of a secrecy and that he had never spoken of such a secrecy to Puhl. Moreover there was no reason for Funk to talk to Puhl about a special secrecy since Funk ostensibly was of the opinion that the valuables involved were of such nature as made their confiscation and turning in mandatory and which belonged within the regular lawful business sphere of the Reichsbank, regardless of whether these articles subject to confiscation were the property of an inmate of a concentration camp or of a free person.

It was never clarified by the evidence submitted, why the SS on their part stressed the maintenance of secrecy toward Vice President Puhl and why, furthermore, the SS opened a deposit in the name of Melmer instead of in the name of the SS, and the prosecution on their part did not attach any importance to clarifying this point. At any rate the demand of the SS for secrecy evidently did not strike Vice President Puhl as unusual, just as little as it did the witness Thoms who confirmed the fact that this secrecy was nothing unusual. One fact however remains significant, namely, that before the numerous personnel of the Reichsbank no secrecy was maintained about the nature of the individual articles; on the contrary, that very personnel of the Reichsbank was entrusted by Puhl with sorting the turned in valuables and their conversion into money at the pawn shop. Dozens of Reichsbank officials who regularly entered the vaults were in a position to see the individual articles there. The Reich Central Pay-Office (Reichshauptkasse) quite openly settled accounts for the conversion of valuables into money with the Reich Ministry of Finance in a regular routine manner. Funk, still to-day, does not know whether and to what extent agreements for settling accounts with the Reich had been reached between the Finance Minister and SS Reichsfuehrer Himmler. He was never interested in it nor did it concern him.

DEFENSE

All these facts proved by the evidence, conclusively emphasize that Funk personally did not know of these matters and that Vice President Puhl and Reichsbankrat Thoms thought nothing bad about them even though Thoms should have seen of what nature the deposits were.

For this reason, there is no longer a need to examine the obvious question whether the initial statements of Puhl with regard to the deposits of the SS were not from the beginning to be received with a certain skepticism, as he ostensibly had the understandable urge—at least in his written affidavit—to shift responsibility upon the shoulders of his President Funk, in order to escape his own responsibility for the unpleasant facts of the case, when during his detention he was told that the gold objects of the SS consisted for the greater part of spectacle frames and gold teeth taken away from victims of concentration camps. Originally not even Puhl seems to have thought bad about the whole matter. For him the matter was an ordinary business transaction of the Reichsbank for the account of the Reich, which he dealt with in the same manner as he dealt with objects of gold and foreign currency that had been seized by the Customs Investigation Office or the Office of Control for Foreign currency or any other State authority. Whatever is the opinion the responsibility of Vice President Puhl, all these cases lie outside any jurisdiction of the defendant Funk. In the course of the following period Funk had only two or three short and accidental conversations with Puhl regarding these gold deposits with a view of using the turned in gold coins and foreign currency. Otherwise Funk did not concern himself at all with the matter. He knew less about it than Puhl and it is not without significance that Puhl upon oath declared that he (Puhl) would have never permitted to have these objects of gold acquired by the SS brought to the vaults of the Reichsbank had he had the slightest notion of the fact that they were taken from victims of concentration camps under criminal circumstances. If Puhl could not know or guess this, then Funk could have known even less about it, and the initial statement of Puhl, which, in effect, said that the objects of gold were accepted by Funk for the Reichsbank intentionally and that they were made use of with the aid of the personnel of the Reichsbank was at least a statement by Puhl grossly misleading the prosecution. He, later on in captivity when he learned of the true connections, must surely have had the same compunctions as Funk, however innocent the latter was in the case. Puhl, in the end, stated upon oath that even he would not have stood for such transactions and he would have brought the matter to the attention of the directorate of the Reichsbank as well as to the attention of President Funk had he known that the valuables were taken from victims of concentration camps and if he had been informed about the nature of these valuables.

I therefore come to the following conclusion: Certainly the Reichsbank transacted business for the account of the Reich, the nature of which originated from criminal acts of the SS; Funk, however, knew nothing of this. He would not have tolerated such transactions had he known the true circumstances. Therefore, he cannot be made legally responsible for this.

The same applies with regard to credits of the Reichsbank for business agencies of the SS. The witness Puhl, in his written affidavit of 3 May 1946, first gave an entirely wrong picture also of this matter, for he stated that credits of 10 to 12 million Reichsmark placed at the disposal of the Gold-discountbank upon instruction of the defendant Funk were used for financing production in SS factories by means of labor of concentration camps.

In his oral examination as witness, Puhl then was asked whether Funk had any knowledge as to whether persons from concentration camps were engaged in these factories at all. Thereat, Puhl declared literally, "I am inclined to assume this, but I am unable to know it." Therefore, he was not able to give any definite evidence concerning Funk's knowledge. However, Funk's own statement in this matter is quite clear and convincing; it amounted to this, that he knew, indeed, of the credit request of the SS, that he even granted it, but that he knew nothing about the nature of the SS enterprises concerned and about the people working therein. Funk stated this on his oath. This credit deal, which by the way occurred about two years before the matter of the SS gold deposit, accordingly charges neither the defendant Funk, nor the witness Puhl; neither of them knew at that time—1940—anything about the conditions in the concentration camps, both rather learned about them only much later, viz., in the course of this trial, and the defendant Funk never knew that persons from the concentration camps were working in the SS factories mentioned.

DEFENSE

In this connection it appears necessary to consider the question whether Funk ever visited a concentration camp: the witness, Dr. Blaha, who was examined here, stated that once Funk was in Dachau in the first half of 1944. This visit was stated to have been made as a sequel to a conference of the Minister of Finance in Berchtesgaden or in some other place of this region, and in which Funk participated. But the witness Dr. Blaha himself did not at that time see the defendant Funk in Dachau, but only heard from other camp inmates that on the occasion of an important visit to the camp, the Reich Minister of the Economy, Funk, too had been present. From the beginning, Funk energetically contested this. He stated this on his oath, and the affidavit made by his permanent companion Dr. Schwedler (Doc. Book, Funk 13) and submitted to you clearly proves that Funk never was in a concentration camp; Dr. Schwedler is in a position to know this, as he had at that time been the permanent companion of the defendant and had from day to day known where Funk stayed. In fact, Funk never was a Minister of Finance, and never took part in a conference of Ministers of Finance. Accordingly it is beyond any doubt that what the witness Dr. Blaha was able to tell here purely from hearsay is based on false information or on a confusion with another visitor, and that could all the more have been the case because Funk was rather unknown to the public. The result, therefore, is that Funk never visited a concentration camp and never came to know the conditions existing therein.

It is true that Funk does not by this statement want to assert that he did not know anything at all about the existence of such concentration camps. Just as almost any German, Funk knew, of course, that there were concentration camps in Germany after 1933, just as he knew that there were penitentiaries, prisons, and other penal institutions in Germany. But what remained unknown to him was the very large number of such concentration camps and of their inmates, amounting to hundreds of thousands, even millions. Unknown to him were also the countless atrocities committed in these camps; atrocities made known only in this trial; in particular, Funk only heard during this trial that there were even extermination camps, which served to murder millions of Jews. Funk had no knowledge of this, he stated it on his oath and it appears quite credible, as one of the most important results of this trial consists in the evidence that the German people, on the whole, did not know about the conditions in the concentration camps and about their immense number, but that, on the contrary, those conditions were held secret in such a cunning and cruel way that even the highest officials of the Reich did not learn anything about them.

Herewith defense have presented their view on that part of the indictment which, had it been true, would have imputed the man Funk in the most serious and terrible way. One may think as one pleases about acts of violence during a political and economic struggle, especially in stormy revolutionary periods; according to the opinion of the defendant Funk, there cannot be any dissent of view on one point, viz., concerning the atrocities in concentration camp and how they were committed for years, especially against the Jewish population. Anyone who participated in such unheard of atrocities should atone for it in the most rigorous way, according to the opinion of the entire German people just the same.

This is the point of view of the defendant Funk, too, which he expressed here, when on 6 May 1946 answering the American prosecutor, that as a man and as a German he was feeling a heavy guilt and a deep shame for what Germans perpetrated on millions of wretched people.

I am now at the end of the consideration of the Funk case. Your task as judges will be to find a just sentence for the defendant Funk too, a sentence which does not make him atone for other people's guilt—a guilt which he could not prevent, which he did not even know—but which only establishes the degree of his own criminal guilt. A sentence which is valid not only for to-day but which will be recognized as just also in the future, at a time when we shall have gained the necessary temporal distance to those terrible events and shall be considering those things without passion, like happenings of a remote historical period. A sentence which not only gives satisfaction to the nation which you are representing, but which will be perceived as just and wise by the German people as a whole. A sentence which does not only destroy and take revenge and sow hate for the future, but which makes possible and facilitates the re-ascending of the German people toward a happier future of human dignity and of charity, of equality, and of peace.

2. FINAL PLEA by Walter Funk

In the days of the greatest need of my people I joined a political movement, the same of which was the struggle for freedom, for the honor of our country, and for a true social community.

DEFENSE

This party movement received the leadership of the State through legal channels. I served this State because of my obligation as an official and in the execution of German laws. I felt myself bound to carry out this duty and especially during the periods of danger of war and during the war itself at a time when the existence of my country was threatened in the extreme.

In time of war, however, the State is absolutely dependent on the loyalty and faith of its officials.

Here I have heard about horrible crimes in which the offices under my direction were partly involved.

But these are things which I learned here, before this Tribunal. I did not know these crimes and I could not have known them.

I have examined my conscience and my memory with the utmost horror—I have examined my conscience and memory with the utmost care and I have told the Court everything that I knew, openly and freely, and I have concealed nothing. As far as the deposits of the SS at the Reichsbank are concerned, I only did my duty as President of the Reichsbank. According to law, the acceptance of gold and foreign currency was one of the business tasks of the Reichsbank. The fact that the confiscation of these assets was taking place through the organs of the SS subordinate to Himmler, could not make me suspicious. The entire Police system, the border protection units, and especially the search for foreign currency in the Reich and in all occupied areas was under the jurisdiction of Himmler, and I was deceived and imposed upon by Himmler.

Until the time of this trial, I did not know and I did not suspect that among the assets brought into the Reichsbank there were mammoth piles of pearls, precious stones, jewelry, and gold objects of all kinds; and horrible as it may seem to say, gold teeth. That is something I was never told. That is something I never observed. I have never seen these things. Never did even a single person tell me in a single word of incidents like that.

The existence of these extermination camps was unknown to me, totally unknown. I did not even know a single one of their names. Never have I entered a concentration camp, either.

I assumed that some of the gold and foreign currency, which was deposited in the Reichsbank, came from concentration camps, and I stated this fact from the beginning in all of my interrogations openly. But, according to German law, everyone had to turn these assets over to the Reichsbank.

Quite apart from that, the kind and quantity of these shipments from the SS were not made known to me. How was I to even suspect that the SS had acquired these assets through desecrating corpses?

If I had known of these horrible facts, my Reichsbank would never have accepted these assets for storage and exploitation. I would have refused even in the face of the danger that it would have cost me my head. If I had known of these crimes I would not be sitting in the defendant's dock today. Of that, you must be convinced. There the grave would be easier for me than this tormented and shameful life which I have to endure now, this life full of accusations, suspicions, and slander raised against me.

Not a single human life has been lost because of any measures decreed by me. I have always tried to help people in need, and as far as it lay within my power, to bring happiness and joy into their lives; and for that, many will be grateful to me and remain grateful.

Human life consists of error and guilt.

I myself have made many mistakes, and I, too, have been deceived in many things and I freely admit, I freely admit I have been deceived too easily and in many ways have been too unconcerned and too gullible and therein I see my guilt. But I consider myself free of any penal guilt which I am alleged to have committed through discharging my official duties. In that respect, to-day my conscience is as clear as on the day, ten months ago, when I entered this courtroom for the first time.

XIII. HJALMAR SCHACHT

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Rudolf Dix, Defense Counsel

Mr. President, Gentlemen of the Bench:

The singularity of Schacht's case appears graphically from one glance at the defendants' bench and from the history of his imprisonment and defense. Kaltenbrunner and Schacht sit on the defendants' bench. Whatever the powers of the defendant Kaltenbrunner may have been, he was in any case Chief of the Main Reich Security Office. Until those May days of 1945, Schacht was a prisoner of the Main Reich Security Office in various concentration camps. It makes a rarely grotesque picture to see a jailer-in-chief and a prisoner sharing the same defendants' bench. At the very start of the criminal trial this remarkable picture alone must have given cause for reflection to all those participating in the trial—judges, prosecutors, and defense counsels.

Schacht was banished to the concentration camp on the order of Hitler, as has been established here. The charge raised against him was high treason against the Hitler Regime. As the judicial authority the People's Court (Volksgerichtshof), headed by that hanging judge Freisler, would have convicted him, if his imprisonment had not been exchanged for one by the victorious Allied powers. Ever since the summer of 1944 I held the commission to defend Schacht before Adolf Hitler's People's Court; in the summer of 1945 I was asked to conduct his defense before the International Military Tribunal. This, too, is in itself a self-contradictory state of affairs. This, too, forces all those participating in the trial to have misgivings, as far as the person of Schacht is concerned.

•DEFENSE

One involuntarily recalls the fate of Seneca. Nero, as a counterpart to Hitler, put Seneca on trial for revolutionary activities. After the death of Nero, Seneca was charged with complicity in the bad government and atrocities of Nero, and thus in a conspiracy. A certain wry humor is not lacking in the fact that Seneca was then declared a pagan saint by early Christianity as soon as the 4th century. Even if Schacht does not indulge in such expectations, this historical precedent nevertheless forces us to remain always conscious of the fact that the sentence to be pronounced by this High Court will also have to defend itself before the judgment seat of history.

The picture of the Third Reich has been revealed to the Tribunal in a thorough and careful presentation of evidence. It is a picture with a great deal of background. An opportunity was given to depict, within the range of possibility, these backgrounds also. Within the range of possibility! But at the same time this means the limitation of such a thoroughgoing investigation through a judicial presentation of evidence which was, to be sure, thorough, but which nevertheless had to be brought to an end as soon as possible, according to the requirements of the Charter.

In order to learn what it was like under Hitler in German countries, there is still enough which has been left to the intuition of the Court. It is not possible and will never be possible to understand Hitler-Germany from a constitutional point of view according to the scientific conceptions and views of people with a legal mind. As a scientific theme: "The Constitution under Adolf Hitler is a 'lucus a non locendo'." Understand me well! "The constitution", which means a legal arrangement made by the Hitler State, and not the final pleading of Jahrreiss to illuminate the tyranny of a despot from some legal point of view. Possible, but difficult and therefore not yet published, would be a scientific sociology of the Third Reich. Only a very few Germans who lived in Germany knew the conditions and distributions of power within those circles of people who were apparently or actually called upon to do their share for the formation of a political will. Most of them will be surprised after the unveiling of this picture. How much less possible was it for a foreigner at the time of bringing the indictment to judge correctly the constitutional, sociological, and internal political conditions of Hitler-Germany. But the correct judgment of these things was a prerequisite for an indictment founded correctly from both the factual and the legal point of view.

I am of the opinion that the prosecution authorities were thereby confronted with what was for them an insoluble task. I am furthermore of the opinion that the prosecution would have never presented their criminal charges against the defendants under the head of a conspiracy, if they could have understood the distribution of political power in Hitler-Germany in the way as this is perhaps possible to-day for an intelligent observer and listener at this trial who is gifted with political intuition, even if this would be difficult enough.

A conspiracy within the meaning of their indictment was as a practical matter not possible in the Third Reich of Adolf Hitler. In the Third Reich nothing was possible but a conspiracy by the opposition against Adolf Hitler and the regime. As we ascertained here, several of such conspiracies took place. Conspirators act somewhat differently to one other than an assistant acts toward the chief perpetrator. The part to be played by the individual conspirator in the execution of the common plan may vary. Several or even one of the conspirators may hold a leading position within the conspiracy. At all times however, cooperation is necessary. Usage of language in itself precludes speaking of a conspiracy if only one commands and all the others are merely executing organs. I am therefore of the opinion that what in this Court has been defined as crime can never be subsumed (subsummiert) according to criminal law as facts in a case of conspiracy. Other legal factors which might come into question are of no interest to me as defense counsel for the defendant Schacht, because as an individual person, without connection with deeds of others and consequently only on the basis of his own actions no criminal charge at all can be brought against Schacht. Schacht personally wanted the permissible and the best. His actions served this desire. To the extent that he erred from a political point of view, he is just as ready to have history judge his deeds. But even the greatest dynamics of international law cannot penalize political error. If it did this, the profession of the statesman and politician would be impossible. World history moves more through mistakes and errors than through correct perceptions. According to Lessing's wise word the recognition of absolute truth is reserved to God. There remains to man only the endeavor to find truth as the highest possession. Old Axel Oxenstierna already said and probably appropriately, nescis mi fili quanta stultitia mundus regitur.

DEFENSE

Schacht declared here that he was most grossly deceived by Adolf Hitler. Thereby he admitted the erroneous element in certain of his decisions and actions. The prosecution disputes Schacht's good faith and imputes to him the dolus of being Adolf Hitler's agent in finances he deliberately worked for a war of aggression thereby placing him implicitly under the angle of conspiracy before penal law because of all the deeds of cruelty which were committed by others during this war. Even the Prosecution was not able to produce direct proof for these claims. They tried it first by means of purportedly documentary evidence in the form of misinterpreted utterances by Schacht, torn from their context. Herein the Prosecution referred to witnesses who could not be made available for examination before this Court because in part they were absent, or in part they had died. I recall the affidavits of Messersmith and Fuller and the diary notes of Dodd. Their inadequate value as evidence was thoroughly set forth to the Tribunal in Schacht's examination by me. In the interest of saving time, I do not like to repeat what has been said and surely must still be within the recollection of the court.

The Prosecution further attempted to confirm its charges on the basis of Schacht's actions as determined beyond reason of doubt. All these arguments by the Prosecution are erroneous conclusions from alleged indexes. I am confining myself to enumeration of the most essential false conclusions. The others follow by necessity either directly therefrom or analogous therewith.

Schacht was a foe of the Treaty of Versailles, so says the Prosecution. This he was indeed. The opposition in itself the Prosecution does not hold against him. However, it concludes therefrom that Schacht strove to do away with it by force. The Prosecution says that Schacht favored colonial activity. He did indeed. It does not reproach him because of it but it concludes therefrom that he wanted to conquer the colonies by force and so it goes on.

Schacht cooperated with Hitler as President of the Reichsbank and Minister Economics, consequently he indorsed Nazi ideology. Schacht was member of the Reich Defense Council, consequently he was in favor of a war of aggression. Schacht helped to finance rearmament during its first phase until early in 1938, consequently he wanted war. Schacht welcomed union with Austria, consequently he approved of a policy of violence against that country. Schacht devised the "New Plan" of commercial policy, consequently he wanted to procure raw materials or armament. Schacht was concerned about the possibilities for existence for excess populations in Central Europe, consequently he wanted to attack and conquer foreign countries and to annihilate foreign peoples. Over and over again Schacht warned the world against an anti-German policy of oppression and the moral defamation of Germany, consequently Schacht threatened war. Because no written evidence has been found for Schacht's withdrawal from his official positions as a result of his antagonism to war, the conclusion is that he resigned from these official positions merely because of his rivalry with Goering.

The enumeration of erroneous conclusions could be continued as long as one likes. It finds its culmination in the false conclusion: Hitler would never have come to power if it had not been for Schacht; never would Hitler have been able to rearm if Schacht had not helped. This kind of evaluation of evidence would condemn the automobile manufacturer because, while drunk, the driver of the car ran over a pedestrian.

In his speeches or writings Schacht never advocated force or perhaps even war. It is certain that after Versailles he pointed out again and again the dangers which would result from the moral outlawing and from the economic exclusion of Germany. In this opinion he is in the best international company. It is not necessary for me to cite before this Tribunal the numerous voices, not of Germans but of members of the victor States, beginning soon after the Versailles Treaty, which are in the same tone as the warnings of Schacht. The correctness of this confirmed proof will in any case be valid for all time. At no time did Schacht, however, recommend other ways or even declare them possible, than those of a peaceful understanding and collaboration. To him as a pronounced economic politician it was clearer than to any other, that a war can never bring a solution, not even when it is won. In all of Schacht's statements his pacifist attitude was expressed again and again in the shortest and the most appropriate manner perhaps, in that statement at the Berlin Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce, when Schacht, in the presence of Hitler, Goering, and other heads of the Government called out to the assembly: "Believe me, my friends, the nations wish to live and not to die." This pronounced pacifist attitude of Schacht is likewise confirmed by all witnesses and affidavits.

For the few in the world—and I purposely say in the world and not only "in Germany"—who correctly recognized Hitler and his Government from the very beginning, it certainly was an anxiety and a sorrow, at the very least a problem, to see a man like Schacht placing his services and his great specialist ability at the disposition of Adolf Hitler after he had come to power. The witness Gisevius also shared this anxiety, as he has testified here. Later on he convinced himself of Schacht's honorable intentions through the latter's belligerent and brave behavior in the years 1938 and 1939. In his interrogation Schacht has outlined the reasons which caused him to act in this manner. I need not, and I do not wish to repeat them in the interests of saving time. The evidence has not shown anything which would be contrary to the veracity of this presentation by Schacht. To the contrary. I only refer, for example, to the affidavit of Secretary of State Schmid, Exhibit 41 of my document book, which contains detailed statements on this subject on page 2, which are in complete agreement with Schacht's description. Consideration of the remaining testimonies of witnesses and affidavits as a whole leads to the same result. In order to understand the manner in which Schacht acted at that time as well as directly after the seizure of power, and also later, when he had recognized Hitler and his disastrous effect, it is absolutely necessary to gain a clear picture regarding the disastrous secrecy of Adolf Hitler and his system of government. For both are the soil from which Schacht's actions arose, and by which alone they can be explained. I realize that one could speak about this for days and that volumes could be written about it, should one wish to exhaust the subject.

DEFENSE

However, I also realize that before this Tribunal short references and spotlights are sufficient in order to gain the appreciation of the Tribunal. The disintegrating collapse of imperial Germany in the year 1918 presented the German people with a parliamentary-democratic form of Constitution, which was established superficially and which never became part and parcel of the nation. I claim that all unselfishly directed political thinking must strive for democracy, if by it the protection of justice, tolerance against those of different convictions and liberty, as well as the political shaping of humanity is also understood. These are the highest ideals of all time, which, however in certain constituted forms harbor especial dangers for themselves. If, at the introduction of democracy on the European Continent, reactionary political thinkers like Count Metternich and the like opposed all democratic tendencies, then they did this because they saw only the dangers of democracy, and not its characteristics for the advantage of humanity and its necessity at the time. With regard to these dangers they were unfortunately right. The cleverest nation which has perhaps ever lived, the Greeks of Antiquity, had already pointed out the danger of the development of democracy through demagogic to tyranny, and probably all philosophical political thinkers from Aristotle to Thomas Aquinas up to the present time have pointed out the danger of this development. This danger increases in extent if democratic freedom in the formal state-legislative sense does not grow and become inherent in the nation, but becomes more or less a chance gift to a nation.

"En fait d'histoire il vaut mieux continuer que recommencer," a great French thinker has said. Unfortunately this has caused Germany to become the latest and it is to be hoped the last example of a tyranny established by means of the devilish demagogic of one individual despot. For there is no doubt: The Hitler Government is a despotism of an individual, which can only find comparison in Asia at a time which is far behind us. In order to understand the attitude of every individual toward this Government, not only that of Schacht, not only that of every German, but generally that of every person or that of each and every government in the world, which has collaborated with Hitler, and such collaboration, based on confidence on the part of the foreign countries was much greater toward Hitler than toward any government of the so-called interim-Reich or of the so-called State of the Weimar Constitution; it is therefore necessary to analyse the personality of this despot, this political pied-piper, this genial demagogue, who, as Schacht here testified in his interrogation with comprehensible excitement, did not only betray him, but also the German people and the whole world. In order to complete this betrayal, Hitler was forced to draw innumerable clever and politically trained personalities besides Schacht, even outside the German frontiers, into the aura of his personality. In this he even succeeded with prominent foreigners, even those in leading political positions.

I shall refrain from citing names and from quotations to prove this point. The fact is generally known to the Tribunal. To mention names at this moment would not be without a certain discomfort as much for the audience as for the speaker, especially in this room and at this trial. In this conjuncture, a defense counsel can afford to be considerate when it is not damaging to the cause he defends. It is immaterial, however, when the fact quoted by the defense counsel in his argument is already known to the Tribunal by reason of the latter's general knowledge and experience. How was this ascendancy of Hitler both in Germany and abroad possible? Of course Faust, too, was under the ascendancy of Mephisto. In Germany, every circumstance exposed at the examination of evidence as to the situation then prevalent in Germany ran counter to this ascendancy, and the same applies to Schacht. The total collapse of the parliamentary party system and the resulting necessity, then already felt by the existing Government, of having to govern by emergency decrees enacted without parliamentary participation, and thus establishing a dictatorship of the ministerial bureaucracy as a fore runner of the Hitler dictatorship, elicited from nearly every quarter a clamor for a stronger leadership. The economic crisis and employment opened the ears of the masses as misery always does, to demagogic whispers. The complete lethargy and inactivity of the existing middle and left parties moreover instilled critical and intelligent observers, which Schacht assuredly was, with the moral deadness and yearning to welcome impetuous political "dynamics" and activity. So far as one so sharp witted and perspicacious as Schacht already discovered faults and dark sides at the outset, he could believe, and Schacht did believe, that he could, precisely by active penetration into the movement or by cooperation with leading State departments, which he did combat, quickly and easily these dark sides, attendant upon every revolutionary movement. "When the eagle soars, vermin settle upon its wings," replied the late Minister of Justice Guertner, quoting from Konrad Ferdinand Meyer's "Pescara," when I remarked to him about these dark sides after the seizure of power. These considerations are in themselves reasonable and plausible. The fact that they contained a political error, bearing even upon Schacht's person, does not deprive them of their good faith and honest inspiration. We do not, however, wish to forget that we have heard here, during the proceedings, a message from the American Consul General Messersmith, dating from 1933, in which he joyfully hails the report that decent and sensible people are now joining the Party, as it is hoped thereby that this would do away with radicalism. I refer to the document submitted here by the Prosecution: Document L-198, a report by the American Consul General Messersmith to the Secretary of State in Washington.

DEFENSE

"Since the election on March 5th, some of the more important thinking people in various parts of Germany have allied themselves with the National-Socialist movement, in the hope of tempering its radicalism by their action within rather than without the Party."

But what Messersmith very reasonably says of ordinary Party members of that time, naturally applies also, with the necessary adjustments, to the man who placed his collaboration in a leading government post at Hitler's service. The motive given by Schacht for his decision at the time to accept the post of President of the Reichsbank and later of Minister of National Economy is therefore intrinsically credible and has no immoral or criminal implication. Schacht has always been a man of action. He only lacked at the outset the intuition to recognize the personalities of Hitler and some of his associates for what they were. But that is no punishable act, neither does it indicate a criminal intention. This intuition has been generally lacking both within and without the German frontiers. Intuition is an attribute of fortune and an irrational gift.

Every man has his limitations, even the most intelligent. Schacht is assuredly very intelligent, but with him reason has prevailed to the detriment of intuition. In conclusion, this circumstance can only be fully understood when these mysterious forces are taken into account, which affect universal events and of which Wallenstein says: "The earth belongs to the evil Spirit, not to the good" and goes on to speak of the "Powers of Darkness which under cover of darkness, perform evil deeds." Adolf Hitler was a prominent example of these powers of darkness and the effects he created were all the worse as he lacked any Satanic grandeur. He remained a half educated, completely material little bourgeois who, moreover, had no sense of justice whatever. Defendant Frank says truly of him that he hated jurists because the jurist appeared to him as a disturbing factor for his power. Thus, he could promise anything to anybody and not keep his promise because a promise for him meant only a technical instrument of power, not a legal bond. Neither was the pernicious effect of Himmler and Bormann detected by Schacht at the time, or indeed by anybody. Nevertheless, all those crimes that are now indicted in this Court, matured within this trio, for, to Himmler as well, politics were identical with murder, and his purely biological view of human society represented it to him as a herd of cattle and never as a social and ethical community. A personality like Adolf Hitler and its effect upon men, including such intelligent men as Schacht, can thus only be correctly judged by following the prophetic vision of the poet, as I have endeavored to do, and penetrating into spheres of knowledge generally closed to the reasoning power of man. The demoniac has undoubtedly been incarnated in Adolf Hitler for the hurt of Germany and the world, and, to sum up, I can, here—and this is necessary for the comprehension of the conduct of Schacht as well as of all those others who deliberately and in all purity of heart, offered their services to Hitler—quote a passage from our Goethe, which says everything in few words and discloses the deepest mysteries. Here lies the key to the comprehension of all those followers of Hitler. May I quote from "Poetry and Truth" Part 4, Book 20, as follows:

DEFENSE

"Although the Demoniac can manifest itself in everything material and immaterial and indeed be most obviously apparent in the beasts, it most usually stands in the most wonderful association with man, and constitutes a power disturbing, where not opposed, to the world order." For the phenomena caused thereby, there are innumerable names. For all philosophies and religions have tried, both prosaically and poetically, to solve this riddle and finally to dismiss the matter, which they are, in the future, at liberty to do. But the demoniac assumes its most dreadful form when it appears in an overwhelming measure in a particular person. During my lifetime I have had occasion to observe several such persons either closely or from afar. They were not always the best of persons, either spiritually or by their talents, and they were seldom recommendable by their goodness of heart. A tremendous force, however, emanates from them, and they exercise an incredible power over every creature, even over the elements, and who can tell how far such an influence will extend. No coalition of honest forces can prevail against them; it is in vain that the better part of humanity attempts to put them in disrepute as aberrants or as impostors. Humanity as a whole is attracted by them. They seldom or never find contemporary equals, and nothing short of the Universe itself, against which they initiated the fight, can prevail against them; and those observations can indeed inspire that curious though terrible phrase: "Nemo contra Deum, nisi Deus ipse."

I think I have demonstrated that the fact of having served Hitler does not criminally inculpate Schacht in any way, and that it can by no means be concluded from this fact that he had been acquiescent, at the time, to the criminal deeds of Hitler and his regime. Indeed, he did not think them possible. Neither was it a case of dolus eventualis, on the contrary: so far as the violent character of the regime disturbed him, he believed he could, by his appointment to an important post, contribute to the abolition and prevention of those consequences he disapproved, and promote, in his operative sphere, Germany's honorable and peaceful ascension.

Even if it turned out that he not only served Hitler after the seizure of power but had helped him to seize power, no single reproach could be made against him. This latter charge is therefore void as evidence of criminal behavior or of criminal intention. However, there is no need for this argumentation, since actually Schacht did not help Hitler to power. Hitler was in power when Schacht began to work for him.

Hitler had victory in his pocket when the July elections of the Reichstag in 1932 brought him no less than 230 mandates. These represented about 40 percent of the total votes. Such an election result for a party had not been seen for decades. Thus, the immediate political future was established in a Government headed by Hitler, thanks to the very rules of the German democratic constitution and of every democratic constitution. Every other method was fraught with the danger of civil war.

It was natural that Schacht who at that time honestly believed in Hitler's political mission did not wish to take this road. It was likewise natural that he should become an active link in the chain when he believed that by this attitude he would be able to prevent harmful radicalism from materializing in the economic political domain. A wise French statesman says:

"We are faced at some time or other and in some way or other by the task of creating advantages or preventing abuses; for this reason a patriotic man, according to my conception, can and must serve any government set up by his country." In his opinion Schacht was serving his country and not Hitler, if he was serving Hitler at that time. This opinion may have been as erroneous as possible and subsequently it has revealed itself completely false as far as Hitler was concerned; Schacht can in no case be criminally charged for acting as he did at that time, neither indirectly nor circumstantially. We must also not forget that the Hitler of 1933 not only seemed to be different from the Hitler of 1938 or even of 1941, but actually was different. At his interrogation Schacht already referred to the transformation caused by the venom of worship by the masses. The transformation of such personalities is a psychological law. History reveals this in Nero, Constantine the Great, and many others. In the case of Hitler, there exist many unsuspected witnesses for the truth of this fact, unsuspected in this sense that a purpose or an intention to violate the law, to raise terror to a principle, and to surprise mankind by a war of aggression, can never be imputed to them. I am going to quote a few of them. I could multiply the quotations a hundred fold.

[The Tribunal had previously rejected as evidence the writings of Lord Rothermore and Defense Counsel was reminded of this ruling.—Ed.]

I quote from Summer Welles' book "Time for Decision" published in New York in 1944: "Economic circles in each of the Western European democracies and of the New World welcomed Hitlerism." And it is only right, when Great Britain's last ambassador in Berlin even during the war states in page 25 of his book: "It would be highly unjust not to recognize that a great number of those who joined Hitler and worked for him and his Nazi regime were honest idealists," and further on he makes the interesting remark: "It is possible Hitler was an idealist himself in the beginning." The Government of Great Britain would never have concluded a naval treaty with Hitler-Germany already in April 1935, and therewith have contributed in a calculated way to a modification of the Versailles Treaty, if she had not had entire confidence in Hitler and his Government. After all, the same holds good for all international treaties concluded by Hitler, including the treaty with Russia concluded already in August 1939. And it is to-day deeply affecting when an ethically prominent man as the late British Prime Minister Chamberlain declared in a speech not later than January 1939 (namely at a time when Schacht had long since been treading the obscure paths of conspiracy), and in spite of the events of the year 1938, that he had gained the definite impression from Hitler's previous speech that it was not the speech of a man who was making preparations to plunge Europe into another war. I do not doubt that these words were not spoken as a matter of tactics but reflected the speaker's true opinion. Such examples could be quoted in great number. Would one for the years 1933 to 1939 deny a German the right to come to the same opinion about Hitler in good faith? This is also not inconsistent with the fact that Schacht entered office as a Minister of Economic Affairs only after 30 June 1934. Only in retrospect can one fully realize the monstrosity of these events. In June 1934 we were still in the midst of a revolutionary movement. History can probably ascertain similar occurrences in each such revolution. I need not prove this individually, neither should I like to do so here for the reasons previously discussed. The events of 30 June were just as little or even less reason for Schacht to turn away from Hitler with disgust, as they were not enough to prevent the governments in the world from not only continuing diplomatic relations with Hitler in full confidence, but also rendering him great honors and allowing him to score important successes in foreign policy, especially after 1934.

DEFENSE

If Schacht however cannot be criminally charged with the fact that he put himself at the disposal of Hitler's government, it is completely superfluous indeed. It would be of minor importance to intend by means of long statements to excuse individual acts such as the petition addressed to the Reich President in 1932 or his letter to Hitler in the same year. For someone who knows life the explanation for them comes quite naturally out of this fundamental attitude of Schacht. Should this attitude prove to be unobjectionable as far as criminality and the technique of handling evidence is concerned, then no such documents can be adduced against Schacht. All that matters is the principle. The same holds true for Schacht's participation in the so-called meeting of industrialists. In this subject I should like to remark by way of clarification (see Schnitzler affidavit), that Schacht neither conducted this meeting nor administered these funds exclusively for the National-Socialist Party.

Now a witness has given a verdict of good conduct for this very period of Schacht's attitude toward the seizure and establishment of power: "Schacht has been an untrustworthy and shifty fellow, Schacht betrayed the cause of democracy at that time, he—the witness—, therefore, refused in 1943 to join a government that should overthrow Hitler with Schacht's participation." He was former minister Severing who, according to his own statement, left his ministerial seat and room on 20 July 1932 when the President of the Police of Berlin accompanied by two police officers called on him demanding his removal from office with the assertion that they had been authorized to do so by the Reich President. Severing left the field, as he said himself, to avoid bloodshed. In spite of the great respect which I feel toward Severing's clean political character, I am forced to my regret to deny him any right to give a good name to statesmen who unlike him and his government coalition would not remain in lethargic passivity. Severing and his political friends do not, indeed, bear responsibility before a Judge, but before history for allowing Hitler to seize power, a disproportionately greater responsibility than Hjalmar Schacht because of their indecision and, finally, their lack of political ideas. This responsibility will be all the greater, as the witness claims to have already recognized at that time that Hitler's accession to power meant war. Even if one believes him to possess this correct political intuition, his and his political friends' responsibility will be all the greater in view of their passivity then and later, and on the other hand disproportionately greater than that of Hjalmar Schacht. Our German workers, however, are really no more cowardly than the Dutch. Our hearts rejoiced to hear a witness give evidence here on oath about the manly courage of Dutch workers, who dared to strike under the very bayonets of the invading army. The justifiable adherence of Severing and his political friends to the German working class might perhaps have induced them not to watch the dissolution of the trade unions with such blunt passivity, as was the case in 1933 when their natural leaders, such as Severing and his colleagues should have attempted a little and exposed themselves. Finally, the Kapp revolt in 1923 was also overcome by the general strike of the workmen. The Hitler Regime was not so strong in 1933 that the truth of the poet's word addressed to the workers did not need to be feared: "All wheels stand still when it is your strong arm's will." The National-Socialist Government at that time was quite well-informed about this and had corresponding apprehensions. This was demonstrated also by Goering's testimony on 13 October 1945, minutes of which were cited and handed over by Professor Kempner on 16 January 1946. Goering said: "You must consider that at that time the activity of the communists was extraordinarily strong and that our new Government was not very secure as such." But even this strong arm just mentioned required a guidance which remained denied to the working class. Men like Severing were called to it. In all justice, they will have to account for their passivity, not before the judge in a criminal court, but before history. I do not presume to make a final judgment. I restrict myself to revealing this problem and to attributing with complete human respect a strong and painful measure of self-righteousness to the witness Severing if he feels himself called upon to accuse others when examining the question who from the viewpoint of history is guilty of the seizure and strengthening of the power of Nazism, namely if in contrast to Schacht he foresaw intuitively the later evolution of Hitler, instead of submitting himself in humility to the judgment of history, with reference to his assuredly decent disposition and pure volition.

DEFENSE

We wish to keep always before our eyes in order to maintain the purity of historical truth, that at the beginning of Nazism—with the exception of an intervention from abroad—there were two power groups who could perhaps have liberated Germany: the army and the working class, both of course under corresponding guidance. I must be more detailed on this point, because such a detrimental remark by such a blameless and distinguished man as Severing, brings with it the danger of unjust deductions regarding my client. It would have been agreeable to me if I could have been spared this explanation of Severing's incriminating testimony. Severing has further raised the reproach of political opportunism against Schacht. In politics, the boundary between opportunism and statesmanlike efficacious dealing is very fluid. Before the conduct of Schacht in 1932 and 1933 is appraised as that of an opportunist, his past should be looked into. Since 1923 this past was lived in complete publicity. It was partly the object of these proceedings, it is partly juridical notoriety. This past speaks rather for the fact that Schacht does what he judges to be right, not only with great lack of consideration, but also with great courage. He proved his courage as conspirator against Hitler, as is necessarily proved by analyzing this activity as conspirator, and as Gisevius expressly described him here. But let us now go back to 1923. At that time he stabilized the Mark against all parties interested in inflation; in 1924 he blocked credits against all hoarders of foreign currency; in 1927 he deprived the exchange speculators of the credit basis for exchange gamble. He fought from 1925 to 1929 against the debt and the expenditure policy of the municipalities and drew by this on himself the enmity of all mayors. He signed the Young-Plan in 1929 and thus defied the opposition of the heavy industry's circles and in pursuit of this nature, he fought since 1934 against the errors and abuses of the Nazi-Ideology and has never carried out a desire or an order for himself which ran contrary to his conscience or his sense of justice. Every statesman must make certain concessions in a fanatical time. Certain preachers of ethics of which there are many to-day—who demand hardness of steel for the protection of principles, should not forget that steel has two qualities, not only the firmness, but also the pliancy.

At this time I request the Court to be permitted to state something beyond the translation of my pleading available to it, which I could not work into this translation because the cause for it came up at a time after the submission of my final pleading for translation, namely the statements of my colleague Dr. Nelte against the credibility of the witness Gisevius. Since I dwell here on the evaluation of a witness, it is the proper time here to answer this.

So far as my colleague Dr. Nelte found fault with the objective reliability of the testimony of the witness Gisevius in respect to his statements incriminating the defendants Keitel, Goering, and so on, I refrain from any statements. May the prosecution take any standpoint it desires. This is not my task.

But now Dr. Nelte has also attacked the subjective credibility of Gisevius in the personal moral of this witness and thus also indirectly the reliability of his testimony concerning Dr. Schacht. This demands my opinion, and namely one of a very basic nature. Your Honors: it is here where the souls separate. An unbridgeable cleavage opens up between Schacht's standpoint and the standpoint of all those who make these thoughts their own with which Dr. Nelte attempts to disqualify morally Gisevius, the deceased Canaris, Oster, Nebe, etc. I at least owe to my client this, to state the following very clearly and unequivocally:

Patriotism means faithfulness to the fatherland and the people and enmity to the quick against everyone who leads the fatherland and his own people criminally into misery and destruction. Such a leader is an enemy of the fatherland; in his influence on the fatherland he is many times more dangerous than the enemy in war. Every means, and namely a corsaire un corsaire et demi is just against such a criminal state leadership.

DEFENSE

High treason against such a state leadership is true and genuine patriotism and as such highly moral, even during war. Whoever can still entertain the slightest doubt after the findings of this trial and finally also after the testimony of Speer about the cynic statement by Hitler in respect to the destruction of the German people, that Adolf Hitler was the greatest enemy of his people, in short a criminal to this people, for the removal of whom every means would have been just and every, yes every deed would have been patriotic. Worlds separate Schacht from everyone in the prisoners' dock who does not recognize this.

In order to cleanse the atmosphere, this must be said. I can save myself after this fundamental clarification to disprove details of the attacks of Dr. Nelte against Dr. Gisevius. So far as Dr. Nelte misses readiness to act in these resistance groups to which Dr. Schacht belonged, I only point to the many dead who were hanged on 20 July only, where Schacht belongs to the very few survivors, and he as well was to be liquidated yet in Flossenbürg. I point to the fatal victims, numbering thousands of the political judiciary of the Hitlerian state. The war of conspiracy against Hitler, and the necessity for cunning, was not less dangerous to life and limb than exposure at the front.

Dr. Gisevius has admitted immediately to my loyally cross-examining colleague Dr. Kubuschock his error, resulting from the prohibition of publications, in the affair of Papen's resignation. I do not have to add anything further.

If I wind up now the evaluation of Schacht's conduct up to about 1935 and enter henceforth the period from 1935 to 1937, I may emphasize once more that, for the sake of saving time, I deliberately do not repeat the arguments which were fully brought to the knowledge of the Tribunal during the examination, thus the non-participation of Schacht in the legislation, which led to the abrogation of the rights of the people, as this took place before his entry into the Cabinet. The deciding event for the stabilization of Hitler's power, the amalgamation of offices of the President of the Reich and of the Chancellor of the Reich and on Hitler's personality, were also beyond his assistance and responsibility.

By this decree the Army took their oath to Hitler. The Chancellor of the Reich had not only authority over the police as before, but also authority over the Army. It is not my task to investigate who has to bear the political responsibility and historic guilt for this law; in any case it is not Schacht. Similarly it was before his entering upon office that the basic anti-Jewish laws were passed. He was quite surprised by the later Nurnberg laws. The decree dealing with the exclusion of Jews from the German economic life dated 12 November 1938 and the order for the confiscation of Jewish possessions of 3 December 1938 were issued after he had returned from the post of Minister of Economy and thus without his active collaboration. The same applies to the decree excluding Jews from the Reichs Labor Service, which did not weigh heavily on them.

The law concerning the death penalty for concealment of Foreign currency, the so-called law of betrayal of the people, was not directed against the Jews but solely against heavy industry and high finance, it was not made by Schacht but by the Minister of Finance. Schacht did not want such laws to be the cause of rupture, because he thought he had more important tasks to perform. This does not seem to be of such great importance, because Schacht had so let himself in for unpleasantness by his advocacy of the Jews in the Jewish question, by his public speeches and his exposes to Hitler, that it would be unjust to disqualify him politically or morally, not to mention juridically for this reason. I remember particularly the Reichsbank speech after the anti-Jewish pogroms in November 1938, the speech at Koenigsberg, the exposes of 1935 and so forth.

In the Third Reich Schacht was considered the most courageous and active protector of the Jews. I only refer to the letter of the Frankfurt business man Merton which was submitted to the court and to the illustrating statement of the witness Heyler. According to the latter, Himmler, when Heyler reproached him for the events of November 1936, replied that it had been ultimately the fault of the economic administration that things have gone so far. From a man like Herr Schacht one could not require anything more than that he exercised a constant restraining influence in the Jewish question and set himself against the will of the Party.

On my questioning him in reply, Justice Jackson defined this specific charge of the prosecution as follows: Schacht is not being prosecuted for anti-Semitism, but for activities, which stand in casual connection with the atrocities committed against the Jews within the framework of the war of planned aggression. From this it results that a denial of the guilt of a war of aggression leads with compelling logic to the denial of any guilt of the atrocities which were committed against the Jews during the war. Justice Jackson has made some phases of the legislative treatment of the Jews during Schacht's ministry the subject of his cross-examination. The questions asked and answered herein are irrelevant according to the Charter and the previously mentioned authentic interpretation of this part of the prosecution by Justice Jackson. The anti-Semitic legislation of the Third Reich and the personal attitude toward it of an individual defendant is, according to the Charter, relevant in these proceedings only so far as they are connected with other crimes, which were committed according to the Charter, as for example the conspiracy to wage war, the exterminations, and so forth. According to the Charter they cannot be an offense in themselves, nor even one against humanity. Only those defendants are punishable for their deeds who can be proved to have participated in the planning of a war of aggression and its inhuman consequences against the Jews. A prerequisite for their conviction, however, is that they recognized and desired this goal and its result.

DEFENSE

There is no purely objective responsibility for the final result of an action (Erfolgshaftung) in criminal law. According to the Charter, that man is punishable who desired war and also the inhuman actions connected with it, but the incriminating activity must always have occurred within the scope of carrying out such a plan. This purely legal view in itself excludes the conviction of Schacht because of atrocities against the Jews.

A discrepancy between the prosecution, especially between the statements of Justice Jackson and myself, must likewise be clarified at this point, otherwise we will be talking at cross purposes. During the testimony Justice Jackson has repeatedly pointed out that the defendant is not being charged with anti-Semitism as such, that he is not being charged with his opposition to the Versailles Treaty, that he is not being charged with his ideas and statements on the so-called Lebensraum problem, and, thus the food problem of the Central European nations, that he is not being charged with his colonial aspirations, but that on the contrary he is being charged with all this only to the extent that it has served, with his knowledge and desire, for the preparation of a war of aggression. With this objection Justice Jackson tried to cut short certain questions and discussions.

This would have been justified and I could now omit such arguments, if the Prosecution would not take with one hand all it gives with the other. Because with this other hand, the course of argumentation, everything, namely his alleged anti-Semitism, etc., is used as indirect proof and evidence that Schacht had prepared and desired this war of aggression. The Prosecution does not count all that as a criminal fact in itself, but as indirect testimony, as evidence. Therefore in its valuation as evidence I must take these problems into consideration. The Jewish question has, think, been dealt with. In the problem of vital space (Lebensraum) I can only refer, in order to save time, to what Schacht, during his interrogation, has stated for justification of his statements and activities. The colonial problem was the subject of cross-examination by Justice Jackson inasmuch as he tried to prove by his representations and questions that colonial activity by Germany was impossible without world domination or militarily prepared command of the seas at least. The further development of this idea would result in the defendant Schacht being charged with the fact that his struggle for Colonies logically implied the planning of a war of aggression. This is a wrong inference. I think that Justice Jackson's conception of Colonial Policy is too imperialistic a one. Whoever desires colonies for his country without dominating the world or at least the sea, starts out with colonial aspirations under the supposition of a lasting state of peace vis a vis the stronger seapowers.

He must believe in peace with those powers. Germany had also possessed Colonies from 1884 until the First World War. Her Merchant Navy tonnage carried on the necessary traffic with these colonies. Her prewar Merchant Navy tonnage would have also been sufficient. Air communications, in reply to Justice Jackson's question, would not have been needed. Nothing supports the presumption that by his desire for colonies, Schacht would have aimed at a removal of foreign naval supremacy by war. Concerning his general conduct one can hardly take him for so foolish. France and Holland likewise possess colonies, but certainly do not control the sea routes. This representation of the prosecution is indeterminate. The Tribunal moreover knows well, that during the years before this war nearly all the statesmen of the victorious powers have proved sympathetic to these colonial aspirations of Germany as shown in many public speeches.

I would now refer to the subject of rearmament, i.e., to the activity of Schacht in his capacity as President of the Reichsbank and Reich Minister of Economics until 1937, i.e., until a date when he had changed from a loyal servant of Adolf Hitler to a traitor against him, and when he chose the dark ways of tricks and disimulation coupled with preparatives for murder.

The prosecution applies the violation of the Versailles Treaty, the Locarno Pact and of other treaties as indirect proof, as evidence of his aggressiondolus. This first involves the question whether in general any objective treaty violations took place and whether, in the affirmative case, these treaty violations must be looked upon as indicatives of an aggressiondolus in the person of a member of the Reich Government, i.e., also in the person of Schacht. It is impossible and also unnecessary to exhaust within the framework of this pleading the problem whether and how far treaty violations were committed. Only a short remark may serve to prove at least the problematical solution of this question. This again is important for subjective estimation. There are no external treaties in the domain of civil jurisdiction and still less in the domain of international law. The clausula rebus sic stantibus plays a much more important role in the domain of international law, i.e., in the political intercourse between nations, than in the lawful intercourse between individuals.

DEFENSE

One has to be very careful not to adapt the principles of the low level of civil law to the high and wide domain of the International jurisdiction. The international law has its own dynamics. The highly political intercourse between nations is subject to other juridical aspects than the commercial and personal intercourse between individuals. The most striking proof of the correctness of this thesis is the juridical argumentation of the bill of indictment, so far as it deals with the sentence "nulla poena sine lege poenale" and demands the individual punishment of the leading statesmen of an aggressor nation instead of the issue of sanctions. Particularly the man who affirms the conception of the prosecution in this respect, thus acknowledges the dynamics of international law and the fact, that international law develops in accordance with its own laws.

History has taught that treaties according to international law do not come to an end by a formal repeal but die in the course of the evolution of facts. They die out necessarily by themselves. In individual instances one might be of a different opinion whether this is the case. But it does not alter the accuracy of this established fact. The remilitarization of the Rhineland and also the introduction of general conscription, the extent of rearmament, the voluntary "Anschluss" of Austria to Germany approved of and aimed at by Schacht, certainly are offenses against the meaning and text of the above mentioned pacts, particularly the Versailles Treaty. If such violations are only answered by formal protestations, whilst very friendly relations continue, yes even honor is shown to the offending nation, if agreements are concluded which alter the principal perception of such a treaty, as for instance the Naval Pact with Great Britain, one can very well advocate the opinion that by such facts a treaty slowly becomes obsolete and extinct, that such a subjective point of view at least finds its justification. I beg to consider that the principal presupposition for the conclusion of an armament pact, as for instance the Naval Pact with Great Britain, is the recognition of the military sovereignty of both nations. The latter being denied to Germany was one of the main points of view of the Versailles Treaty.

I will not speak here about the justice or injustice of this treaty. I know the Court's wish or rather prohibition in regard to this matter, and of course I shall bow to it. But I must and I may speak about the legal possibility and therefore the innocence, criminally speaking, of Schacht's subjective opinions on the question of treaty violation. Even if therefore one wished to defend the point of view that the said treaties have not become obsolete, one cannot, as far at least as its honesty is concerned, doubt the subjective justification of a contrary opinion. But if this is answered in the affirmative, these treaty violations are no longer any proof of the criminal intention of a war of aggression. But that is the only point in question. For the violation of treaties as such is not yet considered by the Charter as a punishable act. Here also Schacht can justify his honest belief by reference to similar ways of considering the question by foreign statesmen, in the case of which the suspicion of a German will for aggression is therefore as a matter of course logically excluded from the very beginning. Here again I must limit myself to a few instances, as a complete enumeration would exceed the time limits of this plea. The first of the violations of the Versailles Treaty is supposedly the re-introduction of general military service. The British Foreign Minister Sir John Simon, with a statesman's far-sighted objectivity, as reported by the press and by wireless-broadcasts, and therefore universally known, and consequently of value as legal evidence, replied to these measures as follows:

"There is no doubt that it had been expected that upon the forced disarmament of Germany, a concerted reduction of the armaments of other big nations would follow." These remarks contained a confirmation of the juridical point of view I developed a while ago, in spite of the blaming of Hitler's action that followed them. The same applies to the fact that the visit of Sir John Simon and Anthony Eden to Berlin took place eight days after this so-called treaty violation, namely on 24 March 1935. It would not have taken place, if this measure of Hitler's had been considered abroad as a militarily aggressive one. As you also know, I may only make a short reference to the history of the discussion of this question at the Council of the League of Nations, as it is well-known. Should Schacht, as a German and a German Minister, judge it in a different manner to that of the foreign government?

A second violation of the treaty was the occupation of the Rhineland, also in March 1936. This action was not a breach only of the Treaty of Versailles, but also of the Locarno Pact, that is of an undoubtedly voluntarily contracted treaty. Two days later Mr. Baldwin stated in the House of Commons, in a speech made public and therefore of value as legal evidence, that, while the way Germany acted could not be excused, there was no reason to assume that this action contained a menace of hostilities. Was the German and German Minister Schacht to take a more sceptical attitude in regard to the aggressive significance of the act than foreign countries? And in particular when he was forced to register the fact which also belongs to history and is universally known, that 10 days after this breach of treaty the Locarno Powers, apart from Germany, submitted to the Council of the League of Nations a Memorandum proposing the reduction of the number of German troops in the Rhineland to 35,000 men, and wishing only to avoid the strengthening of the SA and SS in the Rhineland, and likewise the erection of fortifications and aerodromes. Should this Memorandum not be interpreted as a ratification of an alleged breach of the treaty? A third breach of the treaty was the fortification of Helgoland, which was hardly noticed by the contracting parties and called forth from Eden, in a historical public speech to the House of Commons on 29 July 1936, merely the remark that it was not considered appropriate to increase the difficulties of the debate by individual questions like the foregoing. Was the German Minister Schacht to take up another and sharper attitude? And what about the terrorist annexation of Austria in March 1938, when moreover Schacht was no longer Reich Minister for Economy? Had foreign countries gathered from this action the conviction that Hitler was preparing a war of aggression, they would not have renounced the use of force. Should the German Minister Schacht hold a different opinion and act accordingly? He already held it and was already eagerly at work with Witzleben and others to eliminate Adolf Hitler and his regime by means of a revolt. The efforts of these patriotic conspirators were however frustrated, according to the unequivocal testimony of witness Gisevius, because Hitler was able to register one success after another in external politics.

DEFENSE

I will only recall the unequivocal evidence of Gisevius regarding the effects of the Munich Agreement on the striking power of the opposition group working with Schacht. I will recall the evidence of Gisevius regarding the warnings and hints which in this connection were sent beyond the German frontiers to responsible personalities of foreign countries. Is it fair to require from the German Minister Schacht a more critical attitude in respect to these political developments than that taken by foreign countries, the interests of which had been injured? He had, as we know from Gisevius, and also from Vocke and all the affidavits submitted, —had a far clearer opinion after 1937 in which year he began treading the dark ways of a conspirator. I will recall his first contacts with the then General von Kluge. I could multiply examples such as those just mentioned. I do not criticize this attitude of foreign countries, it is not my business, quite apart from the fact that I have a complete understanding for this responsibly conscious pacifist attitude resulting therefrom. It is, however, my duty to point out that no warlike intention can be imputed to Schacht or account of his opinions and attitude, when the same opinions and attitude can be identified in the affected foreign countries. If foreign countries could entertain the hope of further maintaining friendly relations with Hitler, the same right must be conceded to Schacht, as long as he claims the same right. He does not claim it for himself at least after the Fritsch crisis of 1938.

From then onward he had, as foreign countries had not, clearly perceived the danger. This, according to the evidence of Gisevius, is undeniable, and he personally did all he could at the greatest risk of liberty and life, to maintain peace by attempting to overthrow Hitler. That all these revolts before the war and after outbreak of war were unsuccessful cannot, according to all the evidence submitted be imputed to him as his fault. The responsibility for the failure of this German resistance movement does not lie with itself, but somewhere else within and without the German frontiers. I shall revert to this later.

There remains therefore the fact of rearmament as such. Here also I can refer to the statements Schacht made for his justification during his examination. This was exhaustive and a repetition would be superfluous. It is therefore also superfluous to enter into an academic discussion as to whether Schacht's views were right, that is, to say whether it is right that a certain amount of military force sufficient for defensive purposes was necessary for any country, and particularly for Germany, and whether his opinion was right, that the non-fulfillment of the obligation to disarm by the parties to the Versailles Treaty justified the rearmament of Germany. The sole question in point is whether these opinions and motives of Schacht were honest or whether he pursued secret aggressive intentions under cover of these defensive armaments. But nothing can be confirmed against the honesty of these opinions, of course it can be contended whether the proverb "si vis pacem para bellum" has an immediate validity or whether objectively any strong rearmament does not carry an inherent danger of war, since good armies with competent officers naturally strive for possibilities of active service. Of course the thesis can be defended that moral strength is stronger than any armed strength. The cohesion of the British Empire and the world-wide influence of the Vatican's foreign politics could here be cited as proof. All these questions carry a certain relativity in themselves. At any rate one thing is certain, and it is that in all large countries of the world the warning is always and always renewed that one must be militarily strong to preserve peace. Nations whose individualism and love of liberty rejected universal defensive service and a strong standing army now do the contrary and believe honestly to serve peace thereby. Let us take as an example a nation whose love of liberty nobody in the world, even the most mistrustful can question, viz., Switzerland. Even this peace-loving nation has always taken pride in maintaining the defense capacity of its people just in order to protect its freedom and independence in a peaceful manner. One may academically call this idea of discouraging foreign aggression by the maintenance of a sufficiently strong defensive army imperialistic. It is at any rate honestly entertained by peaceful and liberty-loving nations, and perhaps serves the cause of peace more effectively than many so-called anti-military or pacifist doctrines. This reasonable point of view has really nothing to do with militarism. He who still to-day recognizes it as justified for great and small nations may not contest the honesty of their representation by Schacht in the years 1935 to 1938. I have no more to say about this.

DEFENSE

I also need not give a wearisome enumeration of figures and make technical statements, that this part of rearmament which Schacht first financed with 9 milliard and then reluctantly with a further 3 milliard was by no means sufficient for a war of aggression, not even for an effective defense of the German frontiers. The answers that the witnesses Keitel, Bodenschatz, Milch, General Thomas, Kesselring, etc., have made to this in their depositions and affidavits, are available and have been submitted or have been officially brought to the knowledge of the Tribunal. In this respect they are unanimous that Germany even at the outbreak of war, i.e., one and a half years later, was not armed sufficiently for an offensive war; and that therefore it was not only a crime against humanity but also against his own people, confided to his leadership, if Hitler led this people in August 1939 into a war of aggression.

I therefore also consider it superfluous to make longer statements, if Blomberg's statement is correct that Schacht was aware of the progress of rearmament or the statement of Schacht and Vockes that this was not the case. I admit without further discussion the bona fides of Blomberg's statement. But as he had more to do with the technical side of rearmament than the Reichsbank, personal experience shows, that the memory of Schacht and Vockes is more reliable on this point than Blomberg's to whom this report to the Reichsbank was a matter of secondary importance for his department. For the Reichsbank, the desire to be informed about the technical progress of the armament and not only about the financial expenditures was a very important thing. One remembers such facts more reliably than unimportant, secondary matters. In any case it is established that until the budget-year 1937-38 only 21 milliard were spent for armament, of which 12 milliard were financed by credits of the Reichsbank and that according to Jodl's statement of June 5th, on 1 April 1938 only 27 to 28 divisions were ready, whereas in 1939, however, there were already 73 to 75 divisions. It needs no expert to show that volume of expenditures and armament on April 1st was entirely insufficient for a war of aggression. Hitler indeed was also of the same opinion when, in his memorandum of August 1936, which has been submitted to the court, and which was handed over to Speer in 1944, he pointed out, along with many disapproving remarks about Schacht's economic leadership, that four precious years had gone by, that one had had time enough in these four years to determine what we could not do and that he was hereby ordering that the German army would have to be ready for action in four years, and so in the course of the year 1940. I recall to the memory of the court, that after Schacht's withdrawal as president of the Reichsbank 31½ milliard were spent on armament during the two budget-years 1938-39 and 1939-40. The issuing and expenditure of money on armament therefore went on without Schacht, too, and, indeed, to an even more considerable extent. At that time, Schacht had written to Blomberg that he couldn't produce money out of the air.

He exercised a constant pressure on Blomberg along this line. I now refer to his letter to Blomberg of 21 December 1935 which has been submitted to the court. He exercised a restraining influence by means of explanatory lectures to officers of the war ministry and of the Armed Forces Academy. He refused the railway loan of 1936 presented by the Minister of Communications, which was indirectly in the interest of armament and stopped the credits of the Reichsbank as early as the beginning of 1937 by making a compromise on the final 3 milliard. He refused the credit which the Reich Finance Minister requested from him in December 1938.

He created an automatic brake for the armament expenditures through the Mefo bills, which from the technically financial point of view was a rather bold measure, but still legally tenable. These served first of all to finance the armament expenditures, but restricted further armament expenditures after their expiration on 1 April 1939, because the Reich was bound to honor them. Schacht's foresight proved true. The increase in employment brought such a rise in the state revenues, that it would not have been difficult to liquidate the Mefo bills at their expiration after 5 years. Keitel's statement has proved that during the budget year beginning 1 April 1938, five milliard marks more were spent for armament than during the preceding year, although after 1 April 1938 the Reichsbank credits had completely ceased. Half of these 5 billions would have sufficed to honor the Mefo bills which matured during the budget year beginning 1 April 1939. This money would have been saved from further armament. But this was exactly what Schacht intended. From the beginning he had limited the validity of the Mefo bills to 5 years; he stopped the credit assistance of the Reichsbank on 1 April 1939 in order to limit the armament. It was impossible for Schacht to foresee that Hitler would simply break a strict credit obligation and not pay the bills. These facts in themselves show that his attempts to resign could have had no other reason than opposition to any further armament and the refusal to accept responsibility for this. In this sense, the assertion of the prosecution that he wanted to evade responsibility, is completely correct.

DEFENSE

Nothing shows that any other motives which necessarily appear from the facts just mentioned caused him to make this endeavor to relinquish his duties. If the prosecution says that the reason was his antagonism to Goering, this is also right so far as Schacht was an opponent of the Four-Year-Plan, of which Goering was the chief. That the reason was a rivalry of power is a pure supposition, an interpretation of the actual events, which justifies the quotation: "Interpret to your heart's desire, because if you do not interpret, you are just quoting someone else." The Reichsbank's memorandum of November 1938 which led to the dismissal of Schacht and most of his collaborators, including Vocke, is also unequivocally and forcibly opposed to armament. It naturally had to contain a justification which was derived from the departmental jurisdiction of the Reichsbank. Its aim was generally known. Hence Hitler's remark: "This is mutiny." The memoire ends with the demand for the capital and loan market, as well as the management of taxation, to be controlled by the Reichsbank. Compliance with this demand would have taken away from Hitler every possibility of raising money for further armament. This demand was, therefore, unacceptable to Hitler. Schacht and his colleagues knew this. Accordingly, they deliberately sought a break by this step. Schacht now bore no responsibility. From now on Schacht could devote himself exclusively to the plans for a coup d'etat by the conspiratorial group to which he belonged. He became a traitor to Hitler. By remaining minister without portfolio, he hoped to learn about events for the aims of his conspiratorial group than if he resigned altogether. I shall return to this point later.

The fact of the armament, as such, therefore proves absolutely nothing for the assertion of the prosecution, that Schacht deliberately contributed to the preparation of war of aggression. Such a conclusion is no less grotesque, as I must constantly repeat, than the comparison already often cited between the automobile manufacturer and the taxi driver.

Simultaneous economic armament, however, belongs of necessity to armament in the modern sense. On the German side, this was already recognized for the first time at the beginning of the first World War, and even by two very important German Jews, namely the founder of the Hamburg-America Line, Albert Ballin, and the great German industrialist Rathenau. It is this same Rathenau, who made that wonderful speech on peace during the Conference at Genoa, surrounded by the wild applause of those very Powers which had opposed his country but four years previously as enemies, and as the German Foreign Minister, who fell as a sacrifice in the beginning of the twenties to an anti-Semitic outrage. I may presumably suppose the personality of Albert Ballin to be known to the Court. Both men recognized already at the start of the first World War the error of a discontinued economic mobilization. Rathenau then organized the so-called War Raw Materials Department of the War Ministry. The first Plenipotentiary for War Economy, since this is all he was, therefore was ideologically a pacifist.

Since this time, there will at least be no mobilization plan by any nation, which does not allow purely military armament to be accompanied by a corresponding economic preparation for war. Therefore the creation of a General Plenipotentiary for War Economy, even if he had never become effective, which, as the evidence demonstrated most convincingly, he never did become, but remained a dummy—was never a proof of the intention to wage a war of aggression, this post being necessary for any armament for defense. This office is also necessary for all defensive armament. This same applies to the institution of the Reich Defense Council, the Reich Defense Committee, etc. As such they are the same harmless self-explanatory factors. Only their misuse for the purpose of a war of aggression would be incriminating. For this, however, the dolus of Schacht has not been established. I therefore refrain from evaluating the details in this field.

DEFENSE

Finally and at last the Prosecution sees something incriminating in the so-called maintenance of secrecy regarding certain mobilization measures and mobilization arrangements, as for example the maintenance of secrecy concerning the second Reich Defense Law. In this case also a natural worldly way of thinking relieves these findings of any incriminating character. All nations are accustomed to carry out mobilization and armament measures in "secret." In thinking this over more closely and from closer observation this practice can be recognized as quite superfluous routine matter. Only drafts and technical details can be really kept secret. The fact of rearmament as such can never be kept secret. The same applies to the existence of a large body which is to serve the purpose of this rearmament. Either this becomes known when it starts functioning, or, like the ominous Defense Council it remains hidden and secret only because it does not function.

In the memoirs of a Tsarist officer regarding his experiences in the Russo-Japanese war I found the humorous description: "If I, as a member of the General Staff, wished an incident to become known, I had it classified as "secret" and my wish was fulfilled. If I had the wish, so difficult to carry out, to keep something secret, I unobtrusively sent it unstated and at times my wish was fulfilled." One must not quibble in a vacuum, but, if one wishes to seek the truth, one must consider the basis of experience of the hard foundation of facts.

In this way the fact of the military activation of Germany after the seizure of power by Hitler and the subsequent rearmament was never a secret to the world. The main proceedings have brought much evidence to this effect. We know the report of Consul-General Messersmith, we know his sworn testimony of 3 August 1945, submitted by the Prosecution under 2385-PS, according to which the armament program—he speaks of a giant armament program immediately after the seizure of power—and the rapid development of the air program had been apparent to everybody. It had been impossible to move in the streets of Berlin or in any other city of importance in Germany without seeing pilots or aviators in training, and who expressly states on page 8 of this testimony, that this giant German rearmament-program was never a secret and was publicly announced in the spring of 1935. I recall amongst much other evidence the remark of Ambassador Dodd, where he wished to point out to Schacht, that the German Government had bought high-grade war planes from American airplane-manufacturers alone for one million dollars and that they had been paid for in gold. If Ambassador Dodd has perhaps made a mistake in this detail, yet all this still proves that German rearmament the extent of which was surely overestimated even at that time, must have been at the very best an open secret. Therefore it is not even necessary to refer to mutual visits of the general chief of staffs, to which von Milch and Bodenschatz testified the visits of the British Intelligence Service Courtney, the permanent presence of military attaches of nearly all the countries in Berlin, to recognize that the so-called secret rearmament was a public one which only safeguarded a few technical secrets like every rearmament in every State. The outside world knew the existence of this rearmament, and held it as endurable in any case for the preservation of world peace longer than Schacht did.

It is not my privilege and I have not the remotest intention to criticize the attitude of the outside world. Each part played in life has its own laws of tact, even the part played by the defendant and his defense counsel. Their task is the defense and not the blame and the attack connected with it. I want to take precautions explicitly against a misunderstanding that I intend to appear as an accuser or critic in any way. I only present all this from the viewpoint that the indirect evidence submitted by the prosecution is not valid.

The prosecution argues furthermore with the fact that Schacht was a member of the Reich Cabinet, and this from the time of his dismissal in January 1938 as Minister of Economy, at least as Minister without portfolio until January 1943. The prosecution makes the Reich Cabinet responsible for the belligerent invasions of Hitler, namely as criminally responsible. This argumentation has an attractively convincing power on somebody who reckons with the normal concept of a Reich Cabinet. This effect disappears once it has been ascertained that the so-called Reich Cabinet was not such in the usual sense of a constitutional State. Penal judicial establishments must not, however, be based on outward appearance and form, on a fiction, but only on actually established conditions. This makes it necessary to penetrate sociologically the nature of the Hitler Regime, and to examine if a member of the Reich Cabinet, hence of the Reich Government, as such in this his capacity has to bear the same criminal responsibility as if he was in another normal State structure, be it now a democratic republic or a democratic monarchy or a constitutional monarchy or an absolutistic, but nevertheless rightfully in the State established monarchy or some other state legal structure which bears the character of a somehow lawful legislative State. We can therefore not omit to fathom the actual sociological structure of the Hitler regime. We have heard excellent and profound explanations in this connection from the mouth of Professor Jahrreiss. Here, too, I want to avoid repetitions and only to quote the following in abbreviated form:

DEFENSE

I want to say first of all, in order to avoid again the danger of a misunderstanding, that, if I speak here about the Hitler Regime, I am doing this without any connection with the persons sitting in the defendants' docks, naturally with the exception of Schacht. For the latter, I am doing this in the negative sense, that he did not belong to the Regime as such, in spite of the fact that he was a member of the Reich Government and president of the Reichsbank. I leave the question completely open as to whether either of the other defendants should be considered a member or supporter of the regime. That question is subject only to the judgment of the Tribunal and its valuation by the respective competent defense counsel.

Already at the beginning of my argument I indicated that even for someone who lived in Germany during the Hitler Regime it is difficult between the seeming and the apparent distribution of power and the actual influences of this power; but that this is bound to surpass the ability to judge of people who lived outside of Germany, and only be made possible through findings obtained the presentation of evidence before this Tribunal. We have established here that the Reich Cabinet which Hitler termed a club of defeatists was convened for the last time in 1938—and that only for the purpose of receiving a communication from Hitler; and that it met for the last time for deliberation and to make decisions in 1937 and that Hitler intentionally withheld all matters of political importance from the Reich Cabinet, as is also brought out by the so-called Hossbach Minutes of 10 November 1937. During this meeting the Fuehrer called the attention of those present (Schacht, of course, was not present and did not learn about the Hossbach Minutes until he came here) that the subject matter of the meeting was of such great importance that it would result in full Cabinet meetings in other countries, but that just because of its great significance he had decided not to discuss the matter within the circle of the Reich Cabinet.

After that, and certainly after at least 1937, the members of the Reich Cabinet can no longer be considered the architects and supporters of the political aspirations of the Reich. The same holds true for the members of the Reich Defense Commission, which in itself was nothing but a bureaucratic routine affair. Because of this Hitler also in the spring of 1939, explicitly excluded the Reich Defense Commission from further war preparations in the following words: "Preparation takes place on the basis of peace legislation."

Despotism and tyranny had reached their purest form in 1938. It is a characteristic specific of the Fascist as well as the National-Socialist regime to concentrate formation of the political will in the head of the Party, who, with the help of this Party, subjugates and masters this Party and State. Justice Jackson too recognizes this when he stated on 28 February 1946 that the apex of power existed outside of the State and in a power group outside the Constitution. To speak in the case of such a regime of a responsible Reich Government and of free State citizens, who through various organizations could exert influence on the formation of political will, would mean proceeding from entirely wrong hypotheses. Only inconceivable greatness always gains irresponsible influence on the head of State and Party in such regimes. The formation of the political will can be recognized in its crystallized form only in the head of the State himself; near to him and behind him it becomes opaque. It is another characteristic of such a regime—and again this belongs to the chapter of its inner untruthfulness—that behind the facade of seemingly absolute harmony and union, several power groups fight each other. Hitler not only condoned such contrasts, he even encouraged them and in part used them as a basis for his power.

If any of the defendants spoke here of the unity of the German people during the war in contrast with the First World War, I, on the contrary wish to stress that hardly at any time during its history was the German nation so torn internally as it was during the Third Reich. The apparent unity was merely the stillness of a churchyard enforced through terror. The conflicts between the individual high functionaries which we have here reflect the inner strife-torn condition of the German nation, hidden artificially only through the terror wielded by the Gestapo.

To give only a few examples, we were confronted here with the conflicts between Himmler and Frank, between Himmler and Keitel, between Sauckel and Seldte, between Schellenberg and Canaris, between Bormann and Lammers, between SA and SS, between Wehrmacht and SS, between SD and Justice, between Ribbentrop and Neurath, and so forth. The list could be continued as desired. Even ideologically the Party in itself was divided into strongly pronounced contrasts which became clear already at the very beginning of the presentation of evidence from Goering's testimony. These contrasts were fundamental, and they were not bridged by Hitler but rather deepened. They were the keyboard of his source of power on which he performed. The Ministers were not responsible governing persons such as any other State where law is the foundation; they were nothing but employees with specialized training who had to obey orders. If a specialist such as Schacht did not wish to submit to this, it resulted in conflict and resignation from his department, as happened in his case.

DEFENSE

Ministers could not in the long run take full responsibility for their department because they were not exclusively competent for it. A Minister, in accordance with Constitutional Law must, first of all also have access to the Chief of State, and he must have the right to report at any time. He must be in a position to reject interference and influences by a third irresponsible Party.

None of these characteristics typical for a Minister apply to the so-called Ministers of Adolph Hitler. Schacht was surprised by the Four-Year-Plan. Similarly, the Minister of Justice was surprised by such extremely important laws as the Nurnberg Decree. The Minister was not in a position to appoint his staff independently. The appointment of every civil service employee needed the consent of the Party Chancellery. Meddling and influence by all possible agencies and persons of the various Chancelleries—Chancellery of the Fuehrer, Party Chancellery, etc.—asserted themselves. They, however, were Agencies placed above the Ministries and they could not be controlled. Special deputies governed through the departments. Ministers—yes, even the Chief of the Reich Chancellery as we heard from Lammers—had to wait for months for an audience, while for Messrs. Bormann and Himmler it was a coming and going to and from Hitler all the time.

The Anticamera and Camarilla, an indispensable accessory of all absolutism when it comes to the personal responsibility of the individual, as well as regards the circles of which they are composed, have at all times been difficult to comprehend. They are not the irresponsible influences exerted over Hitler and affecting him.

Jodl described to us here, how Hitler's spontaneous actions having the most serious consequences, could be traced back to influences of that type, through entirely obscure third persons, due to mere accidents, conversations at a tea party, etc. For the objective facts this bears out what I already mentioned in the beginning. The very fact of the existence of such conditions eliminates even the possibility of the planning of a crime, such as a war of aggression, within a clearly defined circle of persons or, for that matter, within the so-called Reich government. But where there is no planning possible, there is also no plot possible, no conspiracy, of which the most striking characteristic is the common planning though with various roles. Let us assume the most widely conceived interpretation of the public fact of the conspiracy. I am following Justice Jackson. He who takes part in a counterfeiters' plot is guilty of conspiracy, even though he may have written only a letter or acted as bearer of the letter. He who participates in a plot for robbing a bank is guilty of murder if, in the wake of the planning, a third party in the group of planners committed murder. At all times, however, the prerequisite is a body of persons capable of executing a common plan. Such a thing was not possible for Adolf Hitler's Ministers; it was not possible at all under Hitler. From this it follows that no plotters could participate in the crime of having forced upon his own people and the world a war of aggression except those who served Hitler as assistants.

The power situation of the Third Reich as depicted thus permits in thesis only the assumption that there was punishable accomplicity or punishable assistance but on the other hand no punishable group offense such as conspiracy. Whether such accomplicity or such punishable aid in the crime of a war of aggression undoubtedly committed by Hitler exists for the individual defendants personally can only be investigated and decided in every case individually. To investigate this is my task only for the person of Schacht.

A collective crime such as conspiracy ("conspiracy"), on the basis of the actual conditions already established is however excluded as inconceivable and unrealizable. But even if this were not the case, the subjective aspect of the deed is completely lacking in the case of Schacht. Even when the objective facts of a conspiracy exists within a circle in the prisoners' dock, and even with the most liberal interpretation of the concept of conspiracy, the conspirator must accept a plan of conspiracy and the aim for conspiracy in his volition, at least in the form of the dolus eventualis. The severity of the existence of a conspiracy derives most significance from comparison with a pirate ship. In the abstract every crew member of the pirate ship, even in a subordinate position, is an outlaw. But someone who did not even know that he was on a pirate ship, but believed himself to be on a peaceful merchant vessel, is not guilty of piracy. He is also innocent if after realizing the pirate character of the ship, he has done everything to prevent the execution of piracy as well as to leave the pirate ship.

DEFENSE

Schacht did both. As far as the latter is concerned, scientific theory on conspiracy also recognizes that he is not guilty who has withdrawn from the conspiracy by a positive act before attainment of the goal of the conspiracy, even in case he cooperated previously in the preparation of the plan for conspiracy as was not done by Schacht.

In this connection, I also consider in my favor Mr. Justice Jackson's answer when I put up for discussion within the compass Schacht's interrogation whether the persecution of the Jews is also charged to Schacht. Mr. Justice Jackson affirmed this in case Schacht had helped prepare the war of aggression before he withdrew from this plan for aggression and its group of conspirators and went over unreservedly to the opposition group, that is to the conspiracy against Hitler. This desertion would then be the positive act mentioned by me above whereby a person at first participating in a conspiracy could separate himself from it. But in the person of Schacht it is not a question at all of this legal problem because the evidence has shown that he never desired to participate in the preparation for a war of aggression. As already explained, this accusation of the subjective fact of the conspiracy has been proved neither by direct nor by indirect evidence. For the events until the year 1938, I can point to the statements made previously. From 1938 on at the latest, it has been proved that from this time on Schacht waged the most conceivably severe battle against any possibility of war in such a form that he attempted to overthrow the carrier of this danger of war, the carrier of the will for aggression and thereby the regime.

It is here completely irrelevant and is beside the point whether or not these putsch attempts which continued during the war at shorter or longer intervals were suitable to achieve for Germany a better conclusion of the peace.

This is absolutely meaningless for the evaluation as a crime of Schacht's course of action. It is beyond doubt that, according to human reckoning to a successful putsch before the outbreak of war would have prevented the outbreak of war, and that a successful putsch after the outbreak of war would at least have shortened the duration of the war. Therefore, such sceptical considerations about the political value of these putsch attempts do not render any proof against the seriousness of putsch plans and intentions. These are all that counts. For they prove first of all that one who has been pursuing them since 1938 and (if one thinks of the attempt with Kluge), even since 1937, could impossibly have had warlike intentions. One does not try to overthrow a regime, because it involves danger of war, if one has oneself worked for the war previously. One does this only if by all one's actions, even that of financing armament, one wishes to foster peace. For this reason, these proven repeated putsch attempts on the part of Schacht do not perhaps have the legal significance of a so-called active repentance for a previously shown criminal behavior, but they are ex post proof that he cannot be accused even before 1938 of consciously working for war, because the latter is logically and psychologically incompatible with Schacht's activity of conspiracy against Hitler. These putsches thus prove the credibility of Schacht in respect to his representation of the reasons and intentions which caused him to enter actively into the Hitler government and to finance an armament to the extent of the financial aid he granted, namely to the amount of 12 billions. They prove ex post the purely defensive character of this financing of armament, they prove the credibility of Schacht's contention of producing besides this defensive effect tactically a limitation of armament. But if one believes this description of Schacht, then one cannot speak of Schacht's cooperation in instigating a war of aggression, at least in its subjective aspect.

This credibility is also proved by another circumstance. Schacht has contradicted the testimony of Gisevius and my questioning along the same line that he had admired Hitler at the beginning and had unreservedly considered him an ingenious statesman. He described this in his interrogation as an erroneous assumption, he said that he had recognized from the beginning many a weakness of Hitler, especially his sketchy education, and only hoped to be in a position to control the disadvantages and dangers resulting from them. By this, purely objectively speaking, Schacht hereby made his defense more difficult. He is wise enough to have recognized this. Thus what he consciously lost hereby for his defense in the technique of evidence and surrendered, he is gaining in respect to his credibility upon objective recognition of evidence based on psychological experience. For he deserves increased credibility who serves the truth by contradiction even when the suggested untruth or the half truth is more advantageous to him technically and tactically by way of evidence.

There should not exist any doubt about the participation of Schacht as a leader in the activities of the various conspiracies about which Gisevius testified precisely on the basis of the credible testimony of Gisevius. But if Mr. Justice Jackson presented in the cross examination to Schacht photographs and films which superficially document a close connection with Hitler and his paladins, then this could only have happened in order to put doubt on the seriousness of his active opposition to Hitler. I therefore must deal briefly with this photographic argument anyhow. Mr. Justice Jackson has related this accusation with another one in quoting speeches which show superficially even during the putsch period a great devotion toward Adolf Hitler. This accusation is on the same level. I believe that this argument can stand up neither before the experience of life nor before the observation of history. History teaches us that conspirators in particular, especially if they belong to the closer circle of dignitaries of the threatened head of state, show for purposes of camouflage a special devotion. Nor has it ever been observed that such people show their intentions to the threatened victim in a contradictory loyalty. One could here accumulate examples from history.

DEFENSE

There is a really effective German drama by a certain Neumann which concerns itself with the murder of Czar Paul by his first minister Count Palen. The Czar trusts to the very end the devotion of Count Palen which is shown ostentatiously even at the time when the latter is already sharpening the murder knife. And in the historical documents left behind, there is an instruction by Count Palen to the Russian Ambassador in Berlin, very shortly before the attempt, in which Count Palen cannot do enough to speak about "Notre auguste Empereur." Significantly, this drama bears the title "The Patriot."

Thus there is a higher patriotism than purely formal loyalty of the servant of the nation. It approaches the psychological truth much more if one would utilize a presumptive devotion assumed for the sake of appearances and assurances of loyalty during this period, more in favor of the objective credibility of the description of Schacht than vice versa. As a conspirator, he had to camouflage himself especially well; to a certain degree, this had to be done by practically everyone who lived under this regime in Germany. As far as these photographs are now concerned, then these are easily a compulsory consequence of every social and thereby also socially representative membership in a body (Gremium) so that for better or for worse one becomes a victim of the camera with the members of it. When I am once a member of a government, then I cannot avoid being photographed with these people on the occasion of their meetings. Thus such pictures result as Schacht between Ley and Streicher. Viewing such pictures ex post, these pictures are not a joy to the observer; certainly not to Schacht either. But they do not prove anything. In a natural evaluation of a normal, average experience of life I consider these pictures without any value as evidence either pro or contra.

The foreign countries, too, had through their prominent representatives social intercourse with Adolf Hitler's governments, and this not only through their diplomatic corps. I wish to assure you that the defense is in a position to produce much more grotesque pictures, which do not look as natural as Schacht being photographed together with men who were his high standing colleagues in the Third Reich. To produce such pictures might not be a very tactful move of the defense. But a defense counsel must also take upon himself the odium of indiscretion, should it be necessary in order to investigate the truth in all seriousness. I do not believe that I have to do it in this case, because the irrelevance and insignificance of such presentation of evidence through pictures of representative events seems to be obvious.

The only incriminating point pressed by the prosecution which is left for me to argue now appears to be Schacht, after his retirement as Minister of Economy and still more after his retirement as President of the Reichsbank in January 1939, remained Minister without portfolio until 1943. Schacht declared that this had been stipulated by Hitler as a condition for his release from the Ministry of Economy. Hitler's signature, as head of the State, was necessary for his dismissal. Had Schacht refused to remain as Minister without portfolio, he would surely have been arrested sooner or later as politically suspect, and thus been deprived of all means of action against Hitler.

The witness Gisevius has testified as to the deliberations at that time between him and Schacht concerning the continuation of Schacht as Minister without portfolio. In these deliberations it was justly of importance, that Schacht could be of more use to the group of conspirators as a scout or a patrol, if he remained in this position, to outward appearances at least, within the Reich Government. Even as Minister without portfolio, Schacht remained exposed to great danger, as demonstrated by his and Gisevius' declarations, and as becomes obvious from Ohlendorf's statement that Schacht was already in 1937 on the black list of the State Police.

How much Hitler feared Schacht is proved by his later remarks to Speer which have been discussed here, particularly his remarks about Schacht after the attempted assassination on 20 July. I would also remind once more of the memorandum of Hitler of 1936, which he gave to Speer in 1944 and which says that he saw in Schacht a saboteur of his rearmament plans. It has been declared and proved by Lammers, that Schacht tried later on to get rid even of this nominal position. Lammers and Schacht have proved furthermore that this position was without any substantial importance. Therefore my nicknaming it "Fancy Dress Major" (Charaktermajor), that means a major without a battalion and command authority, a sham-major. Schacht could not get rid of the position without scandal, the same as with the position of Reichsbank President. Schacht therefore had to maneuver in such a way that he would be thrown out. He succeeded in this, as I explained, as Reichsbank President, through the well-known memorandum of the Board of Directors of the Reichsbank and the refusal of credits by the Reichsbank in November 1938, contained therein. As far as his position of Minister without portfolio was concerned, he succeeded through his defeatist letter of November 1942. In the meantime he made use of the time for the attempted "coup d'etat" in autumn 1938 and for the various other attempted "coups d'etat" until 20 July 1944, the last one landing him in a concentration camp.

DEFENSE

A criminal reproach can on no account be made him in his position as Minister without portfolio. For his proved conspiratorial activity against Hitler during all this time, eliminates offhand and logically the supposition that he had furthered Hitler's war plans and war strategy during this time. There remains only space, and this also only in the vacuum of abstraction, for a political reproach against the Schacht of the years 1933-1937. But this, too, is compensated by the extraordinarily courageous attitude of Schacht after this period. In order to obtain the just appreciation for fact, may I remind you of the interesting statement of Gisevius, that he, who had looked with a certain scepticism upon Schacht's original attitude, not in a criminal but political sense, had then been completely reconciled with Schacht by the extraordinary courage which Schacht displayed as opponent and conspirator against Hitler since 1938. I mean therefore that the fact of Schacht remaining as Minister without portfolio does not incriminate him directly or indirectly not according to penal law anyhow, right from the start, but also not morally, if one takes into consideration his behavior as a whole, his motives and the accompanying circumstances and conditions.

If the Prosecution now finally argues, on the basis of the text of the aforementioned memorandum of the Board of Directors of the Reichsbank, an opposition to war is not evident from the Memorandum, but only technical currency reflections, then I have only to refer in this respect to my previous statements and the testimony of von Vocke. And the presentation of facts by Schacht himself would not even be necessary to refute this argumentation. Vocke declared quite unequivocally in his capacity as closest collaborator that Schacht wished to limit and sabotage rearmament from the moment when he recognized its dimensions as a danger of war. The sworn affidavits of Huelse and the sworn affidavits of all the collaborators of Schacht in the Reich Ministry of Economy combine with this testimony of Vocke in that sense. I need not quote them individually. They are known to the Tribunal. The Tribunal does not need the commentary of a defense counsel. They speak for themselves. If the Prosecution now finally argues concerning the text of the Memorandum, which, it is true, actually only deals with financial problems, then I cannot omit the remark, that such an argumentation moves again in a vacuum, and does not take the experiences of history and the general experiences of life into consideration. Naturally—I have said it already—the Board of Directors of the Reichsbank could only operate with arguments which came under their department, particularly so if one had to deal with a Hitler. One beats the bag but one really means the donkey.

If the directorate of the Reichsbank and with it its President Schacht had not made public its true purpose in this Memorandum, namely to avert the danger of war and to combat Hitler's will of aggression, then it would have removed the effect of a specialist departmental influence from itself. Hitler very well understood the purpose of this Memorandum, when he shouted after reading it: "That is mutiny." With this Adolf Hitler recognized what can be said alone of Schacht as conspirator. He was never a mutineer and conspirator against world peace, but, so far as he was a conspirator and mutineer, he was this only against Adolf Hitler and his government.

As such, he was the subject of ironic belittling by General Jodl and my colleague Nelte in the epithets "Frockcoat and drawing-room revolutionary." Now history teaches that the quality of the tailor does not play any role in the case of the revolutionary. And as far as the drawing room is concerned, then the shacks have no revolutionary preference over the palaces. I only call to mind the political drawing-rooms of the great French Revolution or for instance (one of the many) the elegant officers' club of the feudal Preobraschenck regiment under many a Czar. Even if the Gentlemen are of the opinion that Schacht and his accomplices themselves should have done the shooting, then I can only say: Well, if it had only been that easy. Schacht would have loved to do the shooting himself; he exclaimed here spontaneously. But it would not go without power which would have pushed on during the confusion coming for certain afterward and which could bring the attempt to a revolutionary success.

Therefore generals with troops were necessary. I do not wish to repay General Jodl with the same coin and therefore do not say "a necessary evil."

DEFENSE

The further reproach of the foundation lacking in the working class is contradicted by the social composition of the revolutionaries of 20 July. As I stated before, all this is irrelevant for the decision of this Tribunal. But my client has a moral right that his defense counsel does not completely ignore this polemic which took place in the spotlight of the world public.

In summing up it must therefore be said:

After the July elections in 1932 it was certain that Hitler would and was bound to seize power. Previously to this Schacht had expressively warned the foreign countries of this development, and therefore not contributed to it. After the seizure of power only two roads were open to him, as to every German: he either had to estrange himself or he had to enter the movement actively. The decision at these crossroads was a purely political one without any criminal aspect. Just as we respect the reasons which caused the foreign countries to collaborate with Hitler much more intensively and pro-Germanically than with the previous democratic governments of Germany, so we must recognize the good faith of all those Germans who believed themselves to be able to serve the country and humanity better because of the greater possibilities of exerting their influence within the movement, therefore, either within the Party or within the apparatus of officialdom, than by grumbly standing aside. To serve Hitler as minister and President of the Reichsbank was a political decision, about whose political correctness one can now ex post facto argue, which however, lacked any criminal character. Schacht has always remained loyal to the motivating reason for his decision, namely to combat any radicalism from an influential position. Nowhere in the world did a warning signal appear for him. He only saw that the world trusted Hitler much longer than he himself, and permitted Adolf Hitler honors and foreign-political successes, which hampered Schacht's work, when it had already for a long time been directed at removing Adolf Hitler and his government. He led this struggle against Adolf Hitler and his government with a courage and a consequence, which must make it appear as a pure miracle that it was only after 20 July 1944 that the fate of the concentration camp and the danger of losing his head either through the People's Tribunal or through an act of the SS reached him. He is sufficiently clever and self-critical to refrain from escaping the realization that, from the purely political consideration, the picture of his character will waiver in history, or at least in the nearest future, confused by the favor and hatred of the parties. He humbly resigns himself to the judgment of history, even then, if one historian or another will label his political line as incorrect. With the pride of a good conscience he resigns himself to the judgment of this High Tribunal. He stands before his judges with clean hands. He also stands before this Tribunal with the confidence, as he has already expressed in a letter which he addressed to this Tribunal before the beginning of the proceedings, and in which he expresses that he would regard with gratitude the exposing before this Tribunal and before the whole world publicity, of his actions and activity and its motivating reasons. He stands before this Tribunal with confidence because he knows that the favor and hatred of the parties will not have any effect in this Tribunal. In all self-recognition of the relativity of all political actions in such difficult times, he is still self-cognizant and full of confidence with regard to the criminal charges which have been raised against him, and this with justification. Because, no matter who would have to be found guilty of being criminally responsible for this war and the atrocities and inhumane acts committed in it, Schacht, according to the evidence which has been kept here with minute exactness, can shout the words to every culprit, which Wilhelm Tell shouts to the Kaiser—assassin Parricida! “I raise my clean hands to Heaven, and curse you and your deed.” I therefore request the findings to establish to the effect, that Schacht is not guilty of the accusation which has been raised against him and that he therefore is to be acquitted.

2. FINAL PLEA by Hjalmar Schacht

My feeling of justice was deeply wounded because of the fact that the final speeches of the prosecution completely bypassed the evidence resulting from this trial. The only accusation raised against me under the Charter is the allegation that I wanted war. The overwhelming amount of proof in my case has shown, however, that I was a fanatical opponent of war, and actively and passively, through protests, sabotage, cunning, and force, have tried to prevent this war.

How, then, can the Prosecution assert that I was in favor of war? How, then, can the Russian Prosecutor assert that I turned from Hitler only in 1943, after my first attempt at a coup d'etat had already been undertaken in the fall of 1938?

And, now, Justice Jackson, in his final speech, raised a new accusation against me which has not been mentioned in the trial at all up to the present moment. I was to have planned a release of Jews from Germany against a ransom in foreign currency. That, too, is untrue, disgusted with the Jewish pogrom of November 1938, I managed to obtain Hitler's approval to a plan which was to facilitate emigration of the Jews. I intended to transfer 1,500 million Reichsmarks from confiscated Jewish property, to the administration of an international committee, and Germany was to undertake the obligation to repay this amount to the committee in twenty yearly installments, and that in foreign currency; which is the exact opposite of what Justice Jackson asserted here.

DEFENSE

In December 1938 in London, I discussed this plan with Lord Berstedt, of Samuel and Samuel, with Lord Winterton, and with the American representative, Mr. Rublee. They were all sympathetically disposed toward this plan. Having been removed from the Reichsbank shortly thereafter, however, this matter was dropped. Had it been carried through, no single German Jew would have lost his life.

My opposition to Hitler's policies was known at home and abroad, and that so clearly that even in the year 1940 the Attaché of the United States, Mr. Kirk, before leaving his Berlin post, sent me his regards, adding that after the war I would be considered as an unburdened man, a matter which is reported on in detail by witness Huelse in his affidavit, which is 37-B of my document book.

Instead of that, however, the Prosecution for a whole year has branded me in the world press as a robber, murderer, and betrayer. And it is this accusation that I have to thank for standing alone at the eve of my life without means of subsistence and without a home. But the Prosecution is mistaken if they believe, as was mentioned in one of their first speeches, that they can count me amongst the pitiful and broken personalities.

Certainly I erred politically, but my economical and financial policy of creation of work by the assistance of credit has wonderfully proven itself, although I have never claimed to be a politician. The figure of unemployment dropped from 7,000,000 to zero. In the year 1938 the income of the State had risen to such an extent that the repayment of the Reichsbank credits was fully safeguarded. The fact that Hitler refused this repayment, so ceremoniously documented by him, was a tremendous betrayal which I could not foresee. My political mistake was not realizing the extent of Hitler's criminal nature at an early enough time. But not with one single illegal or immoral act did I stain my hands. The terror of the Gestapo did not frighten me; for every terror must fail when conscience is at stake. Here lies this great source of power which religion gives us.

In spite of that, Justice Jackson considered it proper to accuse me of opportunism and cowardice. And this, after the end of the war, found me in the Extermination Camp at Flossenbürg, where I had been imprisoned for ten months, and where only by merciful fate I escaped Hitler's order of murder. At the exit of this trial I stand with my soul deeply shaken about unspeakable suffering which I tried to prevent with all my personal effort and with all attainable means, a suffering which I could not prevent. But that is not through my guilt.

Therefore, my head is upright and I am unshaken in the belief that the world will recover, not through the force of power, but only through the force of mind and the morality of actions.

XIV. KARL DOENITZ

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Otto Kranzbuehler, Defense Counsel

Mr. President, Gentlemen of the Bench:

"War is a cruel thing and it brings in its train a multitude of injustices and misdeeds."

With those words of Plutarch's, Hugo Grotius begins his examination of the responsibility for war crimes and they are as true today as they were 2,000 years ago. At all times acts were committed by belligerents, which were war crimes or were considered as such by the other side. But the conclusions drawn from this fact were always to the prejudice of the vanquished parties and never to that of the victors. The law which was applied here was necessarily the right of the stronger.

While in land wars more or less steadfast rules were drawn up regulating warfare, in maritime wars the conceptions of the parties engaged have always clashed on the point of international law. Nobody knows better than British statesmen how much these conceptions are dictated by national or economic interests.

I refer in this respect to noted witnesses such as Lord Fisher and Lord Edward Grey*. Therefore, if ever in history a naval power would have had the idea to prosecute a defeated enemy admiral, namely on grounds of his own conception of the rules of naval warfare, the sentence would have been pronounced simultaneously with the indictment.

* Lord Edward Grey. "25 Years of Politics, 1892-1916". Translation by Brueckmann, Munich 1926. "international law has always been elastic. * * * A belligerent with an overpowering navy has always advocated an interpretation of international law, justifying the maximum seizure of goods which may presumably reach the enemy. That viewpoint was naturally taken by Great Britain and the Allies due to their superiority at sea. The British attitude in this respect has not always been the same. When we were among neutrals, we naturally contested the right the belligerents claimed for themselves to make vast seizures."

DEFENSE

At this trial two admirals are under indictment for a naval war which has been called criminal. Thus the Tribunal is confronted with a decision regarding conceptions of law which are necessarily as divergent as the interests of a naval power from the interests of a land power. Not only the fate of both admirals is connected with this decision. It is also a question of an honorable name for hundreds of thousands of German seamen who believed in serving a good cause and do not deserve to be branded by history as pirates and murderers. It is to those men, the living as well as the dead, that I feel bound by duty when I undertake to reject the accusation against German naval warfare.

Which are these accusations? They are divided into 2 large groups—unlawful sinking of ships and premeditated killing of shipwrecked personnel.

I shall deal first with the accusation of the illegal sinking of ships.

Two reports by Mr. Roger Allen of the British Foreign Office made in the fall of 1940 and spring of 1941 form the nucleus of that accusation. I do not know to whom and for what purpose these reports were made. According to their form and contents they seem to be serving propaganda purposes, and for this very reason I believe their value as evidence to be low. Even the Prosecution submitted only part of the accusations made therein. The reports trace only one-fifth of the total of supposedly unlawful attacks to submarines whereas four-fifths are ascribed to mines, airplanes, or surface craft. The Prosecution omits these four-fifths and this reserved attitude may be explained from the fact that the use of these combat means on the British side differs in no way from that on the German side.

With regard to the commitment of submarines, there seems to exist a difference between the principles followed by the German Naval Operations and those of our enemies. At any rate, the public in enemy countries and many neutral countries believed so during the war and partly still believes it today. Propaganda dominated the field. At the same time, the mass of all critics neither knew exactly which principles were valid for German U-boat warfare, nor on which factual and legal foundations they were based. It shall be my task to attempt to clarify this.

The reports by Mr. Roger Allen culminate in the assertion that the German U-boats from the summer of 1940 on torpedoed everything coming before their periscopes. Undoubtedly the methods of submarine warfare stiffened gradually under the pressure of the measures directed against Germany. This war, however, never did degenerate into a wild shooting melee governed by the law of expediency alone. Much of what might have been useful for a U-boat was left undone until the last day of the war because it had to be regarded as legally inadmissible, and all measures which the German Naval High Command is being accused of today by the Prosecution were the result of a development in which both sides partook through measures and counter measures as in all military developments.

The London Protocol of 1936 formed the legal basis for the German submarine warfare at the beginning of this war. These regulations were literally incorporated into article 74 of the German Prize Ordinance, which even Mr. Roger Allen calls a reasonable and not inhumane instrument. As a draft this prize ordinance was sent in 1938 to the two U-boat flotillas and to the U-boat training school and served as foundation for the training of the commanders. Stopping and examining of merchant vessels was performed as a tactical task. In order to facilitate for the commander in economic warfare the quick and correct evaluation of his legal position towards a ship and the cargo of the enemy and the neutral, the prize disc was constructed which through simple manipulations indicates the articles of the prize ordinance to be applied. In so far as preparations had been made at all for economic warfare through submarines, they were based exclusively on the German prize ordinance and thus on the London Protocol.

The German High Command actually adhered to this legal foundation at the time the war broke out. The combat instructions for U-boats of 3 September 1939 ordered clearly and distinctly that submarine warfare be carried on in accordance with the prize ordinance. Accordingly sinkings were permissible only after stopping and examination unless the ship attempted to escape or offered resistance. Some examples were submitted to the Tribunal from the abundance of possible instances showing the chivalrous spirit with which the German submarine commanders complied with the issued instructions. Especially the care given to the crews of ships sunk lawfully after stopping and examination was carried out in part to an extent which could scarcely be justified on military grounds. Life boats were towed over long distances and, thereby, the few available U-boats were diverted from their combat mission. Enemy ships which could have been sunk lawfully were permitted to go free in order to send the crews of ships previously sunk to port aboard them. It is, therefore, only correct if Mr. Roger Allen stated that the German U-boats during the first weeks of the war adhered strictly to the London regulations.

Why was this procedure not kept up? Because the conduct of the enemy made such a procedure militarily impossible and created at the same time the legal prerequisites for its modification.

DEFENSE

I shall consider the military side first. From the very day the war started, U-boat reports reached the commander of the U-boat fleet at the Naval High Command stating that hardly an enemy ship submitted voluntarily to stopping and examination. The merchant vessels were not content with their attempt to escape, be it through fleeing or be it by changing their course, to bear directly upon the U-boat thus forcing it to dive. On the contrary every sighted U-boat was reported at once by radio; and, subsequently, in the shortest space of time, it was attacked by enemy airplanes or naval forces. The complete armament of the enemy merchant vessels, however, settled the matter. As early as 6 September 1939, a German U-boat was shelled by the British Steamship "Manaar" and that was the starting signal for the great struggle which took place between the U-boats on the one hand and the armed merchant vessel equipped with guns and depth charges on the other hand, as equal military opponents.

In order to show the effect of all these measures taken by the adversary, I have presented the Tribunal with some examples which I do not wish to repeat. They unequivocally show that a further action against enemy merchant ships according to the regulations governing Prize Ordinance was no longer possible from the military standpoint and meant suicide for the submarine. Nevertheless, the German High Command continued for long weeks to proceed according to the regulations governing Prize Ordinance. Only after it was established that every time there was any action on the part of enemy merchant ships, and especially of armed action, it was not a question of an individual case of a generally ordered measure, the order was given on 4 October 1939 to attack all armed enemy merchant ships without warning.

The Prosecution will perhaps take the standpoint that in lieu of this submarine warfare against armed merchant vessels should have been discontinued. In the last war the most terrible weapons of warfare were ruthlessly employed on both sides, both on land and in the air. In view of this experience, the thesis can hardly be upheld today that in naval warfare one of the parties waging war can be expected to give up using an effective weapon after the adversary has taken measures making the use of it impossible in its previous forms. In any case, such a renunciation could only be considered if the novel utilization of the weapon were undeniably illegal. But this is not the case for the utilization of German submarines against enemy merchant shipping because the measures taken by the enemy did not only change the military situation but also the legal one.

According to German legal opinion, however, a ship which is equipped and utilized for battle does not come under the provisions granting protection against sinking without warning, as provided by the London Pact for merchant ships. I wish to stress the fact that the merchant ship is not thereby denied the right to carry weapons and to fight. From this fact the conclusion was drawn, as reflected in the well-known formula, "He who uses weapons himself must expect weapons to be used against him."

During the cross-examination the Prosecution referred to this interpretation of the London Protocol as dishonest. It admits only the closest literal interpretation and considers the sinking of a merchant ship as admissible only if the latter has offered active resistance. It is not the first time that fundamental differences of opinion exist between contracting parties with respect to the interpretation of a treaty, and the extremely different interpretations of the meaning of the Potsdam Agreement of 2 August 1945 provide a very timely example. Diversity of conception, therefore, does not allow for the conclusion that the one or the other party has acted dishonestly during the signing or the subsequent interpretation of a treaty. I will endeavor to show how unjustified this reproach is in respect also to the German interpretation of the London Submarine Protocol.

There are two concepts which are at the basis of the German interpretation, namely that of "merchant vessel" and "offer of active resistance."

If I now consider some legal questions, it will not represent a comprehensive exposé. I can only touch the problems and due to lack of time I must also limit myself when mentioning scientific sources. I shall preferentially refer to American sources, because the interests of naval strategy of this nation were not fixed to the same extents as those of the European nations and therefore its science can probably claim greater objectivity.

The text of the London Protocol of 1936 is based, as is well known, on a declaration which was signed at the London Naval Conference of 1930. The committee of jurists appointed at that time, expressed its opinion concerning the greatly disputed definition of a merchant vessel in the report of 3 April 1930:

"The committee wishes to place on record that the expression 'merchant vessel' where it is employed in the declaration is not to be understood as including a merchant vessel which is at the moment participating in hostilities in such a manner as to cause her to lose her right to the immunities of a merchant vessel."

DEFENSE

This definition clarifies at least the one thing, that by no means every vessel flying a merchant flag may lay claim to being treated as a merchant vessel in the sense of the London agreement. Beyond this, the explanation has few positive aspects, because the question of by which kind of participation in hostilities a vessel loses her right to the immunity of a merchant vessel is again subjected to the interpretation of the individual contract parties. The London Conference, as far as I can see, did not consider this ticklish question any further and one probably does not go wrong by assuming that this astonishing reserve is based on experiences which the same powers had gathered in Washington 8 years ago.

The Washington conference of 1922 was still under the impression of the first world war and, therefore, it is no wonder that the naval power, Great Britain, which during the world war had suffered most from German submarine warfare, now tried to outlaw and abolish altogether by international law the submarine warfare against merchant shipping. The resolution named after the American main delegate, Root, which in its first part substantially corresponded to the London text of 1930, served that aim. But in the second part the Root Resolution goes farther and stipulates that any commander who, no matter whether he acted with or without higher order, violated the rules established for the sinking of merchant vessels should be punished as a war criminal like a pirate. Finally, it was recognized that under the conditions stipulated in the resolution submarine warfare against merchant shipping was impossible, and was therefore renounced altogether by the contracting powers. The Root Resolution designates these principles as an established part of international law. As such it was accepted by the delegates, but none of the 5 participating naval powers (U.S.A., England, France, Japan, and Italy) ratified it.

Apropos of the Root Resolution, however, another question was discussed, which is of the greatest importance for the interpretation of the London Protocol, namely, the definition of the word "vessel." Here the two fronts in the entire U-boat question became clearly evident. On the one side there stood England; on the other, France,¹ Italy, and Japan; while the U. S. took the position of a mediator. According to the protocol of the Washington conference the Italian delegate, Senator Schanzer, initiated the advance of the weaker naval powers by expressly emphasizing that a merchantman regularly armed may be attacked by a submarine without preliminaries. In a later session Schanzer repeated his statement that the Italian delegation applied the term of "merchantman" in the resolution only to unarmed merchant vessels. He explicitly declared this to be in accordance with the existing rules of international law.¹

¹ Yamato Ichihaslie, The Washington Conference and After, Stanford University Press, Cal. 1928, p.80, "The chief reason for the British plea was the apprehension of the craft in the hands of the French navy."

The French delegate, M. Sarraut, at that time received instruction from the Foreign Minister Briand to second the reservations of the Italian delegate.² He thereupon moved to have the Italian reservations included in the records of the session.

The Japanese delegate, Hanihara, supported this trend with the statement that he thought it was clear that merchant vessels engaged in giving military assistance to the enemy ceased in fact to be merchant vessels.³ It can therefore be seen that in 1922 three of the five powers represented expressed the opinion that armed merchant vessels should not be regarded as merchant vessels in the sense of the agreement.

Since the whole resolution threatened to collapse because of this difference of opinion, a way out was found which is typical for conferences of this kind. Root closed the debate with the statement that in his opinion the resolution held good for all merchant ships as long as the ship remained a merchant vessel.⁴ With this compromise, a formula was created which, to be sure, could represent a momentary political success, but which, however, would carry no weight in the case of war. For it was left to every participating power to decide whether or not it would grant the armed merchant vessels the protection of the resolution in case of war.

I have described these events of the year 1922 a little more in detail because the same powers took part in them as participated in the London Naval Conference of 1930. The London conference was the continuation of the Washington Conference, and what had been discussed and included in the records at the first one had its full importance for the second one. Science, too, and by no means only German but especially American and French science based its examinations on the close connection of both conferences, and it was precisely for that reason that they declared the result achieved in the question of submarines to be ambiguous and dissatisfactory. Here, I only want to point to Wil-

¹ Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, Washington, November 12, 1921 - February 6, 1922, pp.606, 688, 692.

² French Yellow Book, La Conference de Washington, p.93.

³ Protocol pp. 693, 702. "He thought it was also clear that merchant vessels engaged in giving military assistance to the enemy ceased in fact to be merchant vessels."

⁴ Protocol, p.704, "So long as the vessel remained a merchant vessel."

DEFENSE

son's summarizing report on the London Naval Treaty (American Journal of International Law, 1931, p. 307).

It is there in particular where, besides the ambiguity of the concept "merchant vessel," the uncertainty connected with the words "active resistance" is pointed out; and it is these very words with which an exception from the protection of the merchantman is connected, an exception which likewise is not contained in the actual text of the London agreement, but which, nevertheless, is generally recognized. I am referring to merchantmen in an enemy convoy. If the London agreement is interpreted literally, the opinion would have to be upheld that merchantmen in an enemy convoy must also not be attacked without warning, but that an attacking battleship would just have to put out of action the escort vessels first and then stop and search the merchantmen afterwards. However, this militarily impossible demand evidently is not made by the Prosecution either. It says in the report of the British Foreign Office which has been mentioned several times:

"Ships sailing in enemy convoys are usually deemed to be guilty of forcible resistance and therefore liable to be sunk forthwith."

Here even the Prosecution admits an interpretation of the words "active resistance", an interpretation which results in no way from the treaty itself but is simply a consequence of military necessity and is thus dictated by common sense.

And this very same common sense demands also that the armed merchant ship be held just as guilty of forcible resistance as the convoyed ship. Let us take an extreme instance in order to make the matter quite clear. An unarmed merchant ship of 20,000 tons and with a speed of 20 knots which is convoyed by a trawler with—let us say—2 guns and a speed of 15 knots may be sunk without warning, because it placed itself under the protection of the trawler and thereby made itself guilty of active resistance. If, however, this same merchant ship does not have the protection of the trawler and, instead, the 2 guns or even 4 or 6 of them are placed on its decks enabling it to use its full speed, should it not in this case be found just as guilty of offering active resistance as before? Such deductions really seem to me against all common sense. In the opinion of the Prosecution the submarine would first have to give the merchantship, which is far superior to it in fighting power, the order to stop and wait until the merchantship fires its first broadside at the submarine.

Only then would it have the right to use its own weapons. Since, however, a single artillery hit is nearly always fatal for a submarine, although it harms a merchant ship very little as a rule, the result would be the almost certain destruction of the submarine.

"When you see a rattlesnake rearing its head you do not wait until it jumps at you but you destroy it before it gets the chance." These are Roosevelt's words in which he justified his order to the U.S. naval forces to attack German submarines. The reason seemed sufficient to him to order the immediate use of arms even without the existence of a state of war. It is a solitary instance in war, however, to grant one of two armed opponents the right to fire the first shot and to make it the other's to wait for the first hit. Such an interpretation, however, is contradictory to any military reason. It is no wonder, therefore, if in view of such divergent opinions the experts on international law, even after the London Treaty and the signing of the London Protocol of 1936, consider the treatment of the armed merchant vessels in naval warfare to be an unsolved question. In this instance, too, I should like to point to only one scientific source which enjoys especially high authority. It is the draft of an agreement on the rights and duties of neutrals in naval warfare, an agreement which leading American professors of international law, such as Jessup, Herchard, and Charles Warren published in the "American Journal of International Law" of July 1939, simultaneously giving reasons, which furnish an excellent idea of the most recent state of opinion. Article 54 of this draft corresponds literally to the text of the London Agreement of 1936 with one noticeable exception: the term "Merchant Vessel" is replaced by "unarmed vessel." The next article then continues:

"In their action with regard to enemy armed merchant vessels, belligerent war ships, whether surface or submarine, and belligerent military aircraft are governed by the rules applicable to their action with regard to enemy warships."

This opinion is first based on the historical development. At the time when it was customary to arm merchant vessels, i. e., until the end of the last century, there was no question of any protection for the merchant vessel against immediate attack by an enemy warship. With the introduction of armor plating, the warship became so superior to the armed merchant vessel that any resistance on the part of the latter was rendered futile and the arming of merchant ships therefore gradually ceased. This defenselessness of the merchant vessel against the warship, and that alone gained for the former the privilege of not being immediately subject to armed attack on the part of the belligerents.

"As merchantmen lost effective fighting power they acquired a legal immunity from attack without warning."

DEFENSE

This immunity was never conceded to the merchant vessel as such but only to the defenseless and harmless merchant vessel. In respect of which the American expert on international law, Hyde,¹ stated in 1922, i. e., after the Washington conference and the afore-mentioned Root resolution on U-boat warfare:

"Maritime states have never acquiesced in a principle that a merchant vessel so armed to be capable of destroying a vessel of war of any kind should enjoy immunity from attack at sight, at least when encountering an enemy cruiser of inferior defensive strength."

Legal as well as practical considerations, therefore, led the above-mentioned American authorities, after the signing of the London Agreement and shortly before the outbreak of the war, to form the opinion that armed merchant ships are not protected from attacks without warning.

Here the old discrimination between defensive and offensive armaments is also rejected as inapplicable. It is well known that the American Secretary of State, Lansing, in his note to the Allies on 18 January 1916 already took the point of view that any kind of armament aboard a merchant vessel will make its fighting strength superior to that of a submarine and that such an armament is therefore of an offensive nature.²

In the latter course of the world war, the U.S.A. changed its opinion and declared that mounting guns on the stern could be taken as proof of the defensive character of the armaments. This standpoint was adopted in some international agreements and drafts as well as by British jurists in particular. It does not do justice to the practice of naval warfare.

First of all, the guns on many vessels were mounted from the very start in the bows, e. g., as a matter of principle on steam-propelled fishing boats. Furthermore, the antiaircraft weapons of the merchant vessel, which were especially dangerous for the submarine, were frequently placed on the bridge, and could therefore be used in all directions. Besides which there can be no discrimination between defensive and offensive armaments on the basis of the way the weapons are placed.

In this respect, orders alone are the decisive factor and the way in which these weapons are meant to be employed. Soon after the war had started the orders of the British Admiralty had already fallen into German hands. A decision of the Tribunal has made it possible for me to submit them. They are contained partly in the "Confidential Fleet Orders" and chiefly in the "Defense of Merchant Shipping Handbook." They were issued in 1938. They, therefore, do not deal with counter measures against illicit German actions but, on the contrary, they were already issued at a time when in Germany warfare in accordance with the London Agreement was the only form of submarine warfare taken into consideration.

¹ Hyde, International Law, 1922, Volume II, p.469.

² U.S. Foreign Relations 1916, Supplement, p.147.

The instructions further show that all British merchant vessels acted from the first day of the war according to orders received from the British Admiralty. These involved the following points in respect to submarine warfare:

- 1 The report of submarines by radio telegraphy.
- 2 The use of naval artillery.
- 3 The use of depth charges.

These instructions were supplemented on October 1, 1939 when a call was transmitted over the radio to ram all submarines.

It might seem unnecessary after this survey to make any mention at all of the defensive and offensive meaning of such orders. The orders on the use of artillery by merchant vessels, however, make a great differentiation; i. e., cannons are to be used only for the defense as long as the enemy on his part adheres to the regulations of international law, and for the offensive only when he does not. The orders covering the practical execution of these directives reveal, however, that there is no difference between defensive and offensive use. Admiral Doenitz explained this in detail when he was heard in court and I do not want to repeat it. Actually from the very beginning of the war merchant vessels were under orders to shoot on every occasion at every submarine which came within range of their guns. And that is what the captains of British merchant vessels did. The reason for this offensive action can certainly not be found in transgressions committed by German submarines during the first weeks of the war, for even the "Foreign Office" report admits that this conduct was correct. On the other hand, the British propaganda may have had great importance which, in connection with the mistaken sinking of the "Athenia" on September 3, 1939, disseminated through Reuter on the 9th of September the statement of unrestricted submarine warfare and upheld it, notwithstanding the fact that the conduct by the German submarines during the first weeks of the war proved to be the contrary of this accusation. Together with the announcement of the British Admiralty's ram-order of October 1, 1939, the Merchant Navy was again informed officially that the German U-boats had stopped to respect the rules of naval warfare, and merchant vessels should adjust their conduct accordingly. It seems to me of no importance that a written supplement to the Admiralty orders was issued as late as spring of 1940, because nowadays a naval war is not directed by letters but by wireless. But according to the latter, the British captains were directed to use their guns offensively against the German U-boat in accordance with the Admiralty's instructions contained in its handbook, beginning September 9th or October 1st at the latest. The German order to attack armed enemy merchant vessels without warning was issued on 4 October only. Thus it was justified in any case, even if one wanted to acknowledge difference in treatment for vessels with defensive and offensive armament.

DEFENSE

The guns on the merchant vessels and the orders for their use were, however, only a part of a comprehensive system for the military use of merchant vessels. Since the end of September 1939 the fastest vessels, that is those ships that were the least endangered by submarines, but were especially suited for chasing submarines, received depth charge projectors, that is armaments which make it possible to find the submerged submarines and which thus may be counted as typical weapons for the offensive.

However, what was of more general importance and also of greater danger for the submarines was the order to report every enemy ship on sight, giving its type and location. This report was supposed, so said the order, to take advantage of an opportunity which might never recur to destroy the enemy by their own (the British) naval and air force. This is an unequivocal utilization of all merchant vessels for military intelligence service to directly injure the enemy. If one considers the fact that according to the hospital-ship agreement even the immunity of hospital ships ceases if they relay military information of such a kind, then one need have no doubts about the consequences of such behavior on the part of a commercial vessel. Whatever craft puts out to sea with the order and intention of using every opportunity that occurs to send military reports about the enemy to its own naval and air forces is taking part in the hostilities during the entire course of its voyage, and, based on the aforementioned report of 1930 of the Committee of Jurists, has no right to be considered as a merchant vessel. Any other conception but this would not do justice to the immediate danger which a wireless report means to the reported vessel and which subjects it, often within a few minutes, to attacks by enemy aircraft. All of the Admiralty's directives from the very first day of the war show that British merchant vessels were firmly organized within the system of the British Navy for combating the enemy's naval forces. They were part of the military communications network of the British navy and air force; and their arming with cannon and depth charge projectors, all the practical training, and orders relative to the service were matters that concerned the British Navy.

We consider it out of the question that a merchant fleet which is thus destined and utilized for battle should count among the vessels entitled to the protection of the London Protocol against sinking without warning.

To sum up, I should like to remark as regards the conduct of German submarines against enemy merchant vessels: I believe that the German conception of the London Protocol of 1936, according to the position generally taken by the experts of the powers involved as well as according to the well known opinion of numerous and competent scientists of all countries, had no trace of dishonesty in it. If I were to express myself with caution, I would say that it is, legally at least, perfectly tenable, and thus not the slightest charge can be raised against the German Naval Command, if it issued its orders on a sensible and perfectly fair basis. We have shown that these orders were given only after such conditions had been created by the exposure of British measures as justified the orders issued according to the concepts of German law.

Before I leave this subject I should like to recall to the Tribunal the special protection which the German orders provided for passenger vessels. These were excluded for a long time from all sinking measures, even when they sailed in an enemy convoy and, therefore, could have been sunk immediately, according to the British conception, too. These measures point out especially clearly that accusation of disregard and brutality is unjustified. The passenger vessels were only included in the orders concerning other vessels when in the spring of 1940 there was no more harmless passenger traffic at all, and these ships, because of their great speed and heavy armaments, proved to be particularly dangerous enemies for submarines. If, therefore, Mr. Roger Allen's report cites as an especially good example of German submarine cruelty the sinking in the autumn of 1940 of the "City of Benares," then this example is not very happily selected, because the "City of Benares" was armed and went under convoy.

I shall turn now to the treatment of neutrals in the conduct of German submarine warfare, and can at once point again in this connection to the example which Mr. Roger Allen holds up especially for the sinking of a neutral against international law. It is a question of the torpedoing of the Danish steamer "Vendia" which occurred at the end of September 1939. The Tribunal will recall that this ship was stopped in a regular way and was torpedoed and sunk only when it began preparations for ramming the German submarine. This occurrence led the German government to protest to the Danish government on account of the hostile conduct shown by a neutral boat. The analysis of this one example may show only how different things look if not only the result, namely the sinking of a neutral ship, is known but also the causes which led to this result. Until the last day of the war the fundamental order to the German submarines was in effect not to attack merchantmen recognized as neutral. There were some accurately defined exceptions to this order of which the neutral powers had been notified. They affected in the first place ships which conducted themselves in a suspicious or hostile manner, and secondly ships in announced operational areas.

DEFENSE

To the first group belonged above all those vessels which sailed in the war area with dimmed lights. On 26 September 1939 the commander of the submarine fleet asked the high command of the navy for permission to attack without warning vessels proceeding in the channel with dimmed lights. The reason was clear. It is there where at night the enemy's troop and matériel shipments took place through which the second wave of the British expeditionary army was ferried across the Channel to France. At that time the order still was in effect that French ships be not attacked at all. But since at night French ships could not be distinguished from English vessels, submarine warfare in the Channel would have had to be halted completely in compliance with this order. The Tribunal heard from a witness that in this way a 20,000-ton troop transport passed by the torpedo tubes of a German submarine unmolested. Such a result in a war is grotesque and it goes without saying that, therefore, the naval command approved the request of the commander of the submarine fleet.

The Prosecution has now made much ado about a note written on this occasion by an assistant at the Naval Command, Lieutenant Commander Fresch. Already the Chief of Section, Admiral Wagner, did not approve of the opinions expressed in it; and, therefore, they did not lead to corresponding orders. The order to attack blacked-out ships was issued by radio without any further explanation on the part of the Naval Command, and on 4 October it was extended by it to further regions surrounding the English coast, and again without any explanation in the sense of the above-mentioned note.

Examining the question of blacked-out vessels from the legal standpoint, Vanselow,¹ the well-known expert on the law of naval warfare, makes the following remark:

"In war, a blacked-out vessel must in case of doubt be considered as an enemy warship. A neutral, as well as an enemy merchant vessel navigating without lights, voluntarily renounces during the hours of darkness all its right to immunity from attack without being stopped."

I furthermore refer to Churchill's declaration made in the House of Commons on 8 May 1940 concerning the action of British submarines in the Skagerrak. Since the beginning of April, the latter had the order to attack all German vessels without warning during the daytime, and all vessels, and so all neutrals, too, at night. This implies recognition of the legal standpoint exposed. It even goes beyond the German order, in so far as neutral merchant vessels navigating with all lights on were sunk without warning in these waters during the night.

In view of the clear legal aspect it would hardly have been necessary to give an express warning to neutral shipping against suspicious or hostile conduct. Nevertheless, the naval command (Seekriegsleitung) saw to it that this was done.

On 28 September 1939 the first German note was sent to the neutral governments with the request that they warn their merchant ships against any suspicious conduct, such as changes in course, and the use of wireless upon sighting German naval forces, dimming, or noncompliance with the request to stop, etc. These warnings were subsequently repeated several times and the neutral governments passed them on to their captains. All this has been proved by the documents which have been submitted. Therefore, if, as a result of suspicious or hostile conduct, neutral ships were treated like enemy ships, they have only themselves to blame for it. The German submarines were not allowed to attack anyone who as a neutral maintained a correct attitude during the war and there are hundreds of examples to prove that such attacks never did occur.

Now I wish to deal with the second danger which threatened neutral shipping, the zones of operations. The actual development was, briefly summed up, as follows:

On 24 November 1939 the Reich Government sent a note to all seafaring neutrals in which it points to the use of enemy merchant ships for attacking purposes as well as to the fact that the Government of the United States had barred to its own shipping a carefully defined naval zone around the Central European coast, the so-called U. S. A. combat zone. As the note states, these two facts give the Reich Government cause "to warn anew and more strongly that in view of the fact that the actions are carried on with all means of modern war technics and in view of the fact that these actions are increasing in the waters around the British Isles and near the French coast these waters can no longer be considered safe for neutral shipping."

¹ Vanselow, International Law, Berlin, 1931, No.226i.

DEFENSE

The note thereupon recommends for the shipping between neutral powers certain sea routes which are not endangered by German means of naval warfare and, furthermore, it recommends legislative measures according to the example set by the U. S. A. In concluding, the Reich Government rejects the responsibility for consequences which would follow if warning and recommendation should not be complied with. This note constituted the announcement of an operational area of the U. S. combat zone with the limitation that only in those sea zones which are actually endangered by actions against the enemy consideration could no longer be given to neutral shipping.

The Naval High Command (Seekriegsleitung) indeed observed this limitation. In the beginning the neutral powers had more than six months in which to take the measures recommended by the German Government for the safety of their own shipping and to direct their shipping along the routes announced. Starting in January the German Command then opened up to the German naval forces within the operational area announced accurately defined zones around the English coast in which an attack without warning against all ships sailing there was admissible. The naval chart on which these zones had been marked was submitted to the Tribunal. The chart shows that gradually those zones and only those were taken in which, as a result of mutually increasing attacks and defensive actions at sea and in the air, engagements continually occurred so that every ship entering this area was operating with the naval forces of both powers nearby. The last one of these zones was designated late in May 1940. These zones were not and needed not be announced because they were all within the area of operation as proclaimed on 24 November 1939. The distance of these zones from the enemy coast was on the average 60 sea miles. Outside these boundaries the declaration concerning the area of operations of 24 November was not observed, i.e., neutral ships could be stopped and sunk only in accordance with the Prize Ordinance.

This situation changed when, after the collapse of France in the summer of 1940, the British Isles became the center of the war. On 17 August 1940 the Reich Government sent to the neutral governments a declaration in which the entire area of the U. S. combat zone around England without any limitation was designated as operational area.

"Every ship," so the note reads, "which sails in this area exposes itself to destruction not only by mines, but also by other combat means. Therefore, the German Government warns once more and urgently against entering the endangered area."

From this time on the area was fully utilized and the immediate use of arms against the craft encountered in it was permitted to all naval and air forces in so far as special exceptions had not been ordered. The entire development described was openly dealt with in the German press, and Grand Admiral Raeder granted interviews to the foreign press on this subject which clearly showed the German viewpoint. If, therefore, in the mentioned sea zones neutral ships and crews sustained losses, at least they cannot complain about not having been warned explicitly and urgently beforehand.

This statement alone has not much meaning in the question of whether areas of operation as such constitute an admissible measure. Here, too, the prosecution will take the position that in the London Protocol of 1936 no exceptions of any kind were made for areas of operation and, therefore, such exceptions naturally do not exist.

As is well known, operational areas were first proclaimed in the first world war. The first declaration of this kind came in the British Government on 2 November 1914 and designated the entire area of the North Sea as a military area. This declaration was justified on the basis that it was a reprisal against alleged German violations of international law. Since this justification naturally was not recognized, the imperial government replied on 4 February 1915 by designating the waters around England as a military area. On both sides certain extensions were made subsequently. I do not want to go into the individual formulations of these declarations and into the sagacious legal deductions which were made from their wording for or against the admissibility of these declarations. Whether these areas are designated as military area, barred zone, operational area, or danger zone, the point always was that the naval forces in the announced area had permission to destroy any ship encountered there. After the world war the conviction of naval officers and experts in international law alike was in general that the operational area would be maintained as a means of naval warfare. The development typical for the rules of naval warfare was confirmed here, namely, that the modern technique of war forcibly leads to the use of war methods which at first are introduced on the grounds of being reprisals, but which are gradually being used also without such a justification and recognized as legitimate.

DEFENSE

The technical reasons for such a development are very obvious. The improvement of mines made it possible to endanger large sea areas by mines. But if it was admissible to destroy by mines every ship sailing despite warning in a designated sea area, one could see no reason why other means of naval warfare should not be used in this area in the same way. Besides, the traditional institution of the blockade directly outside enemy ports and coasts by mines, submarines, and aircraft was practically made impossible so that the sea powers had to look for new ways to bar the approach to enemy coasts effectively. Consequently, it was these necessities which were the compelling factors in bringing about the recognition of the operational areas.

It is true that there was by no means a uniform interpretation concerning the particular prerequisites under which the declaration of such areas would be considered admissible, just as there was none with regard to the designation which the belligerent power must choose. Also the conferences of 1922 and 1930 did not change anything in that respect. This is shown by the efforts which were also after 1930 exerted especially by American politicians and experts in international law for a solution of this question. (In 1935 the American Senator, Ney, proposed to prohibit operational areas. In 1937 Charles Warren made a motion for a discussion on it in the Society for International Law. And the draft for a convention which was already mentioned before and which was drawn up by American scientists also dealt with this subject.)

Unfortunately, there is no time here to discuss these questions in detail and, therefore, it must suffice for the purposes of the defense to state that during the conferences in Washington in 1922 and in London in 1930 the operational area was an institution known to all powers concerned, an institution operating in a way which had been determined by both sides in the first world war to the effect that all ships encountered in it would be subject to immediate destruction.

If this institution were to have been abolished in the mentioned conferences, especially in the treaty of 1930, an accord should have been reached on this question, if not in the text of the agreement, at least in the negotiations. The transcripts show nothing of the kind. The relationship between operational area and London Protocol remained unsettled.

The French Admiral, Caston, has the same viewpoint.¹ Admiral Bauer, Commander of Submarines in the first world war, in 1931 stated his disapproval of the application of the London rules in the operational area and this opinion was absolutely known to the British Navy.² In a thorough study of Ernst Schmitz³ in 1938 a merchant vessel which enters an operational area despite the general prohibition is regarded as being guilty of "persistent refusal to stop." The powers participating in the conferences in Washington and London consciously avoided, in these as in other cases, to start controversial questions on which no accord could be reached. Therefore, every power maintained a free hand to champion in practice that opinion which corresponded to its interests.

There was no doubt left in the minds of the participants on this point, and I have as a witness for this no one less important than the French Minister for Foreign Affairs of that time, Briand. In his instruction of 30 December 1921 to Sarraut, the French chief delegate in Washington, he announces the basic readiness of concluding an agreement about submarine warfare. However, he then points out a series of questions as being essential parts of such an agreement, among them the arming of merchant ships and the definition of combat zones. The instruction goes, "It is indispensable to examine these questions and to solve them by a joint agreement, for surface vessels as well as for submarines and aircraft, in order not to establish ineffective and deceptive stipulations."⁴

Particularly with respect to the question concerning the area of operation, Briand characterizes the submarine rules as being "ineffective and deceptive." After this testimony nobody will be able to designate the German conception as fraudulent according to which ships in declared areas of operation are not under the protection of the London Protocol. Even Mr. Roger Allen's report concedes this.⁵

Therefore, the attacks of the prosecution seem to be directed, as I understand from the cross examinations, less against the existence of such zones than against their extent, and we have

¹ Theories on Strategy, IV, p. 323: "Even in a military zone, would one not be confronted with the damned Article 22 of the London Treaty?"

² Bauer, The Submarine, 1931. A Report by Capt. G. P. Thomson, R.N., in 76 Journal of the Royal Naval Instruction, 1931, p. 511.

³ Barred Zones in Naval War, Journal for Foreign Public Law and International Law, Vol. VIII, 1938, p. 671.

⁴ French Yellow Book, "The Washington Conference," p. 88.

⁵ Report of 8 October 1940, p. 3: One thing is certain; namely, apart from vessels in declared war zones, destruction of a merchant vessel is envisaged if even only after capture.

DEFENSE

repeatedly heard the figure of 750,000 square miles. Incidentally, it is to be noticed that this figure includes the land area of Great Britain, Ireland, and Western France; the area of water alone amounts only to 600,000 square miles. I quite agree, however, that through operational areas of such a size the interests of the neutrals are badly prejudiced.

The more remarkable is the fact that the above-mentioned American draft for an agreement of 1939 which concerns the rights and duties of neutrals provides for a considerable expansion of the operational area. Such an area which is termed "Blockade Zone" in the draft is to include the waters up to a distance of 50 sea miles from the blockaded coast. This would correspond to a large extent to the area of waters in which surprise attacks were not authorized until 17 August 1940; it covers 200,000 square miles approximately. However, it seems to me almost impossible to approach from a scientific angle such an eminently practical question as that of the expansion of an operational area. As long as this question is not settled by an agreement, the actual determination will always be a compromise between what is desirable from a military point of view and what is politically possible. It seems to me that laws are only violated when a belligerent misuses his power against neutrals. The question as to whether such a misuse exists should be made dependent upon the attitude of the opponent towards the neutrals as well as upon the measures taken by the neutrals themselves.

During the production of documents, the Tribunal has eliminated all those which I intended to utilize in order to prove that British naval warfare also paid no attention to the interests of neutrals when they were in contradiction with their own interests. If it is the Tribunal's wish, I will not go into the details of the British measures, and in summing up I will mention them only in so far as they are indispensable for the legal argumentation. The following points are chiefly concerned:

1. The British regulations of 3 September 1939 concerning contraband goods which practically prevented neutral mercantile traffic with Germany through the introduction of the so-called "hunger blockade."
2. The decree concerning control ports for contraband goods compelled neutral ships to make great detours through the middle of the war zone, to which must be imputed without doubt a series of losses of neutral ships and crews.
3. The introduction of an export blockade against Germany on 27 November 1939 by means of which the importation of German goods was made impossible for neutrals.

4. The introduction of the Navicert System in connection with the black lists which put the whole of neutral trade under British control and which made ships which did not accept this system liable to be seized and confiscated.

I am not considering the question here whether these British measures towards neutrals were admissible or not from the point of view of international law. In any case, the neutrals themselves considered many of them inadmissible and there was hardly any which did not arouse more or less vehement protests, as for instance on the part of Spain, the Netherlands, Soviet Russia, and the U. S. A. From the beginning the British Government on its side had prevented any legal examination of its measures by freeing itself from the optional clauses of the Permanent International Tribunal at the Hague, through a note of 7 September 1939. This step was expressly based on the necessity of providing the British Navy with full freedom of action.

On the British side the fact was emphasized in the first world war already, and has been emphasized ever since, that British measures did indeed prejudice the interests and possibly the rights, too, of the neutrals. However, they did not imperil either the ships or the crews and are therefore considered morally superior to the inhuman German measures. First, as mentioned before, the obligation of entering control ports was dangerous for neutral ships and crews; and for this very reason neutral countries protested against it. But apart from this it seems to me that the actual difference between the British and German measures for blockading the adversary are not founded upon moral differences but upon differences in their sea power. In the waters where the British navy did not exercise naval supremacy, namely, around the coasts we were occupying as well as in the Baltic Sea, it used the same methods of naval warfare as we did.

In any case, the official German opinion was that the British-mentioned control measures against neutrals were inadmissible; and the Reich Government formulated against the neutral powers the accusation that they protested indeed but actually submitted to the British measures. This is clearly stated in the proclamation issued on the occasion of the proclamation of the blockade on 17 August 1940. Consequently, the following facts confronted the German Naval Command:

1. A legal trade between the neutrals and the British Isles no longer existed. On the ground of the German answers to the British stipulations concerning contraband goods and the British export blockade, any trade to and from England was contraband trade; therefore illegal from the point of view of international law.

DEFENSE

2. The neutrals submitted in practice to all British measures even when these measures were in contradiction with their own interests and their own conception of legality.

3. Thus, the neutrals directly supported British warfare. For, by submitting to the British control system in their own country, they saved the British navy the use of large fighting forces which, according to the hitherto existing international law, should have exercised the trade control at sea, and which were now available for other war tasks. Therefore, the German Command, in determining its operational area in order to prevent the illegal traffic from reaching England, saw no reason for giving preference to the considerations towards the neutrals to the detriment of its own military requirements. This all the less as the neutral shipping, which despite all warnings continued to travel to England, took big money for this increased risk and still considered, therefore, the trade with England as a lucrative business. (Comdr. Russel Grenfell, RN, The Art of the Admiral, London, 1937, p. 80) "The neutral merchants, however, are not likely to relinquish a highly lucrative trade without a struggle, and thus there arises the acrimonious wrangle between belligerents and neutrals which is a regular feature of maritime warfare, the rules for which are dignified by the name of international law."

In addition to that, the most important neutrals took themselves measures which can be regarded as a completely new interpretation of the existing laws of naval warfare. All American countries jointly proclaimed the Pan-American safety zone, an area along the American coast up to a distance of approximately 300 sea miles. In these waters, comprising altogether several million square miles, they asked the belligerents to give up the exercise of those rights which, according to the hitherto existing international law, naval forces of the belligerents were authorized to apply to neutrals. On the other hand, as I have already mentioned, the President of the United States prohibited on 4 November 1939 U. S. citizens and ships to travel within an area of waters expanding over approximately 1 million square miles along the European coast. Thus, the development of the laws of naval warfare, under leading participation of the neutrals, forcibly led to a recognition of large areas reserved either for the purpose of safety or for that of combat.

At the same time the American President explicitly stated in his proclamation that the maritime zone he had closed was endangered by combat action as a result of technical developments. The proclamation thereby only took into consideration the development of modern weapons; the long-range coastal artillery which, for example, could easily fire across the English Channel; the invention of locating devices which permitted land supervision of maritime traffic over dozens of sea miles, and particularly the increased speed and range of aircraft.

From this development, the German Naval Command drew the same conclusions as the above-mentioned neutrals, namely, that defense and offense would necessarily have to cover large maritime areas in this war. It was therefore not from choice that the German operational area which the prosecution objects to grew to such a size; it was only because it was adopting itself to a system which was also recognized by the other powers as legitimate.

In order to examine the legality of the German measures on the basis of enemy methods, may I ask the Tribunal to recall the naval chart on which the British zones of warning and danger are marked? These zones cover about 120,000 square miles. Even if these dimensions are smaller than those of the German operational area, it seems to me that the difference between 100,000 and 600,000 square miles is not so much a question of legal judgment as one of coastal length and of strategic position on the sea. This observation is confirmed by the American practice against Japan such as Admiral Nimitz has professed.

He says: "In the interest of the conduct of operations against Japan the area of the Pacific Ocean is declared a zone of operations."

This zone of operations covers over 30 million square miles. All ships in it, with the exception of their own and Allied as well as hospital ships, were sunk without warning. The order was issued on the first day of the war, on 7 December 1941, when the Chief of the Naval High Command ordered unrestricted submarine warfare against Japan.

It is not my business to examine whether this order issued on the first day of the war is to be looked upon and justified as a measure of reprisal. For me, the important thing is to show how it worked out in practice, and this is unequivocal.

The Prosecution attaches special blame to the orders to carry out surprise attacks in the operational areas if possible unnoticed, so that mine hits may be pretended. Orders to this effect existed for the period from January until August 1940, i.e., during the period when submarines were permitted to act without warning not in the whole operational area of 24 November 1939 but only in the especially defined areas below the English coast. In this camouflage the Prosecution sees proof of a bad conscience and thereby the consciousness of wrong doing. The real reasons for the measures ordered were of a twofold nature: military and political. For the admirals concerned, the military reasons stood of course in the foreground; and the commander of the submarine fleet also knew only these reasons. The enemy was to be left in uncertainty as to what weapons of naval warfare had caused his losses, and his defense was to be led astray in this manner. It is self-evident that such misleading of the enemy is fully justified in time of war. The measures had the desired military success; and in numerous cases the British Navy employed flotillas of mine sweepers where a ship had been torpedoed, and conversely started a submarine chase where a loss had occurred through mine hits.

DEFENSE

For the Supreme Command, however, it was not the military but the political reasons which were the determining factor. These invisible attacks were meant to give an opportunity of denying before neutrals that the sinkings were due to submarines, and of tracing them back to mines. This actually happened in some cases. Does that now mean that the German Government itself considered illegal the use of surprise submarine action within the operation area? I do not think so.

In view of the repeated accusations which the Prosecution has built up here and elsewhere from the camouflaging of measures, the denial of facts, I feel obliged to make a few remarks on the point as to whether there is any obligation at all in international politics to tell the truth. However, it may be in peacetime, in time of war, at any rate, one cannot recognize any obligation to tell the truth in a question which may be of advantage to the enemy. I only need to point to Hugo Grotius who says: "One may conceal the truth wisely. Dissimulation is absolutely necessary and unavoidable." (De jure pacis ac belli, book III, chapter I, par 6, quot. Augustin, "One may conceal the truth wisely," and Cicero, "Dissimulation is absolutely necessary and unavoidable, especially for those to whom the care of the state is entrusted.")

What would it have meant for the military situation if U-boat sinkings in the instances dealt with here had not been denied but admitted instead? First of all, since that would have come to the knowledge of the enemy, too, we should have lost the military advantage which lay in the misleading of his defense. Furthermore—and this is no less important—we might quite possibly have furnished our enemy with allies who would have helped him with propaganda if not with their weapons. In view of the fact that some of the neutrals concerned were so dependent on England, they would probably not have recognized the German viewpoint as to the legitimacy of the operational areas, especially since this viewpoint was contrary to their own interests. It would have led to political tensions and possibly to armed conflicts. Our enemies would have derived the only immediate advantage from it. From the standpoint of the law, this endeavor to camouflage the use of submarines, even from the neutrals, does not seem objectionable to me. But if the Prosecution uses this with the intention of moral defamation, it applies standards here which heretofore have never been applied to the conduct of a war and to the politics of any other country in the world. It was just in naval warfare in which the same methods of camouflage were employed by the other side, too. The operational areas which Great Britain declared around the European coasts from Norway to Biscay were, with the exception of the Biscay area, declared mine danger zones. But we know from Churchill's statement of May 1940 as well as from testimonies of witnesses that in these areas there were unlimited attacks with submarines, speedboats, and above all with aeroplanes. Consequently, very often neither the German command nor the neutral country which had been attacked knew whether a loss sustained in such an area really should be traced back to a mine or to another weapon of naval warfare. To conclude that the camouflaging of a measure constitutes its illegality thus seems to me entirely without basis.

Within the German operational zone all ships were on principle attacked without warning. However, orders had been given to make exceptions in the case of certain neutrals, such as, in the beginning, Japan, the Soviet Union, Spain, and Italy. In this measure, the prosecution saw the endeavor of the Naval Command (Seekriegerleitung) to terrorize the smaller neutral countries, whereas it dared not pick a quarrel with the big ones. The real reason for this different treatment is given in Document UK-65 in the notation on the report which the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy made to the Fuehrer on 16 October 1939. According to this notation, the neutral governments mentioned are requested to declare that they will not carry contraband of war; in every other respect they will be treated just like any other neutral country. This means that the reason for the different treatment was merely that certain countries were willing and in a position to forbid their boats to carry contraband of war to England, whereas others could not or would not do it because of their political attitude or their economic dependence on England. Therefore, it is not a question of terrorizing the smaller neutrals and sparing the bigger ones, but of preventing traffic in contraband of war and sparing of legal commercial trade. Since no general legal maxim exists which compels the belligerent power to treat all neutral powers alike, no objection can be raised on the basis of international law. It would indeed be strange if here, in the name of humanity, the demand were made that German submarines should have sunk even those ships which they did not want to sink at all.

DEFENSE

The Tribunal saw from the Standing War Orders submitted that during the further course of the war even the small powers, which were the only neutral ones left, could, by virtue of shipping agreements, cross the operational area along certain routes without being molested by German submarines. In this way, for instance, Sweden and Switzerland as well as Turkey could carry on their maritime trade during the war.

Outside the operational area announced, the German submarines were never permitted to attack neutral ships. In this respect the naval command desisted from waging any submarine warfare against neutral merchant shipping, since enemy air surveillance made stopping and searching too dangerous for German submarines. Against the disadvantage of submarine warfare within the operational area, the neutrals had, outside the area, the advantage of remaining completely unmolested, even if they were shipping contraband goods and were liable to be sunk because of this without being stopped. Thus, the neutral vessel outside the operational area was only in danger if it behaved in a suspicious or hostile way or if it was not clearly marked as neutral. And the German Naval Command (Seekriegsleitung) again and again called the attention of the neutral powers to this necessity.

In this connection I must mention the order of 18 July 1941, according to which U. S. A. vessels within the operational area were assimilated to all other neutrals, i.e., they could be attacked without warning. The Prosecution has seen in this an especial proof that the submarine warfare against neutrals was waged in a "cynical and opportunist" way. If this is to mean that it was also influenced by political considerations, then I am ready to admit it. But I do not consider it a reproach; for, since war itself is a political weapon, it is in keeping with its essence if individual sectors of it are placed under the leadership of politics. In particular, no reproach should be seen in the orders of the German leadership as regards the utilization of submarines against the U. S., because it is just they which are a proof of the efforts to avoid any conflict with the United States.

As is known to the Tribunal from documents and the testimonies of witnesses, the ships of the United States during the first years of the war were exempt from all measures of naval warfare; and this was true as well when, contrary to the original American legislation, they sailed into the U. S. A. combat zone and thus into the German operational area in order to carry war materiel to England. This policy was changed only when, in addition to the many unneutral acts of the past, the active employment of the American Navy had been ordered for the protection of British supply lines. Well known are the statements of President Roosevelt which he made at that time about the "bridge of boats over the Atlantic" and the support which should be given to England "by every means short of war." It may be doubtful whether the "realistic attitude"¹ which the U. S. A. naval and air forces were ordered to take at that time did not already constitute an illegal war as was claimed just now by some American sources.²

At least the U.S.A. had abandoned its neutrality and claimed the position of a "nonbelligerent" which was also a new aspect of international law in this war. If in this connection one wished to raise the charge of cynicism, it should be directed against the orders which were issued in justification of the consequences of the American attitude.

I have endeavored to present the Tribunal with a survey of the essential orders issued, and to say a few things in respect of their legality. No doubt there were instances of attacks on ships which, according to the orders mentioned, should not have been attacked. There are only few such cases, and some of them have been brought up at this trial. The best known concerns the sinking of the British passenger vessel "Athenia" on September 3, 1939 by the "U 30" under the command of Lieutenant Captain Lemp. The sinking of this ship was due to the fact that the commander took it by mistake for an auxiliary vessel. If the Tribunal still hesitated to believe the concurring statements of all the witnesses heard here in this critical and so much talked of case, these doubts would be removed by the behavior of the same commandant in the days and weeks following the sinking. Lt. Captain Lemp, as the log of "U 30" of that time shows, adhered strictly to the prize ordinance; and from this log I was able to submit several examples of the fair and gentlemanly conduct of German commandants even when by such conduct they greatly endangered their submarines.

¹ Admiral King: "Report of the American Chief of Naval Operations"; German Edition, 1946, p. 157: "However the situation might have been viewed on the basis of international law, the American Navy took a realistic position toward the events in the Atlantic."

² John Chamberlain, The Man who Pushed Pearl Harbor, "Life" of 1 April 1946.

DEFENSE

Only on the return of the "U 30" from its operations at the end of September 1939 were the commander of submarines and the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy fully informed of the whole affair of the sinking of the "Athenia." Upon his return, the commandant reported to the U-boat commander the mistake which he himself recognized as such and was sent to Berlin to report in person.

Dr. Siemers will deal with the political development of this matter. I only mention the military occurrences. Admiral Doe-nitz received the following communication from the Naval High Command:

1. That the affair be further dealt with politically in Berlin.
2. That court martial proceedings are not necessary since the commandant acted in good faith.
3. That the entire matter be kept in strict secrecy.

On the grounds of this order the U-boat commander gave orders for the report on the sinking of the "Athenia" to be removed from the log of the "U 30" and gave instructions that the log be completed in such a manner as to make the absence of an entry inconspicuous.

As the Tribunal has seen, this order was not carried out satisfactorily, obviously for the reason that the officer in charge had no experience whatever of such measures.

The Prosecution pointed out this changing of the war diary as a particularly criminal act of falsification. This, it seems to me, is based on a misunderstanding of the facts. The war diary is nothing else but a military report by the commandant to his superior commands. What occurrences should or should not be included in reports of this kind is not decided by any legal or moral principle but is solely a matter of military regulations. The war diary was meant to be secret; however, it was, like many secret matters, accessible to a very large group of people. This is already apparent from the fact that it had been issued in 8 copies, of which some were intended not only for the higher staffs, but for schools and for training flotillas as well. Therefore, whenever an occurrence was to be restricted to the knowledge of a small group of individuals, it was not to be reported in the war diary. Since the war diary was kept consecutive, the missing period necessarily had to be filled in with another, ergo, incorrect entry. I can see nothing immoral in such a measure, much less anything illegal. As long as there is secrecy in time of war—and this is the case in all countries—it means that all facts cannot be told to everybody; and, therefore, one sometimes has to make incorrect statements, too. A certain moral offense could perhaps be seen in such action if thereby a falsification of history for all times had been intended. This, however, was by no means the case. The commandant's report in regard to the sinking of the "Athenia" was of course submitted in the original form to the immediate superiors, the commander of the U-boats and the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, and was also kept there.

I should like further to say briefly that a general order not to enter certain happenings into the war diary has never existed.

The "Athenia" case shows one more thing, the manner in which the compliance of U-boat commandants with issued orders was enforced. In spite of the justified conception of the Naval High Command that the commandant acted in good faith, he was punished with arrest by Admiral Doenitz because, by employing greater caution, he perhaps might have recognized that this was not an auxiliary cruiser. Punishment was meted out in other cases, too, where the orders had been mistakenly violated.

The Tribunal knows the wireless communications of September 1942 by which, on the occasion of the sinking of "Monte Gorbea," the commandant had been informed that upon his return he will have to face court-martial proceedings for violation of orders regarding the conduct toward neutrals. All commandants received notice of this measure.

The Tribunal will please consider what such strict threats mean to a commandant at sea. If the directives of the American Manual for Courts-Martial were to be considered as a basis, then court-martial proceedings against officers should only be initiated in cases where dismissal from the service seems warranted. (Manual for Courts-Martial, U.S. Army, 1928, p. 10.)

That should never be the case when the violation of an order is an accidental one. For a commander who is supposed to make war and gain successes with his soldiers, it is extremely hard and, in fact, under certain circumstances actually a mistake to have one of his commandants on his return from a successful operation tried before a court martial because of a failure which occurred in that action.

Every military leadership acts in accordance with these principles. In this connection, I will refer to the unlimited commendation which the commander of the British destroyer "Cos-sak" received for setting free the prisoners of the "Altmark" in spite of the incidents which occurred during this action and which were probably regretted by the British, too.

DEFENSE

I had to go into these matters in order to meet the accusation that any sinkings carried out against orders were sanctioned afterwards by the High Command in so far as no drastic steps were taken against the commandant. Especially in the field of submarine warfare compliance with orders issued was ensured by the continuous personal contact of the commandants with their commander. After the conclusion of every enemy operation an oral report had to be made; and all measures taken were subjected to sharp criticism simultaneously, while preventive instructions were given at the same time for future behavior.

The German submarines undertook many thousands of combat operations during this war. In the course of them orders issued were violated only in very rare instances. If one considers how difficult it is for a submarine to establish its exact position and the boundaries of an operational area and to distinguish an armed from an unarmed merchant vessel, a passenger ship from a troop transport, or a neutral from an enemy ship, the low number of sinkings which were considered illegal by the Germans, too, must be taken as proof of an especially effective and conscientious leadership. After this discussion of the factual development of German submarine warfare I still have to deal with the accusations built up by the Prosecution from some preparatory deliberations on the subject of the organization of submarine warfare.

Simultaneously with the combat instructions of 3 September 1939 in which German submarines were ordered to comply in their operations strictly with the Prize Ordinance, an order was prepared in the Naval High Command decreeing action without warning in case the enemy merchantmen were armed. In addition to this, during the first days of the war, there was an exchange of correspondence with the Foreign Office on the subject of declaring prohibited zones.

The Prosecution looks upon these two documents as proof of the will to conduct a war against international law from the very start. I, on the other hand, regard these same documents as proof of the fact that the Naval Command was fully unprepared for a war with England and that it was only when the British had already declared war that it began to set about thinking in the most primitive way how such a war should be conducted. Since neither surprise attacks on armed merchant vessels nor the declaration of prohibited zones violate international law, a belligerent should be allowed just to think over on the outbreak of war if and when he wants to make use of these opportunities.

As we know from the above-mentioned orders of the British Admiralty, as early as 1938 the latter had made a thorough study of all the possibilities resulting from the war upon commercial shipping and had worked them out in a practical way.

This same standpoint holds good also for the memorandum of the Naval High Command of 15 October 1939, which has been quoted several times by the Prosecution. Its very heading shows that it is a study: "Possibilities for the intensification of naval warfare."

In accordance with the heading, the memorandum reveals an examination of military demands for effective naval warfare against England and the legal possibilities for fulfilling these demands. The result was the order of 17 October 1939 decreeing the immediate use of arms against all enemy merchant vessels, justification for which resulted, as we have already shown, from their having been armed and incorporated in the military system. Beyond this no intensifying measures were regarded as justified for the time being, and the suggestion made was to wait and see what the further conduct of the enemy would be like.

One sentence in this memorandum arouses special distrust on the part of the Prosecution: It says that naval warfare must be kept as a matter of principle within the framework of existing international law. But measures which might result in successes decisive for the war would have to be taken, however, even if new laws of naval warfare were created thereby. Does this really constitute a renunciation of international law?

On the contrary, a departure from existing international law is made dependent only on two quite limited conditions:

1. A military one, namely, that if measures are involved which were of decisive importance for the outcome of the war, i.e., that would at the same time shorten the war.¹

2. A moral one, namely, if the nature of the new measures makes them suitable for incorporation in a new international law.

The memorandum itself states that this would be possible only within the framework of the laws of military combat ethics, and a demand is therefore made for rigid adherence without any exceptions to these ethics of warfare. Under these conditions there can hardly be any doubt as to the possibility of formulating new international laws.

¹ With regard to this point, I refer to the extensive literature on the subject of the right of self-preservation in case of urgent necessity. This right was given as a reason for the attack on the Danish Fleet in 1807 as well as for the Hunger Blockade against Germany.

DEFENSE

As expressed by the well-known expert on international law, Frhr. von Freytagh-Loringhoven, "It has always been war which has given its strongest impulses to international law. Sometimes they have been of positive and sometimes of a negative nature; they have led to further development of already existing institutions and norms, to the creation of new forms or the reversion to old ones, and not infrequently also to failures."¹

Especially in this trial, which itself is supposed to serve the development of new international law, the possibility of such a development cannot be denied.

The American prosecutor, Justice Robert Jackson, in his report to the President of the United States with regard to this problem expressed his opinion as follows:

"International law is not capable of development by legislation, for there is no continuously sitting international legislature. Innovations and revisions in international law are brought about by the action of governments, designed to meet a change in circumstances. It grows, as did the common law, through decisions reached from time to time in adapting settled principles to new situations." (Excerpt from "Neue Auslese," 1936, booklet 1, p. 16.)

These words carry a full justification of the clause objected to by the Prosecution in the memorandum of the Naval High Command. And that the Allies, too, deemed war-deciding measures justified, even though they were contradictory to the present views of international law, is proved by the use of the atom bomb against Japanese cities.

As I am interested in justifying the actual measures taken by the Naval High Command, I did not consider who of the two admirals accused carries more or less responsibility for one or for the other measure. As a formal basis in nearly all cases a Fuehrer decree exists. Both admirals, however, stated that they consider themselves fully responsible for all orders of the naval war that they gave or which they transmitted. I should like to add to that only two remarks:

As far as political considerations were decisive for orders of the U-boat war, the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy had no influence on them. The commander of the U-boats was not even notified of these considerations, just as little as of the political settlement of incidents which arose through U-boats.

My second remark concerns the question to what extent a military commander may be held responsible for the accuracy of legal considerations which he does not make himself, but which are delivered to him by the first experts of his country who are not just small-town lawyers. For the commander of U-boats, it is to be added that he had only tactical tasks and that his staff contained only a few officers, none of whom had the ability to examine questions of international law of the importance mentioned here. He, therefore, had to rely that the orders issued by the Naval War Command were examined as to their legality and were in order. That is probably being handled in a like manner in every navy of the world. A professional seaman is not competent for legal questions; with this reasoning, the Tribunal cut off a remark by Admiral Doenitz about a legal question. This condition must, however, be considered in applying principles which the German Supreme Court during the war crimes trials after the first world war formulated in this way: "The culprit must be conscious of the violation of international law by his doings."

¹ Frhr. v. Freytagh-Loringhoven, "Formulation of New International Laws in Time of War," Hamburg, 1941, p. 5.

This appears to me as just as I should hold it incompatible with the commandments of justice if soldiers would be charged with a criminal responsibility in deciding legal questions which could not be settled at international conferences and which are hotly disputed in the field of science.

In this connection I should like to mention that the London Pact of 1930 did not adopt from the Root Resolution of 1922 the criminal prosecution for violations of the rules of U-boat warfare. The five naval powers participating in this conference apparently came to the conclusion that the problems of naval warfare cannot be solved by the means of penal law. And this wisdom applies fully today.

I am now coming to the second basic charge of the Prosecution, the one of the intentional killing of the shipwrecked. It is aimed at Admiral Doenitz alone, not at Admiral Raeder. The legal basis for the treatment of the shipwrecked for those ships which are entitled to the protection of the London Protocol of 1936 is laid down in the protocol itself. There it reads that before the sinking, crews and passengers are to be brought to safety. This was adhered to on the German side, and the difference of opinion from the Prosecution concerns only the question already dealt with: which ships were entitled to the protection of the protocol and which were not.

In the case of all ships which were not entitled to the protection of the protocol the sinking is to be considered a military combat action. The legal basis, therefore, for these cases regarding the treatment of the shipwrecked is contained in the Hague Convention concerning the application of the principles of the Geneva Convention for Naval warfare of 18 October 1907, although it was not ratified by Great Britain.

DEFENSE

Accordingly both belligerents, after each combat action, shall make arrangements for the search for the shipwrecked, as far as military purposes allow this. Accordingly the principle applied to the German U-boats to help the shipwrecked of steamers sunk without warning, if by doing (1) the boat would not be endangered and (2) the accomplishment of the military mission would not be prejudiced.

These principles are generally acknowledged. In this connection I am referring to the order of the British Admiralty, for example: "No British ocean-going merchantman shall aid a ship attacked by a U-boat."

I further refer to the affidavit of Admiral Rogge, according to which, in two cases personally witnessed by him, nothing was done by a British cruiser to rescue the shipwrecked, because U-boats were assumed to be nearby, once correctly so and once erroneously. A self-endangering appears to exist in a higher degree for U-boats in comparison to other types of vessels, as to its special sensitiveness to hits.

Also, in the case of the second exception from the rescue duty, the prejudice to the military mission, the U-boat is subject to special conditions. It has no room to take guests aboard. Its supply of food, water, and fuel is limited and each considerable allocation is destructive to its combat mission. It is further typical for the U-boat that the combat mission may also call for an unnoticeable attack and therefore exclude the rescue duty.

In order to show here also an opinion about the practice of the opposite side, I quote from the statement of Admiral Nimitz: "In general U.S. submarines did not rescue enemy survivors if it meant an unusual additional danger for the submarine or if the submarine was prevented from further carrying out its mission."

In the light of these principles I will briefly consider the measures of rescue by U-boats until autumn 1942. The basic order was issued by the Naval Warfare Command on 4 October 1939 and ordered rescue whenever possible from the military standpoint. This was temporarily limited through the Standing Order for War 154. This order, issued in December 1939 applied to the few submarines which at that time were operating directly below the English coast. It may be seen from the order itself that every paragraph deals with combat in the presence of enemy forces for security purposes. The last paragraph also deals only with this battle situation and serves the warranted purpose of protecting the submarine commanders from the dangers to which, under the existing circumstances, they exposed their boats through rescue measures in every case. When, after the Norway campaign, the activity of the submarines gradually shifted into the open Atlantic, this order became outdated and was canceled in the fall of 1940. In the time that followed, the German submarine commanders enacted rescue measures whenever they could assume such responsibility from the military standpoint. This is known to the Tribunal from numerous special examples cited here which were contained in the statements of submarine commanders submitted here as well as in the war diaries.

This situation was changed through Admiral Doenitz's order of 17 September 1942 in which he did forbid rescue measures on principle. The decisive sentences are:

"The rescue of members of a sunken ship is not to be attempted. Rescue is contradictory to the most primitive requirements of warfare which are the annihilation of enemy ships and crews."

It has been disputed by the Prosecution that this actually prohibits rescue. It looks upon this order as a hidden provocation to kill the shipwrecked, and it has gone through the press of the world as command for murder. If any accusation at all has been refuted in this trial, then it seems to be this contemptible interpretation of the order mentioned above.

How was this order brought on? Beginning with June 1942 the losses of German submarines through the allied airforce rose by leaps and jumps from monthly average of 4-5 up to 10, 11, 13, during the first half-year of 1942 up to finally 38 boats in May 1943.

Orders and measures were chasing each other from the command of submarine warfare in order to counter these losses. They availed nothing and every day brought fresh reports of air attacks and losses of submarines.

This was the situation when on 12 September it was reported that the heavily armed British troop transport "Laconia" with 1,500 Italian prisoners of war and an allied crew of 1,000 men and some women and children aboard had been torpedoed. Admiral Doenitz withdrew several submarines from current operations for the purpose of rescuing the shipwrecked, and thereby no difference was made between Italians and Allies. From the very start the danger of enemy air attacks filled him with anxiety. While the submarines during the following days devotedly rescued, towed boats, supplied food, etc., they received no less than three admonitions from their commander to be careful, to divide up the shipwrecked, and at all times to be ready to submerge.

DEFENSE

These warnings were of no avail. On 16 September one of the submarines with a Red Cross flag laid out was attacked and considerably damaged by an allied bomber while towing lifeboats, one of which was hit and caused losses among the shipwrecked. Following this report the commander sent three more radio messages with the order in case of danger to submerge immediately and under no circumstances to risk their own safety. Again without avail. In the evening of this day, 17 September 1942, the second submarine reported that during its rescue action it had been taken unawares and was bombed by an airplane.

Notwithstanding these experiences and in spite of the explicit order from Fuehrer Headquarters to risk no boats under any consideration, Admiral Doenitz did not stop the rescue action but had it continued until the shipwrecked were taken on by a French warship sent to their rescue.

But this incident was a lesson. Due to the enemy air-scout activity over the entire sea area, it simply was no longer possible to carry out rescue measures without risking the submarine. It was useless to again and again give orders to the commanders to do rescue work only if their own boat was not endangered thereby.

Earlier experiences had already shown that, for their human desire to render aid had led many commanders to underestimate the dangers from the air. But it takes a submarine, with the deck clear, at least 1 minute to submerge on alarm, while an airplane can cover 6,000 meters in that time. This means practically that a submarine engaged in rescue action when sighting a plane has not time enough to submerge.

These were the reasons which caused Admiral Doenitz, directly after the close of the "Laconia" incident, to forbid rescue measures on principle. The formulation was motivated by the endeavor to preclude the commander's discretion and to suppress every thought of estimating the danger of air attack in the individual case and then according to the occasion still do rescue work.

It is difficult to judge the actual effects of this order. From 1943 on, about 80 per cent of the boats were fighting against convoys where, even without this order, rescue measures would have been impossible.

Whether or not one or the other of the commanders would have, without this order, risked it once more to concern himself with the lifeboats, nobody can tell with certainty. As is known, there was the order since the middle of 1942 if possible to bring in as prisoners captains and leading engineers. During the almost 3 years of war which followed, this order was carried out not even a dozen times, which proves how high the commanders themselves estimated danger to their boats in rising to the surface.

On the other hand, nothing was more distressing for the crew of the torpedoed ships than to be taken aboard a U-boat, because they knew exactly that their chance of being rescued was much better in a lifeboat than on a U-boat which, with a probability of 50 and more per cent, would not return to its base. I, therefore, together with Admiral Godt, arrive at the conclusion that the "Laconia" order may have cost the lives of some Allied seamen at the same time as it may have saved the lives of others. As this may be, in the face of the enormous losses through the enemy air force the order forbidding rescue was justified. It corresponded completely with the basic idea of the precedence of the own vessel and of the own task, as prevailing in all navies; a principle which I believe I have proven as commonly valid in view of existing British and American orders and practices.

How then does the Prosecution arrive at the conception of seeing in this order an "order to murder"? Its origin is the discussion between Hitler and the Japanese Ambassador Oshima in January 1942, in which Hitler proposed an order to his U-boats to kill the survivors of sunken ships. This announcement, as the Prosecution infers, Hitler doubtless made good and Admiral Doenitz had been carrying it out by the "Laconia" order.

Actually, on the occasion of a lecture on U-boat problems which both Admirals had to give in May 1942, the Fuehrer suggested proceeding actively against the shipwrecked in the future, that is, to shoot them. Admiral Doenitz immediately rejected this sort of action as thoroughly impossible and Grand Admiral Raeder unqualifiedly concurred with him. Both admirals specified the improvement of the torpedoes as the only permissible course of raising the losses among the crews. In the face of the opposition of both admirals, Adolf Hitler dropped his proposal and, following this lecture there, no order whatever was given concerning shipwrecked, let alone concerning the killing of the shipwrecked by shooting.

The destruction of the crews through improved action of the torpedoes is an idea which for the first time appeared in this discussion of May 1942 and which returns in later documents of the naval warfare command. I am therefore to express myself about the legality of such tendency: According to classical international law, the destruction of combatants was a legal goal of war actions, but not of noncombatants.¹ In view of the development of the last wars, one may be doubtful whether this classical theory still has any validity. I am regarding the hunger blockade as the first important infringement upon this theory, which, by cutting all food supply, was aimed at the civilian population, therefore the noncombatants of a country, the victims of which during the world war were estimated at 700,000 people.

DEFENSE

Although this blockade² was frequently acknowledged as inadmissible according to international law, it was practiced,³ however; and, therefore, it means breaking with the principle of protection for noncombatants from war measures.⁴

The second great change was brought on by the air war. I do not wish to discuss in detail the unsolvable question of who had started, but only state the fact that the air war, at least in the last two years, was aimed against the civilian population. If, in dozens of attacks on residential quarters of German cities, after an attack, thousands or tens of thousands of civilians were among the victims and only a few dozens or a few hundreds of soldiers, then nobody can assert that the civilian population was not the goal of the attack. The mass dropping of explosives and fire bombs on entire areas does not tolerate a doubt and the use of the atom bomb has produced the final evidence thereto.

In view of the hundreds of thousands of women and children who, in this manner, miserably died in their houses, were buried, suffocated, or burnt to death, I am surprised at the indignation of the Prosecution about the loss of about 30,000 men who lost their lives on the battlefield or on ships which were armed and carried war material and often enough bombs which were destined for the attack on German cities. Moreover, most of these men died in combat, that is, by mines, aircraft, and especially in attacks on convoys, actions which also according to British conception were lawful.

The German Naval Warfare Command regarded these men as combatants. The British Admiralty takes the opposite stand-

¹ Not always recognized by British authors. Compare for example A. C. Bell, A History of the Blockade of Germany, etc., London, 1937, p. 213. The assertion that civilians and armed combat groups were treated as uniform combat groups only since 1914 is one of the most ridiculous statements ever made.

² Grenfell, The Art of the Admiral, London, 1937, p. 45, "By the early part of 1918, the civil population of Germany was in a state of semi-starvation; and it has been calculated that, as a result of the blockade, over 700,000 Germans died of malnutrition."

³ See also note of protest by the Soviet Government to the British ambassador of 25 October 1939, printed as No. 44 in "Documents to the Law of Naval Warfare," Vol. I, published by the Chief Command of the Navy.

⁴ See thereto, for example, Wheaton's Intern. Law, 5th Edition, p. 727, Liddel Hart, "The Revolution in Naval Warfare," Observer v. 14.4.46.

point in the orders for the merchant navy, although Oppenheim, the well-known British expert of international law, even before the outbreak of the first world war, defended the thesis that the crew is to be treated the same as combatants. He points to the century old, and especially in England, upheld practice to take the crew of merchant ships prisoners of war. He finds this principle confirmed in the 11th Hague Convention of 1907 and recognizes the crew of the merchant navy as potential members of the navy. The legal position in their defense against a warship is described as "entirely analogical to the position of the population of an unoccupied territory who takes up arms in order to combat invading troops."

It is well known that this unit is a combat one, according to paragraph 2 of the Hague Convention on land warfare, and without considering whether the individual actually makes use or not of his weapon. Accordingly, Oppenheim refuses to make any distinction, among members of occupying forces, between persons who are enrolled in the enemy navy and those who are not.

If this interpretation was already valid before the first world war, it certainly was unassailable in the year 1942, at a time when there were no more unarmed enemy ships and when the neutrals who happened to enter at all the zone of operations were moving in enemy convoys exclusively, which made them, just like enemy ships, solid members of the military system of the enemy forces. They all had lost any peaceful character and were considered as guilty of active resistance. Active resistance against acts of war is not permitted to any noncombatant in land warfare and results in his being punished as a partisan. And should, in the war on sea, a ship's crew be entitled to the combatant's privileges, without suffering any of its disadvantages? Should this crew be permitted to participate in all possible acts of war, even in the firing of guns and underwater bombs, and yet remain noncombatant? Such an interpretation renders illusory the entire concept of a noncombatant. It cannot make any difference whether or not only a part of the crew has anything to do with the serving of the guns. The ship as an entirety represents a fighting unit, and on board a commercial ship more people had actually anything to do with the serving of weapons as on board a submarine.

These men were trained under military supervision; they served the guns along with gunners of the Navy; and the use of their weapons was regulated according to the admiralty's orders. The crews of ships were accordingly combatants, and thus it was a legitimate aim of hostilities to destroy them by the use of arms.

DEFENSE

This explains at the same time the sentence about the destruction of ships and crews, which is considered by the Prosecution as a particular sign that the "Laconia" order bore the character of a murder order. There has been enough discussion concerning the meaning of this sentence as an argument for the prohibition of saving. It may, taken out of its context, give cause for misunderstanding. But whoever tries to read the entire order cannot misunderstand it. It appears to me as decisive that, in accordance with its origin, it was never meant to be a murder order and has not been interpreted as such by the commanders. This is proven by the declarations and statements of dozens of submarine commanders. In its context, it could not even have been interpreted as a murder order. In fact, in the next paragraphs it was explicitly ruled that as far as possible certain members of the crew should be brought back as prisoners.

It stands to reason that one must trust a military command with enough cleverness not to conserve, if it gives such a murder order at all, a few witnesses of its crime.

Contrary to the Prosecution, the British Admiralty clearly has not believed in such a murder order. Otherwise, it would not have given order to its captains and leading engineers to escape capture by German submarines, by camouflaging as plain sailors while in the lifeboats. According to the interpretation by the Prosecution, such an order would indeed have meant that the captain would have been shot by the submarine along with all the other members of the crew.

Further on, the Prosecution has quoted the order to attack so-called "rescue ships" as an evidence of the intention to kill shipwrecked people. However, only the individual who is either in the water or in the lifeboat is shipwrecked. A shipwrecked combatant who is again on board a ship is nothing but a combatant and accordingly the legitimate aim of an attack. I have already pointed out, during the hearing of evidence, the shooting down of German sea rescue planes with intent to kill the rescued airmen, in order to show that the enemy command acted according to the very same interpretation.

I shall enter as shortly as possible into particulars of the deposition of witnesses, on which the Prosecution tries to base its interpretation of the "Laconia" order. In my opinion, the deposition of First Naval Lieutenant Heisig, as made here before the Tribunal, is irrelevant. His former affidavit is wrong and we know why, from the witness Wagner. Here, before the Tribunal, Heisig has explicitly denied that in Great-Admiral Doenitz's address to the cadets of the submarine school in September 1942 there has been any question that shipwrecked people should be shot at. Rather has he personally drawn a conclusion out of the words that totalitarian war must be waged against ship and crew, and by the reference to bomb war. His interpretation may be explained by the fresh impression of the bombing of Luebeck which he had just experienced. The other listeners did not share this interpretation; in fact, they did not even think of it. This is evident according to the deposition of three persons who have heard the address. The further assertion of Heisig that an officer unknown to him had taught him, on an unknown occasion, that one should order the men below deck when exterminating shipwrecked people, I consider as an improvisation of his phantasy, which appears to be easily excited. If such had really been the case, then such astonishing an occurrence, which would have been in contradiction with all educational principles of the navy, would have made such an impression on a young officer that he would have conserved some recollection of the full circumstances of such an instruction.

The testimony of Kovettenkapitaen (Lt. Comdr.) Moehle must be taken much more seriously. Because he had—there is no doubt about it—at least hinted to a few submarine commanders that the "Laconia" order demands or at least approves of the killing of shipwrecked. Moehle received this interpretation neither from Admiral Doenitz himself nor from the chief of staff nor from the first assistant, Fregatten Kapitaen (Commander) Hessler; that means from none of the officers who alone would have been authorized to transmit such an interpretation to the chief of a flotilla. How Moehle actually arrived at this interpretation has not found any explanation by the trial in my opinion. He maintains for a fact that Kovettenkapitaen Kuppisch from the staff of the BDU (Commander of the Submarines) had told him the story of "U 386," a boat, the commander of which had been reprimanded for not having shot Allied airmen drifting in a rubber boat. This explanation of Moehle cannot be correct. It is proven beyond any doubt by the war diary and by witnesses that the commander of "U 386" had been reprimanded because he did not take on board the airmen concerned and bring them back. The whole affair with "U 386," furthermore, took place a year after the "Laconia" incident in September 1943 and Korv. Kapitaen Kuppisch who was supposed to have told it had already been killed in action as U-boat commander in August 1943.

It is not for me to discuss how Moehle actually came to give his instruction about the "Laconia" order.

One thing, at any rate, has been proved, Admiral Doenitz and his staff had not caused this briefing to be given nor did they know anything about it. Considering the frequent personal contacts between the U-boat commanders and the staff of the commander of the U-boats, this can only be explained by the fact that the few commanders who Moehle thus briefed did not take his words seriously.

DEFENSE

Is Admiral Doenitz now responsible for this interpretation of the "Laconia" order, given by Moehle? Criminal responsibility presupposes in the first place some kind of guilt, i.e., the possibility to foresee the result. Considering the close contact with his flotilla chiefs and commanders, for whom alone the "Laconia" order was intended, Admiral Doenitz could not foresee that a flotilla chief could give such an interpretation to that order without making any attempt for clearing it up with the commander of the U-boats. Such a conduct is beyond anything that could reasonably be expected. Therefore, any guilt is excluded. Criminal responsibility requires another criterion, namely, results must be proved. This also is entirely lacking. The Prosecution has not even made a serious attempt to prove that one of the commanders, briefed by Moehle in that direction, actually shot once at shipwrecked.

As far as we are informed, such a case happened only once in this war, in the case of Kapitaen-Leutnant (Lt. sen. grade) Eck. It is significant that this case was not presented by the Prosecution, but by the defense.

The conduct of Eck has nothing whatsoever to do with the "Laconia" order as the Prosecution wants it understood. It was not concerned with the destruction of human lives, but with the removal of wreckage and floats from which the Allied airplanes could deduce the presence of a German U-boat in this area. For this conduct two of his officers together with him have been condemned to death and hereby punished with a severity which will not be understood any more in normal times.

The two cases, presented by the Prosecution, in which shipwrecked allegedly have been shot at are so obviously unsuitable for proving this accusation that I need not deal with it any further. The testimony about the sinking of the "Noreen Mary" bears the stamp of phantasy in various points and, in the case of the attack on the "Antonico," the intention to destroy shipwrecked is out of question because all was over in 20 minutes and the night was dark.

I was in the fortunate position to present to the Tribunal a compilation of the Naval Warfare Command concerning a dozen cases in which Allied forces had allegedly shot at German shipwrecked. It appears to me that every one of these instances is better than that of the Prosecution and some appear rather convincing. I value, therefore, all the more the sober attitude taken up by the Naval War Command of these cases when giving their opinion on these cases to the Fuehrer's Headquarters.

It namely points out that—

1. Part of the incidents occurred during combat operations.
2. Shipwrecked, swimming in the water, might easily believe that a miss on other targets is aimed at them.
3. So far, no written or verbal order by any command for the use of arms against shipwrecked had been traced.

I can only request that these principles are applied also to the incidents presented by the Prosecution.

In the same written opinion to the Fuehrer's Headquarters, the Naval Warfare Command rejects reprisals by destroying enemy shipwrecked; that was on 14 September 1942, 3 days before the "Laconia order." As the latter came to the knowledge of the Naval Warfare Command as a wireless order, it would doubtlessly have been canceled in accordance with the opposite viewpoint just expressed to Fuehrer's Headquarters, if it had been understood as an order for the shooting of shipwrecked.

And now I am coming to the positive counter-evidence against the opinion of the Prosecution. It consists, in the first place, of the number of the rescued allied sailors. It amounted, according to a survey of the British Minister of Transport in 1943, to 87 per cent of the crews. Such a result is simply not compatible with an order for destruction.

Further on, it has been established that Grand Admiral Doe-nitz in 1943, that is, after the "Laconia" order, rejected all considerations of actions against shipwrecked.

In a written opinion given to the Foreign Office on 4 April 1943, a directive to the U-boats to take action against lifeboats or shipwrecked was considered unbearable by the Naval Warfare Command, as it was against the innermost feeling of every sailor.

In June 1943 the Grand Admiral, when receiving reports from Lieutenant Commander Witt about British aviators shooting at the shipwrecked of submarines, most decidedly rejected the idea to attack the foe who had become defenseless in combat, as it was incompatible with our principles of warfare.

Summing up, I am convinced that the assertion of the Prosecution that German submarines had received an order to murder the shipwrecked has been strikingly disproved. The Grand Admiral Doenitz stated here that he had never allowed to endanger the spirit of his submarine men by mean acts. With losses from 70 to 80 per cent, he could only replenish his troops with volunteers if he kept the fight clean, in spite of its being tough. And, if the Tribunal remembers the declaration of the 67 commanders in British captivity, it will have to admit that he created a bearing and a spirit which survived the defeat.

DEFENSE

I have endeavored to present to the Tribunal the most important facts and several legal considerations regarding naval warfare, so as to clarify the most important problems discussed here from the point of view of the defense.

The problem concerns the examination of the behavior of admirals in naval warfare, and the question of what is permissible according to international law is most closely connected with what is necessary according to the military standpoint. I, therefore, in examining this point of the indictment deeply regret that the Charter of this Tribunal deprives the accused officers of a privilege guaranteed them by the Geneva Convention, i.e., the passing of judgment by a military tribunal making use of the laws and regulations applicable to its own officers. According to article 3 of the Charter, I am not allowed to question the competency of this Tribunal. I can therefore only request the Tribunal to make up for the unfairness that I see in the above-mentioned article of the Charter by applying the same standards where military evaluation and moral justification of actions of these German admirals is concerned as the Tribunal would apply to admirals of their own countries. A soldier, due to his practical knowledge of procedure in warfare, not only of the part of his own country but also of the adversary, is keenly perceptive of the dividing line between combat and war crimes. He knows that the interpretation of international law concerning what is allowed or forbidden in naval warfare is decisively governed by the interests of his country. An insular power like Great Britain, having long and sensitive sea lanes and a strong surface fleet, has always looked at these questions from a different angle than the continental powers. The attitude of the United States, from the renunciation of submarine warfare by the Root Resolution of 1922 to the unrestricted submarine warfare against Japan in 1941, reveals how a change in strategic position entails also a change in legal evaluation. No one can know to what degree the development of air forces and the efficacy of bombs will increasingly force navies under water and render obsolete all previous conceptions of submarine warfare. (Comp. e.g. "Submarines in the

Atomic Era" in New York Herald Tribune, European Ed., 27 April 1946, p. 2.)

For a naval officer these are obvious reflections and they should prevent a man of law from settling controversial questions of law and policy pertaining to naval war at the expense of those whose professional duty it is to direct navies.

In the first world war German submarine war was accompanied by a storm of indignation. It seems significant to me that the English historian Bell judges in these very days, in a paper intended only for official use of the Foreign Office, the right to such indignation, as follows:

"It is an old rule of military honor never to belittle the deeds of an enemy who has put up a stiff and brave fight. If this rule had been followed in England, the public would better appreciate the place which the war between submarines and commerce will occupy in the history of strategy and of the war. It is unfortunate that the cries of terror as well as the unseemly insults of journalists were repeated by responsible people, with the result that the slogans, 'piracy' and 'murder,' entered the vocabulary and have engendered the corresponding feelings in the hearts of the people." (A. C. Bell, Historical Section, Committee of Imperial Defense, "A History of the Blockade of Germany and of the Countries Associated with Her in the Great War, 1914-1918." Before the introduction is a notation: "This history is confidential and for official use only." Quoted from the German edition by Boehmert. "The English Hunger Blockade in the World War," Essen, 1943.)

I am now to treat further the other points of the indictment against Grand Admiral Doenitz which are not concerned with naval war. To begin with, there is the charge of preparation of aggressive wars. It is known how much this very accusation is being contradicted by the professional officers of probably all allied countries. In answer to such attacks in public, Justice Jackson formulated for the press (4 December 1945, "Stars and Stripes," European Ed., vom. 5 December 1945), the ideas of the Prosecution regarding this subject as follows:

"I have made it clear that we do not prosecute these militarists because they served their country, but because they dominated it and lead it into war. Not because they conducted the war, but because they have been driving to war."

If this standard is used to weigh the charge, then, for the defense of Grand Admiral Doenitz against the charge of preparing aggressive wars, I need only point to the result of the evidence. At the beginning of the war he was a relatively young commander; his only task was the training and instruction of submarine crews. He did not belong to the General Staff in the meaning of the indictment and did not participate in any of the addresses which were presented here as proof of war intentions. The charge that he had advocated the occupation of submarine bases in Norway is likewise disproved.

DEFENSE

The same applies to the allegation that in 1943 he had proposed an attack upon Spain in order to capture Gibraltar. The conquest of Gibraltar against the will of Spain was absolutely impossible and out of question during the entire war and especially so in 1943.

For Germany the war had reached the stage of defense, yes, even of dangerous setbacks on all fronts at the time when Admiral Doenitz was appointed Supreme Commander of the Navy on 1 February 1943. This fact may be significant for the participation in the so-called conspiracy. The Prosecution is not very clear about the precise moment at which they want to fix the beginning of the responsibility of participation. In the indictment of individuals (App. A of the Indictment), intimate connections with Hitler since 1932 are mentioned. This, however, is ostensibly an error. Admiral Doenitz became acquainted with Hitler only in the fall of 1943 on the occasion of submitting a military report; and in the following years talked to him briefly, and always only about military problems, altogether eight times and never alone. Since, aside from this fact, the defendant never belonged to any organization which is accused of conspiracy by the Prosecution, I see no connection of any kind to this conspiracy prior to 1 February 1943.

The more important is the question of retroaction for joining the conspiracy as has been illustrated by the British prosecutor by the example of the railroad assassins. This idea of guilt, retroactive on past events, is very difficult to absorb for the German jurist. The continental concept of law is reflected by the formulation of Hugo Grotius: "To participate in a crime a person must not only have knowledge of it, but also the opportunity to prevent it."

Considering that the entire legal concept of the conspiracy represents a special creation of Anglo-Saxon justice in our eyes, then this applies even more so to the retroaction of the so-called conspiracy. A judgment laying claim to international validity, one which should be understood by the peoples of Europe and especially by the Germans, must be based upon generally recognized principles of law. This, however, is not the case regarding a retroactive guilt.

To what extent such a legal construction may seem purposeful in combating certain typical crimes, they seem to me entirely inapplicable to the review of events such as are being discussed here.

Admiral Doenitz became the Supreme Commander of the Navy in the course of a normal military career, entirely free of politics. The appointment was based upon the proposal of his predecessor, Grand Admiral Raeder, for whom the proved abilities in the direction of U-boat warfare alone were decisive. An acceptance of the appointment was not required just as little as on the occasion of the appointment to any other military position. Admiral Doenitz entertained the only thought, as any officer might well have done in a similar position, that is, the question whether he would be equal to the task and whether he could accomplish it in the best interest of the navy and of the people. All other considerations which the Prosecution apparently expected of him during this period, namely, the legitimacy of the Party program and of the policy of the Party from 1922 on, as well as of the German internal and foreign policy since 1933, can but be fictions; they have nothing to do with the facts. Fictions of such nature are not limited by time nor by reality. Is the responsibility for past measures, on taking over a high position to extend only to acts of the present cabinet, or is it to extend to acts of former cabinets and up to what period? Is it to include internal and foreign policy of one's own country or also of those of one's allies? Such considerations are logical and cannot be refuted; however, they lead to unacceptable results, and show the impracticability of the idea of retroaction regarding the so-called conspiracy.

Only to measure by exact standards the participation in such a conspiracy is difficult enough if events not of a criminal, but of a military and political nature are involved. Of what meaning are such concepts as "voluntary accession" and "knowledge of the common plan" when in times of the greatest danger an officer assumes the task to prevent the collapse of the sea warfare?

Even the Prosecution seems to realize this. For, corresponding to their general idea, they attempt to link Admiral Doenitz with the conspiracy in a political way. This is accomplished by the assertion that he became a member of the Reich Cabinet by reason of his appointment to the Supreme Command of the Navy. This allegation is based upon the decree whereby the Commanders in Chief of the Army and of the Navy were invested with the rank of Reich Minister and upon the order of Hitler were to participate in the Cabinet meetings.

DEFENSE

It is evident that one is not actually a Reich Minister merely by being invested with the rank of Reich Minister. Also, he is not a member of the Cabinet, if one is only permitted to participate in it upon special orders. This implies exactly that he was only to be consulted on professional problems, but never had the authority to gather information about other departments. One can not, however, speak of a political task and, consequently, of a political responsibility without the existence of such an authority. For an activity as a minister, any legal basis is lacking. According to the German compulsory service law, there existed for the entire Wehrmacht but one minister, the Reich War Minister. This position remained unoccupied after the resignation of General Field Marshal v. Blomberg. The business of the Ministry was conducted by the Chief of the High Command of the Wehrmacht. A new Ministry was not created, neither for the Army nor for the Navy. The Commanders in Chief of the Army and of the Navy, therefore, would have had to be ministers without portfolio. Since, however, they headed a department, namely, the army and the navy, such an appointment would have constituted a contradiction to all usages of the state law. The task to countersign such laws, in which the minister participates within his jurisdiction, is to be considered as the basic symbol of all ministerial activity.

There is not a single law which has been countersigned by the Supreme Commander of the Navy. I have shown this to the Tribunal by the example of the Prize laws. That is to say that, even by and rather because of taking into consideration of the legal standards of a democratic system, the Supreme Commander of the Navy cannot be designated as a member of the Reich Cabinet, because he lacked all authority of participation in legislative acts and every collective responsibility for policies assumed. His task was and remained a military one even though, for reasons of etiquette, he was put on an equal basis in rank with other Reich ministers.

The Prosecution realized that a Reich Government in the constitutional sense no longer existed during the war and, consequently, states that the actual governing was carried out by those who participated in the discussions of the situation in the Fuehrer Headquarters.

As all witnesses examined here stated, it was dealt here with events of a purely military nature, where incoming reports were presented, military measures discussed, and military orders issued. Questions of foreign policy were mentioned exceptionally, only if they had any connection with military problems; they were, however, never discussed and no decision was rendered on them in these Fuehrer's conferences on the situation. Internal policy and the security system was not on the plan for discussion at all. In so far as non-soldiers participated, they were attendants who gathered information for their respective departments. The SS Reichsfuehrer or his deputy were present for the Command of Waffen SS and during the last year of war also for the reserve Army.

The Grand Admiral always participated in these Fuehrer conferences when he was at the Fuehrer's Headquarters. Notes taken down by whoever accompanied him on all these meetings and discussions of the Supreme Commander are all in possession of the Prosecution. As the Prosecution has not presented a single one of these notes, from which it would appear that the Supreme Commander participated in reporting on or in decisions of affairs of political nature, one can assume that such notes do not exist. Thus, the testimony of witnesses has been confirmed, according to which the Fuehrer conferences had nothing to do whatever with governing in a political sense, but were an instrument of purely military leadership.

Therefore, an overall responsibility of the Grand Admiral for all events that happened and occurred since 1943, and which, in the course of this trial, have been denoted as criminal, does not exist. Consequently, I shall deal only with those individual allegations by which the Prosecution tries to directly connect Admiral Doenitz with the conspiracy. To proceed on that way, I believe I am the more justified, as a short time ago the Tribunal denied me the right of cross-examination of witnesses in the Katyn case with the argument that no one was accusing Admiral Doenitz in connection with the Katyn case. I conclude herefrom that, at any rate, in the eyes of the Tribunal, he is accused of such cases only wherein he allegedly directly participated.

To begin with, this applies to the Fuehrer's order for the extermination of sabotage commandos, dated 18 October 1942. The Prosecution has tried to establish that this order had been expounded to Admiral Doenitz in detail, together with all possible objections, shortly after his assumption of the position of Commander-in-Chief of the Navy. It has failed to establish such a claim. In fact, Doenitz, as he himself admits, did read or had explained to him the order in question, in fall 1942, in his capacity of commander of submarines, and in the same form in which the front commanders received it. I do not wish to speak here of the circumstances which led to objections against this order on the part of the OKW. Indeed, not all these circumstances could be discernible to one who received this order at the front. For such a one it was a matter of reprisal against saboteurs who were only externally soldiers, but did not fight according to the regulations which are binding on soldiers. Whether such reprisals were admissible at all according to the Geneva Convention, and to what extent, was not capable of being judged nor did it fall within the competence of the recipient of the order. Any superior officer, at any rate, has probably recognized that the order not to grant any pardon and to deliver such persons, in certain cases, to the SD, was in itself an offense against the rules of war. However, as the essence of any reprisal is to avenge a wrong on the part of the enemy with wrong on one's own part, such recognition does not prove anything concerning the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the reprisal order. If no one but the government of the state is competent to order reprisals, then hundreds or thousands of German officers cannot be required today to consider themselves likewise competent, and to presume to verify orders whose actual and legal bases were entirely unknown to them. In this case the principle prevails, at least for the front commander, that the subordinate may, when in doubt, rely on the order as given. (Hugo Grotius, De jure pacis ac belli, Book II, Chap. XXVI, par. 4. "He can believe that in a matter of doubt he must obey his superior.")

DEFENSE

Now, the Prosecution seems to be of the opinion that Admiral Doenitz, a few months later, when he had become Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, had the opportunity and also the obligation to inform himself as to the basis of the order issued by the command. This requirement fails to recognize the duties of a commander-in-chief of the navy. He has to wage naval war. The whole German naval war, especially the submarine war, was, in the spring of 1943, owing to huge losses inflicted by the enemy air force, on the verge of collapse. These were the worries with which the new commander-in-chief had to cope in addition to an abundance of new problems concerning the navy which were coming up. How can one require such a man, as in the quietest of times, to cope with an order of remote date which had nothing whatever to do with naval warfare. On the contrary, a special paragraph explicitly excluded prisoners taken during naval operations.

I must insert something concerning the circumstances of giving command. The naval units were under the control of the naval command only in those matters which belonged to the duties of the navy, i.e., naval warfare and artillery coast defense.

Concerning so-called territorial questions, they were not subordinate to the naval warfare command to the Wehrmacht commander of the theater of war in which their basis was established. Orders concerning such measures of war on land were given without any collaboration on the part of the naval warfare command, and their execution was not reported to it. Just as hardly anyone can think seriously of holding a general responsible for the German submarine war, just so little in my opinion does it seem justified to hold an admiral responsible for orders given in land warfare.

Such a routine for territorial duties also explains the complete ignorance of the Admiral of the fleet and of his colleagues in the naval warfare command about the delivery to the Security Service of the crew of the Norwegian torpedo boat MTB 345 after their capture by units of Admiral von Schrader. As demonstrated by the depositions of the witnesses and the records of the Oslo war crimes court, the naval warfare command received only a combat report concerning the capture of the vessel and the number of prisoners. Any further details, the discovery on board of material for sabotage and of civilian suits, the finding of sabotage orders, and the treatment of the crew as saboteurs according to the order given by the command, were dealt with as a territorial matter between Admiral v. Schrader and the Wehrmacht commanding officer for Norway. The decision concerning the fate of the crew came from the Fuehrer headquarters in reply to a question of Gauleiter Terboven. Not only there is no evidence that the naval warfare command took part in these territorial questions, but this must be considered as refuted according to the evidence submitted and of the chain of command which has been demonstrated.

I consider as the second attempt of the prosecution to establish a participation in the so-called conspiracy for committing war crimes, the submitting of Admiral Wagner's record concerning the withdrawal from the Geneva convention in spring 1945. According to this, the Fuehrer pointed out in a discussion of the situation on February 2 that the enemy propaganda concerning the good treatment of prisoners of war clearly influenced the units fighting on the Western front, and that many cases of going over to the enemy were being reported. He ordered an examination of the question of a withdrawal from the Geneva convention. Thus, he wanted to convince his own soldiers that they could no more rely upon good treatment as prisoners of war, and to create accordingly a reaction against the enemy propaganda. Two days later Hitler reverted to this idea, but now another reason was put into the foreground. He defined the enemy warfare in the East and the bomb attacks on the German civilian population as a downright renunciation of international law by the enemy, and desired, on his side, to free himself from any obligations by withdrawing from the Geneva convention. Once more, he wanted the Wehrmacht's opinion and addressed himself directly to the Grand Admiral. The latter did not answer. The point of view of the military leaders on this matter was unanimously in the negative.

DEFENSE

On the next day, and preceding the discussion of the situation, a 10-minute conversation took place between Grand Admiral Doenitz, Colonel General Jodl and Ambassador Hewel; in the course of this conversation Doenitz expressed his negative attitude. According to the notes of Admiral Wagner he said that "it would be better to take the measures considered to be necessary without previous announcement and to save, at any rate, one's face before the world."

The Prosecution perceives herein the readiness and the design to expose hundreds of thousands of Allied prisoners of war to arbitrary murder.

Admiral Doenitz himself does not remember any such sentence. This is not surprising, as there is no question of a record, but of a condensation of a long conversation into four sentences. The precise wording was done the day after the conversation only, by Admiral Wagner. The latter declares himself that the Grand Admiral had disapproved of any "wild measures" which were apt to put us in the wrong from the beginning, and had considered as permissible only such measures which, according to the enemy's attitude, were actually justified and imperative in each case. As Wagner, the author of the transcript, should know himself best what he meant with this, I personally cannot add anything to this declaration. The interpretation of the Prosecution is not supported by any other circumstances. There was no question at all of keeping any measures secret. They would have to be made known, no matter whether they were meant to deter our own deserters or to make reprisals.

Wagner's note does not mention anything about any kind of concrete measures to be taken, and all witnesses that were present at this "Fuehrerlage" (discussion on the situation in Hitler's Hq.) state that not a word was spoken about that subject. The idea to kill prisoners of war could therefore not possibly occur to any of the participants in the discussion noted down by Wagner.

Now it came to light, by the statements of the defendants Ribbentrop and Fritzsche, that Hitler evidently, besides the action concerning the generals, had prepared another one in which only Goebbels and Himmler were to participate and which by chance came to Ribbentrop's knowledge. In this action the shooting of thousands of prisoners of war seems to have been taken into consideration as a reprisal against the air attack on Dresden. Hitler, very wisely, did not utter a murmur indicating such ideas to the generals. This action was not taken up any further and reprisals were not executed.

And now I come back to facts. It is a fact that Admiral Doenitz disapproved of the leaving the Geneva Convention and that Hitler, owing to the attitude of all military leaders, who clearly opposed it, did not follow up the idea any more. It is a fact that no measures violating international law were taken by the Germans as result of the remark criticized by the Prosecution, and it is lastly a fact that the enemy sailors who were made prisoners were grouped in a prisoner-of-war camp of the navy and that they were treated in an exemplary way to the last day of the war.

Who in his own department behaved as Doenitz did with regard to prisoners of war of the navy, may reasonably not be charged with having thrown overboard all standards of law and morals with regard to prisoners of war. As certified by an English commander, when the prisoner-of-war camp of the navy was taken over by British troops, all prisoners without exception said that they had been treated with "fairness and consideration." The Tribunal will no doubt appreciate such unanimous statements after what, in these proceedings, otherwise has been heard of failures in the treatment of prisoners of war, and not only on the German side.

If I now occupy myself with the conspiracy to commit crimes against humanity, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that Admiral Doenitz is not accused by Article 4 for directly having committed crimes against humanity. In the individual accusation, not even participation in the conspiracy to commit crimes against humanity was intended. That, I would say, is the admission that there is, in fact, no relation between his activity and the crimes against humanity spoken of by the Prosecution. Nevertheless, the Prosecution has presented some documents which should prove a participation in the responsibility for certain crimes against humanity.

In judging these documents, the most important question is again and again: What did Admiral Doenitz know of these crimes?

To this subject I should like to clear up one point. During the whole war he lived at his staff headquarters, first on North Sea coast, since 1940 in France, and in 1943 for a short time in Berlin and then in the camp "Koralle" near Berlin. When he was at the Fuehrer Headquarters, he lived with the navy staff there. Off duty he associated almost exclusively with naval officers. This may have been a weakness, but it is a fact which explains the lack of knowledge about certain occurrences.

DEFENSE

The fact that the defendant forwarded a proposition of the Ministry for armaments to employ 12,000 men from concentration camps as workers in the shipyards proves for the Prosecution that Admiral Doenitz knew and approved of the arrest of countless innocent people and their ill-treatment and killing in concentration camps.

He actually knew, of course, that concentration camps existed and he also knew that, besides the professional criminals, people arrested for political crimes were kept there. As already explained here, the keeping in custody of political adversaries for reasons of safety is a mode of acting executed by all states in times of danger. Knowledge of such an institution can therefore incriminate nobody. However, an unusually high number—out of proportion with the number of the population—of political arrestees may stamp a regime to a regime of terror. Taking into account a population of 80 million and the 5th year of a grim war, even twice or three times the number of 12,000 men mentioned by Admiral Doenitz would not yet be the sign of a regime of terror.

The Prosecution will hardly want to assert this. He has stated here as a witness that the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, as well as his collaborators and the overwhelming part of the German people, did not know of the abuses and killings that occurred in concentration camps. All that the prosecution put forward against this are assumptions, but no proofs.

I will therefore, to this point, only refer to the statement of the then Minister for Armaments, Speer, according to which the inmates of concentration camps were much better off than in camp, when they worked in industry and that these jobs were much desired. The proposition forwarded, therefore, did not signify anything inhuman, on the contrary, rather the opposite.

In the same proposition there is a suggestion to take energetic measures against sabotage in Norwegian and Danish shipyards where seven of eight new constructions had been the victims. If needs be the personnel should be entirely or in part replaced by "CC workers." Because, so it says, a sabotage of such dimensions can only be possible if all the workers silently condone it. We have here a proposition for security measures in which workers who actively or passively participated in sabotage are kept in a camp close to the shipyard whereby their connection to sabotage agents was to be cut off. I do not believe that juridical objections can be raised against such measures of security.

According to the practice of all occupation troops even collective punishment measures would be justified in such cases. (cf. Wheaton's International Law, 5th Ed. Page 543/54.)

Actually, the proposed measures were never carried out, and the Prosecution very likely presents them only for the purpose of bringing against Admiral Doenitz a general accusation of brutal attitude towards the inhabitants of occupied territories. For this purpose, it even refers to a statement of the Fuehrer at a conference on the military situation in summer 1944, according to which terror in Denmark must be fought with terror. The only part Admiral Doenitz had in this statement was that he heard it and that his companion, Admiral Wagner, wrote it down. The Navy had no part in it, nor did it take any measures as result of it.

In contrast to this line of evidence submitted by the Prosecution, I should like to emphasize the attitude which Admiral Doenitz actually showed towards the population of the occupied territories. There is before the Tribunal a survey concerning the administration of justice by the Naval Court for the protection of the inhabitants of the occupied territories against excesses of members of the Navy. The survey is based on an examination of about 2,000 delicts, and part of the judgments rendered are given together with circumstances and reason. Judging from that, one can fairly say that the Naval Courts protected the inhabitants in the West as well as in the East with justice and strictness, that is to say, lives as well as property and the honor of women.

This meeting out of justice was constantly supervised by the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy as the highest legal authority. According to court regulations, he was competent for the confirmation of death penalties meted out to German soldiers.

The shortness of time does not permit one to go into detail with these judgments. What is formulated in one of them applies to all: All soldiers must know that also in occupied territory life and property of others will be fully safeguarded. This was the general attitude in the Navy and the severity of the penalties inflicted proves how seriously it was taken.

I need say only a few words concerning the order of spring 1945, in which a German prisoner of war, an NCO, was presented as an example, because he had in a prison camp unobtrusively and according to plan had communists liquidated, who attracted attention. As Wagner recalled, it was actually the liquidation of an informer. But the facts were camouflaged in the manner mentioned in order not to give enemy intelligence any clue as to the camp and the person of the NCO. That this order in its true principle was capable of being justified cannot be doubted by anyone, in view of the enormous number of political murders which have been committed with the toleration or assistance of governments engaged in the war and the perpetrators of which are today extolled as heroes. I cannot, however, seriously consider that the unfortunate camouflaged wording could be proof of a general plan to liquidate communists. An order issued for the protection of communists will reveal the true circumstances.

DEFENSE

A sergeant had stolen in a hospital blankets which were intended for Soviet prisoners of war and had broken out a dead prisoner's gold teeth. This sergeant was condemned to death by a naval court and executed after the sentence had been confirmed by the commander-in-chief. Finally, the Prosecution also established a connection with the Jewish question through a statement in which the Grand Admiral speaks of the "lingering poison of Jewry." Here I wish to say:

Doenitz knew as little of the plan for the destruction of the Jews as he did of its execution. He knew of the evacuation to the Government General of Jews living in Germany. I do not think that this evacuation can be condemned at a time when deportations of Germans on a much larger scale are taking place before the eyes of a world silently looking on. Here, too, I refer to a sentence of long penitentiary terms against two German sailors. Together with some Frenchmen, they had robbed French Jews. From the opinion of the court, I again quote a sentence which characterizes the general attitude: "That the crimes were committed against Jews does not excuse the defendants in any way."

In the same way, it seems to me that the efforts of the Prosecution to include Admiral Doenitz in their interpretation of conspiracy by way of the so-called fanatical Nazi have failed.

He was neither a member of the Party nor was he ever politically prominent until his promotion to Commander-in-Chief of the Navy. The assertion of the Prosecution that he became Commander-in-Chief of the Navy because of his political attitude is without any foundation. He had no reason to participate in National Socialism afterwards, because to him, as a professional officer, every political activity was forbidden according to the Compulsory Service Law. However, he, too, like millions of other Germans, recognized the unique success of Hitler's conduct in social and economic fields and, of course, also the liberation from the obligations of Versailles, which concerned him as a soldier especially. Therefore, he served entirely without political activism but in loyalty to the National Socialist State when he received his promotion to commander-in-chief.

Therewith, two new elements arose in his relations to National Socialism. There was first his personal contact with Adolf Hitler. Like almost everyone else who had personal connection with this man, he, too, was most deeply impressed. To the respect for the Head of the State, and faith to the Supreme Commander, which the professional officer is trained in, was added the admiration for the statesman and strategist. It is difficult to understand completely such an attitude from the information as conveyed by this trial. I neither feel qualified nor capable to judge a personality like Adolf Hitler. But one thing seems certain, namely, that with the art of an expert he skillfully concealed the camouflage—from the human standpoint, objectionable traits of character—from those of his coworkers to whom he did not dare to reveal this part of his nature. The Hitler with whom the new Commander-in-Chief of the Navy became acquainted at that time and whom he venerated was therefore entirely different from the one which the world—rightly or wrongly—sees today.

The second new element in the relations between the grand admiral and National Socialism consisted in the fact that in the performance of his military duties he necessarily came in contact with the political authorities of the Reich. Whether he needed more men, more ships, or more arms it was in the end always political authorities with whom he had to discuss matters. In order to be successful in his demands, it was necessary that all political mistrust be eliminated at the very start. He did this intentionally and demanded the same of his subordinates. To him the Party was not an ideological factor, but rather the actual representative of the political power. He was linked with it in the common aim to win the war. For the achievement of this aim, he considered it as his ally. But, for the advantages which one expects of an ally, one must be willing to make certain sacrifices and to overlook certain faults and to ignore controversies.

The connection with the Fuehrer, however, and the contact with the Party which were concomitants of his position and of his duties as a Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, never led him to participate in anything for which he could not assume the responsibility before his conscience. Exactly some points of the prosecution prove this. The Fuehrer demanded action against the shipwrecked; Admiral Doenitz rejected it. The Fuehrer was for withdrawal from the Geneva Convention; Admiral Doenitz was against it. He stubbornly and successfully resisted the Party's influence upon the Armed Forces. Thanks to his resistance, the National-Socialist educational officers (Fuehrungsoffiziere) did not become political commissars, but were as genuine officers merely advisers to their commander, who retained the sole responsibility of leadership of his unit. The transfer of proceedings against soldiers on political grounds from the military courts to the people's courts (Volksgerichtshof), which had been advocated by the Party, was prevented by Admiral Doenitz until the winter of 1944-45 and afterwards, in spite of a Fuehrer order, never carried out in the Navy. Thus, he never identified himself with the Party and, therefore, certainly cannot be held responsible for its ideological endeavors or its excesses no more than in foreign politics a government would be ready to assume the responsibility for such things committed by an ally.

DEFENSE

I do not by any means want to give the impression that Admiral Doenitz was not a National Socialist.

To the contrary, I want to exactly use him as an example to prove the incorrectness of the thesis that every National Socialist as such must be a criminal. This Tribunal is the sole instance where authoritative personalities of the allied chief powers are occupying themselves intensively with the last 12 years of the German past. It is, therefore, the only hope of very many Germans for the removal of a fatal error which caused the weaker characters of our nation to become hypocrites and thus prove a decisive obstacle on the road to political recovery. When, after these explanations, I am entering into particulars of the charge that Admiral Doenitz had, out of political fanaticism, protracted the inevitable surrender, then I am doing so because of a particular reason. This charge, which does not seem to have anything to do with the indictment before an international tribunal, weighs particularly heavy in the eyes of the German people. This nation truly knows what destructions and what losses it has yet endured in the months from February until May 1945. I submitted declarations of Darlan, Chamberlain, and Churchill from the year 1940, in which these statesmen in a critical hour of their country called for desperate resistance, for the defense of every village and of every house. Nobody will conclude therefrom that these men were fanatical National Socialists. The question of unconditional surrender is, indeed, of such colossal import for a nation that, in fact, it is possible only after the events to judge whether a statesman who had to face this question did or did not do the right thing. Admiral Doenitz, however, was not a statesman in February 1945, but the supreme commander of the navy. Should he have requested his subordinates to lay down arms at a time when the political authority of the state still considered military resistance as opportune and necessary? Nobody will demand this in earnest.

To me, the question appears to be far more difficult, whether he, whom Hitler esteemed so much should not have had the duty to point out to Hitler with all due clearness the hopelessness of a prolonged resistance.

Personally, I would be inclined to affirm such a duty towards his people, if he had himself considered at that time a surrender as justified. He has not done so, and has stated the reasons herefor. Surrender implies stopping the armies and stopping the population. The German army on the Eastern front—still more than 2 millions strong in February 1945—and the entire civilian population of the German eastern provinces would therefore have fallen into the hands of the Soviet armies and this, in a bitter cold winter month. Admiral Doenitz, therefore, was of opinion—shared by Colonel General Jodl—that the human losses occurring in such a manner would have been far greater than those which a protracting of the capitulation until the warmer season should of needs have caused. Only in future years, when more exact evidence concerning casualties of the army and of the civilian population, both before and after the surrender in the East and in the West, will be available, there will be a possibility to judge the objective truth of such an interpretation. But it may yet be said today that such arguments were exclusively founded upon a stern consciousness of responsibility for the life of German people.

The very same consciousness of responsibility caused him, after his assumption of the office of head of the state on May 1st 1945, to cease hostilities against the West, but to protract, on the contrary, the surrender to the East for a few days, days in which hundreds of thousands were able to escape in a Western direction. Since the moment when he got—to his own complete surprise—a political task, he has avoided with an intelligent hand a threatening chaos, has prevented desperate acts of masses without leaders, and has assumed responsibility for the German people, for the gravest action which a statesman can make at all. To come back to the beginning of the indictment, he has not done anything to start this war, but taken the decisive steps to end it.

Since that moment the German nation has learned much what it did not expect, and more than once the unconditional surrender, which the last head of the state has carried out, has been pointed out. It is for the Tribunal to decide whether, in the future, this nation will be referred to the binding value of the signature of a man who is being outlawed as a criminal, in front of the whole world, by his very partners in the treaty.

DEFENSE

In the beginning of my statement I have referred to the doubts which any trial against war criminals is bound to induce in the heart of any lawyer. They weigh upon everyone who bears a co-responsibility for such a trial. I could not better mark the task of all the responsible persons than by quoting the words coined by a British attorney about the trials before the German Reich court in the year 1921:

"The War Criminals' trials were demanded by an angry public rather than by statesmen or the fighting services. Had the public opinion of 1919 had its way, the trials might have presented a grim spectacle, of which future generations would be ashamed. But, thanks to the statesmen and the lawyers, a public yearning for revenge was converted into a real demonstration of the Majesty of Right and the Power of Law." (Claud Mullins, The Leipzig Trials, London, 1921.)

May the verdict of this Tribunal be valid in a similar way before the judgment of History.

2. FINAL PLEA by Karl Doenitz

I should like to say three things:

Firstly, you must judge the legality of the German submarine warfare, if your conscience dictates you to do so. I consider this conduct of the war to be justified, and I have acted according to my conscience. I would have to do exactly the same all over again. My subordinates, on the other hand, who have carried out my orders, have acted in the fullest confidence in me and without there being a shadow of doubt regarding the necessity and legality of these orders. In my opinion, no later judgment can deprive them of the trust in the honesty of a fight for which they voluntarily have made sacrifice after sacrifice until the last hour.

Secondly, much has been said here about a conspiracy which is alleged to have existed among the defendants. In my opinion, that assertion is a political dogma. As such it cannot be proved, but can only be believed or rejected. Considerable portions of the German people will never believe, however, that such a conspiracy could have been the cause of their disaster. Let politicians and jurists argue about it; they will only make it harder for the German people to secure for themselves the recognition from this trial of that which is decisive and important for its attitude regarding the past and the reconstruction of the future. That is the recognition that the Fuehrer principle as a political principle is wrong. With regard to the military leadership of all armies in this world, the Fuehrer principle has proved itself in the best possible way. On the strength of this recognition, I consider this also right with regard to political leadership, particularly in the case of a nation in the hopeless position in which the German people found itself in 1932. The great successes of this new government, an entirely new feeling of happiness on the part of the entire nation, seemed to prove it right. But if, in spite of all ideals, all decency, and all devotion on the part of the masses of the German people, no other final outcome has been achieved through the Fuehrer principle than the misfortune of this people, then that principle as such is wrong, wrong because apparently human nature is not strong enough to utilize the powers in that principle for a better end, without their falling victims to the temptation of that power.

Thirdly, my life was devoted to a mission and with that to the service for the German people. As the last Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy and as the last head of the State, I consider myself responsible for everything that I have done and left undone.

XV. ERICH RAEDER

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Walter Siemers, Defense Counsel.

Gentlemen of the Tribunal,

In my final pleading for the defendant Grand-Admiral Dr. Raeder, I should like to keep to the order I chose for my Document Book and for the whole presentation of evidence. I think a survey of the whole case will thus be easier.

Raeder, who has just turned 70 years of age, has been, ever since the age of 18, that is to say for half a century or so, and in an eventful period, exclusively a soldier, body and soul. Although he has never known anything but his duties as a soldier, the Prosecution has accused him, in this major Trial against National-Socialism, not only as soldier, namely as commander-in-chief of the German navy but—what is singular and decisive—as politician, as political conspirator and as Government member, altogether 3 things which he, in truth, never was.

I am, therefore, faced with the singular task of defending

DEFENSE

Raeder as politician, although it was precisely, as I shall demonstrate, his life principle to be completely detached from politics as officer, and to command an Officers' Corps and a navy which were likewise committed to remain entirely free from politics. If the Prosecution levels such manifold and grave accusations at Raeder, this is primarily due to the fact that they have constructed an entirely foreign notion of the German Wehrmacht namely the notion of an Admiral responsible for the foreign policy and for the outbreak of a war. I shall stand up against this conception and demonstrate that this conception is equally unjustified and unfounded as regards Hitler's National-Socialist State. True, Hitler has repeatedly placed politics in the forefront of the Nation, and endeavored to educate the Nation in one political direction only. Foreign countries know this, and they would therefore be all the more surprised by the fact that Hitler refrained from such political interference in one single instance. Every administration, every organization, and every police institution was run by Hitler on political principles with the single exception of the Wehrmacht. The Wehrmacht and indeed the navy in particular remained a long time and far into the War absolutely unpolitical, and not only did Hitler give Raeder an assurance to this effect, but Hindenburg as President had also given the same assurance. This explains the fact, which has also been made clear in this trial, that up to 1944 an officer could not be a member of the Party or suspended his membership if he were in the Party.

After I have made these preliminary reflections, it will be understood why Raeder, as shown by his interrogation, was disconcerted and amazed by these accusations which amount to a political charge. A man who is altogether soldier cannot understand why he is suddenly, and without any relation to his military duties, made responsible for things which at no time came within the compass of his activity.

I shall naturally discuss the military accusations, with the exception of the U-Boat warfare, which, for the sake of uniformity, has already received the attention of Dr. Kranzbuehler in his final speech for Raeder too.

It will be seen from other military accusations—as for instance, in the case of Norway and Greece — that time and again the discrepancy between the points of view of politics and of the military is the following: Raeder acted as Commander-in-Chief on the basis of military considerations, and the Prosecution calls him to account out of political considerations, thus considering military actions as political.

I

The first case of this discrepancy just described lies in the accusations which have been raised against Raeder already for the period before 1933, which means before National-Socialism. For this time the peculiarity has to be added that Hitler, the head of the alleged conspiracy for the waging of wars of aggression, does not even yet reign in Germany, and yet there is already supposed to exist a common conspiracy between Hitler and a part of the defendants. This is all the more surprising, as Raeder, as a naval officer and since 1928 as Chief of the Naval Command (Chef der Marineleitung), had at that time nothing, but really nothing, at all, to do with National-Socialism, and he did not even know Hitler and his coworkers in the Party. The accusations concerning the violations of the Versailles Treaty are included in the conspiracy by the Prosecution, although the violations were not carried out under Hitler's leadership, but under the leadership or with the approval of the then democratic governments in Germany. This shows that the indictment does not only want to hit National-Socialism with this trial, as has been emphasized again and again during the war and after the collapse, but, beyond it, it affects large circles in Germany who had nothing to do with National-Socialism and partly even were direct enemies of National-Socialism.

1. For just this reason it was so extraordinarily important for me, in the presentation of evidence in the Raeder case to clear up the question of the violation of the Treaty of Versailles in minute detail, and with the approval of the court I have tried to do this. I am of the firm opinion that I have succeeded. I do not need to discuss in detail the precisely treated infractions which the Prosecution has produced in document C-32. It should be sufficient if I refer to the extensive presentation of evidence, as well as the following facts:

Every single point was a mere trifle or else was a military measure, like for example, the antiaircraft batteries and such-like, which were based exclusively on ideas of defense. Raeder has plainly admitted that treaty infractions occurred, in which, however, the smallness of the infractions showed that these measures could not possibly be connected with an intention to wage a war of aggression. Going beyond this, I only need to point out that from the legal point of view a treaty violation cannot ipso jure be a crime. Surely the violation of a treaty between nations is no more permissible than the violation of a contract between private firms in commercial law. Such a violation is, however, not a punishable action, much less a crime. Also, according to the argument of the Prosecution an action would be punishable only if the violation were the result of a criminal intention, and so was aimed at aggressive war against the Kellogg Pact. However, the prosecution authorities themselves can no longer maintain this and have indirectly admitted it by no longer taking up these points during the cross-examination of witnesses.

DEFENSE

2. The case is somewhat different with the charge only discussed in detail by the Prosecution during cross-examination concerning the participation of the German navy in U-boat constructions in Holland, for which the Prosecution has relied upon C-156, the book by Naval captain Schuessler: "The Navy's Struggle Against Versailles," as well as on the statements contained in the notes of the naval historian, Admiral Assman, in document D-854.

These documents prove that the German navy had a part in a U-boat designing office in Holland, namely, the firm N. V. Ingenieurskantoor voor Scheepsbouw. This participation falls in the period before the navy was under Raeder's command; the court will recall that Raeder did not become head of the navy until 1 October 1928, whereas participation in the Holland designing office dates back to 1923 and the following years. I beg to note, however, that in not a single case was a U-boat built for the German navy and that consequently no U-boats were purchased or put into commission by the German navy, either. In this connection I refer to the Versailles Treaty, Raeder exhibit 1. In article 188 ff. of the Treaty of Versailles are the regulations about the navy. According to article 188 Germany had assumed the obligation of delivering her U-boats to the Allied Nations, or of dismantling them. This obligation Germany fulfilled completely. Moreover, article 191 stipulates the following:

"The construction and purchase of all underseas vessels, even for commercial purposes is forbidden in Germany."

It appears from this clear clause of the Treaty that the participation in Dutch firms was not a violation of the Treaty of Versailles. According to article 191, Germany was only forbidden to construct or purchase U-boats, moreover, strictly speaking, only in Germany. As a matter of fact, no U-boat was built in Germany against the Treaty. But as a matter of fact, no U-boat was built for Germany abroad, either. Participation in a foreign submarine designing office was not forbidden, nor was this the meaning of the Treaty of Versailles. The decisive point was merely that Germany did not create a submarine force. The navy, however, was permitted to participate in a designing office, so as to be kept informed in this way about the field of modern submarine construction and to gather information for the future, and thereby to lay the foundation for a possible construction of submarines later on, when permitted, by educating a technically trained cadre. (See Raeder Exhibit 2, Lohmann Affidavit under I.)

The above-mentioned documents, submitted by the Prosecution, prove that the submarines designed by the Dutch firm and built abroad were put into service abroad, namely in Turkey and by Finland.

Even if one takes the point of view that designing work also was prohibited, then what has been said in paragraph I is also valid here; the designing was limited to only a few submarines, so that the small number of them in itself proves that there cannot have been any intention to wage wars of aggression.

3. Even if the High Tribunal is unwilling to follow my preceding train of thought without more further development, going even beyond this, the lack of an aggressive intention appears from the fact that the trivial violations of the treaty are in a certain way compensated for, I take the liberty to refer to the second affidavit of Admiral Lohmann, Raeder Exhibit 8. It appears from this document that according to the Treaty of Versailles Germany was allowed to build 8 armored ships, but, however, only built 3 armored ships, and it appears further that instead of 8 cruisers, only 6 cruisers were built up to 1935, and instead of 32 destroyers or torpedo boats only 12 destroyers and no torpedo boats were built. As a matter of fact, the navy stayed far behind what was permitted by the Treaty of Versailles, with respect to the really important weapons, and especially in those which may be considered as weapons of offense and indeed to such an extent that in comparison the trivial violations in naval matters hardly count.

4. According to the Weimar Constitution of 11 August 1919, articles 47 and 50 (Raeder Exhibit 3) the President of the Reich has Supreme Command of all the armed forces. In order to be valid the decrees of the President of the Reich, require the counter-signature of the Chancellor of the Reich or the appropriate Reich Minister, and thus the Minister of National Defense. "Responsibility is assumed with the counter-signature." Thereby, in National law it is absolutely clear that the responsibility rests with the Minister of National Defense, that is, with the Reich Cabinet and the President of the Reich. It is, of course, true that before 1928, and so before Raeder became the responsible chief of the naval command, a few measures were taken without the knowledge of the Reich Cabinet. In the presentation of evidence, however, it has been clearly shown, especially by the statement of former Reich Minister Severing, that from the moment when Raeder became chief of the naval command, contrary to the statements of the Prosecution, no more secret measures were taken. Severing has confirmed that the Mueller—Stresemann—Severing Cabinet, in a Cabinet meeting of 18 October 1928, obtained a clear picture of the secret measures of the armed forces by interrogating Raeder as chief of the naval command and Heye as chief of the army command.

DEFENSE

Both Raeder and Heye, after they had given an explanation, were obliged by the Cabinet, in conformity with the above-mentioned paragraphs of the Reich Constitution, to take no measures in the future without the knowledge of the Minister of National Defense, that is, the Cabinet. At the same time the parliamentary cabinet established that the secret measures taken before Raeder's time were only a question of trifles and expressly assumed the responsibility for them. If, however, the Cabinet, in conformity with the Constitution, assumed the responsibility, this is a legally and constitutionally effective proceeding which exonerates Raeder as Chief of the Naval Command and relieves him of responsibility. It seems, therefore, inadmissible that the defendant, who no longer bears the responsibility, should be made responsible for actions for which the Cabinet assumed the responsibility.

The attitude of the Cabinet in the Cabinet meeting of 18 October 1928, however, further shows that all these actions cannot have any criminal intention to wage a war of aggression as their basis. For even the Prosecution will not want to assert that men like Stresemann, Mueller, and Severing had the intention of waging wars of aggression, but will have to believe Severing that Stresemann, Mueller, and himself only assumed responsibility for these violations because these violations were only based on ideas of defense. One will also have to believe Severing that thoughts of defense were justified, because in the twenties the danger actually existed that Germany would be attacked, for instance by Poland, and then would no longer be in a position to defend herself with the small armed forces allowed by the Treaty of Versailles, a danger which had shown itself particularly impressive by Polish border attacks in East Prussia and Silesia as well as by the occupation of Vilna, and which increased, when all attempts by Stresemann and Mueller failed to realize the intention of the other powers to disarm as promised in the Treaty of Versailles.

Mr. Justice Jackson admitted in his opening speech how difficult Germany's position was and how justified her defense measures were. He said literally:

"It may be that in the twenties and thirties Germany stood before desperately difficult problems, problems which would have justified the boldest measures, only not war."

I even will not go as far as Mr. Justice Jackson, but I believe that the measures taken by the navy are certainly covered by his own trend of ideas about the "boldest measures."

The British Prosecutor, Mr. Elwyn Jones, attempted during the cross-examination of Severing to prove that Raeder did not observe the obligations of the cabinet meeting of 18 October 1928, because Severing, according to his testimony was not informed of the construction abroad of the small submarines for Turkey and for Finland. Against this, two things must be considered:

a. During his testimony, Severing did not remember details, but only the fundamental and decisive questions, and moreover, he naturally relied on the competent technical minister, thus the Reichswehr Minister, concerning details.

b. According to Severing's testimony it was an exceptional case on 18 October 1928, when the Chief of the Navy High Command appeared before the entire cabinet. Raeder as Chief of the Navy High Command was not obliged to inform all the members of the cabinet from time to time, but was, in accordance to the Constitution, merely obliged to inform the incumbent Reichswehr Minister. But Raeder did this. Whatever the Reichswehr Minister on his part submitted then to the other members of the Cabinet and the Reichstag, is not only beyond Raeder's knowledge but is also not his responsibility. The Reichswehr Minister and the Cabinet bear the responsibility for this.

In conclusion, I take the liberty to point out only the following:

If, despite all this, the Prosecution wants to consider the discussed violations of the Treaty of Versailles on the part of the navy as an intention of aggression, the then incumbent Social Democratic or Democratic Government bears the responsibility for this.

With this the indictment collapses relating to this period. For to hold the then incumbent governments to account for the intention to wage wars of aggression would mean to prosecute on his point "ad absurdum."

5. Also the treaty violations during the period from 1933 until the German-English Naval Agreement of 1935 show the same actual and judicial picture. Also during these approximately 2 years, no decisive expansion of naval armament took place. The only disputable accusation made by the Prosecution in this respect is in document D-855, which was submitted during cross-examination. It concerns the report of Flottenintendant Thiele. According to this it was decided in March 1935, thus few months before the naval agreement, to make the plans for the "Scharnhorst" and the "Gneisenau" with 27,000 tons displacement, although at this moment limit of 10,000 tons displacement according to the Treaty of Versailles was still formally in force for 3 months, in contrast to the 35,000 tons displacement provided for in the naval agreement of 1935.

DEFENSE

In this, I beg to take into consideration that already in March 1935 Germany could count on a speedy conclusion of a German-English agreement, while much more time passes from the planning stage until the completion of a battleship, which cannot be counted in months, but in years.

As a matter of fact, "Scharnhorst" and "Gneisenau" were not commissioned until 3 or 4 years after the Naval Pact, i.e. in 1938 or 1939 (see Raeder Exhibit 2, affidavit Lohmann, under IV).

The other matters enumerated by the Prosecution are again trifles; for instance, the selection (not the construction, as the Prosecution terms it) of 4 to 5 merchantmen (C-166), or the construction of 5 U-boats at 40 tons each, (C-141) which, for technical reasons, were constructed and 12 torpedo boats of 200 tons each. The Prosecution cannot in all seriousness severely blame this all the more so as the above-mentioned deviations from the Versailles Treaty were well known to foreign technical specialists or—as the witness Schulte-Moenting termed it succinctly—they were an "open secret."

6. And now the most decisive juridical angle in judging all developments until the summer of 1935. Rights accorded by a treaty between states are of equal validity with those accorded by Commercial Law. Breaches of agreement are considered adjusted and settled with the signing of a new agreement. In the present case the "Anglo-Germany Naval Agreement of 18 June 1935"—Raeder Exhibit 11—stands for the new treaty. This Naval Agreement brings complete deviation from the Versailles Treaty with respect to the high-tonnage vessels as well as the U-boats. It is only on the basis of the ratio permitted Germany by this new agreement that the insignificance of the previous very small violations of the Versailles Treaty becomes apparent.

Ten thousand-ton cruisers were replaced by 35,000 ton warships, and the ban on the construction of U-boats was replaced by equality in U-boat tonnage. And, Germany's demands were not unreasonable; quite the contrary, His Majesty's Government of the United Kingdom, in the above mentioned document, explicitly confirmed the German proposal "as an exceedingly important contribution to future limitation of naval armaments."

This agreement between England and Germany makes the debate on the Versailles Treaty obsolete factually and juridically, as far as the navy is concerned.

II

This Naval Agreement was generally welcomed on the part of England and Germany. The Naval Agreement was supplemented by a new agreement on 17 June 1937 (see Raeder Exhibit 14). As proof that the Navy has violated also the Naval Agreement, with aggressive intentions, the prosecution has raised two charges:

1. In the Agreement of 1937 both contracting Governments were bound to a mutual exchange of information: namely, annually, within the first four months of every calendar year, with reference to details of the building program. According to document C-23, the navy violated this obligation so far as it gave the displacement and the draught of both battleships "Bismarck" and "Tirpitz" which were being built at the beginning of 1938 as too low, namely 35,000 tons instead of 41,700 tons. The fact of this violation is openly admitted by Raeder. But here as well, it is not such a great violation as it is described by the Prosecution, namely there is no violation which shows any grounds for proof of criminal intention. This is shown in the exhaustive descriptions in my presentation of evidence and in the testimonies of witnesses which I do not need to repeat here. It will be sufficient if I refer to the absolutely convincing testimony of ship building director Dr. H. C. Suechting which I have submitted as Raeder Exhibit 15. The tonnage increases demanded by the navy during the construction were to be used exclusively within the concept of the defensive, namely the idea to increase the armor plating of the battleships and to arrange the bulkheads in such a way that the battleships should be as much as possible unsinkable; a concept of the defensive which, as Dr. Suechting emphasizes, has proved to be actually correct during the combatting and sinking of the battleship "Bismarck." But as it is a question of concept of the defensive, no aggressive intentions can be construed from this treaty violation.

In judicial connection, it must be added that a right was conceded under certain conditions in the Naval Agreement of 1937 in articles 24, 25, and 26 that the contracting governments may deviate from the contracted agreements and especially from the tonnage limitation of battleship, if any other sea power builds or acquires larger battleships. This case of article 25 occurred, and the violation of the agreement consists solely in the fact that the navy certainly had a right to build henceforth larger battleships but should have informed England that Germany wanted to make use of her right. It concerns only the violation of the obligation for exchange of information. How meaningless this measure was, is proved by the alteration of the German-English Naval agreement based on the London Protocol of 30 June 1938 which I have submitted in Document Raeder Exhibit 16.

DEFENSE

Already on 31 March 1938, that is only 6 weeks after the date of the document C-28, England on her part reported according to the London Protocol of 30 June 1938, that she must make use of the mentioned right, by virtue of article 25 and proposed therefore that the battleship tonnage will be increased from 35,000 to 45,000. This agreement was then signed by both countries on 30 June 1938, and thus the violation of agreement became illusory, as is seen from the document C-23.

2. The British prosecutor has raised a second charge during cross-examination by submitting document D-854. It concerns the notes made by Admiral Assmann for his writing of history; on sheet 15 of which he writes that in the sphere of submarine building, Germany followed the terms of the German-English Naval Agreement the least; 55 submarines could be contemplated until 1938; but 118 were actually completed or contracted for. These statements by Assmann are actually incorrect. In reality, Germany followed strictly all the stipulations of the German-English Naval Agreement. Despite the assurance of equality of rights, Germany limited herself voluntarily in the Naval Agreement of 1935 to 45 percent; but she reserved for herself the right to increase this percentage at any time by friendly agreement with England. The presentation of evidence has shown (see the testimony of witness Raeder and Schulte-Moenting) that in December 1938 the appropriate negotiations took place between the British Admiral Lord Cunningham and the Grand Admiral Raeder during which His Majesty's Government conceded the increase up to 100 percent. It was not clear in the presentation of evidence whether this concession was put in writing, as it is to be assumed. Meanwhile I could establish that a document must have existed, certainly from the mentioned Assmann Document D-854, where on page 169 (in connection with page 161) the letter in question of 18 January 1939 is mentioned. It is necessary to say only in conclusion that the figure of 55 submarines mentioned by Assmann corresponds to 45 percent, whereas the figure of 118 submarines makes 100, accordingly Assmann and thererore the Prosecution as well are wrong; actually there is no violation at all of the naval agreement in respect to submarines.

III

I now come to the reproach made by the Prosecution that Admiral of the Fleet Raeder had taken part in a conspiracy for waging wars of aggression and in particular supported Hitler and National Socialism, despite his alleged knowledge that Hitler from the beginning had the intention of conducting wars of aggression.

1. How did Raeder come to Hitler and how could he, or rather how must he, at that time have reckoned with an intention of aggression on the part of Hitler?

As I already mentioned, it is proved that Raeder before 1933 had nothing to do with National-Socialism and knew neither Hitler nor the Party collaborators; he got to know Hitler on 2 February 1933 when he and the other commanders were introduced to Hitler by Baron von Hammerstein. As chief of the Naval Command Staff, there was for Raeder only one superior, i.e., the President of the Reich von Hindenburg, who, according to the constitution and the Wehrmacht Law was the commander-in-chief of the whole Wehrmacht. As President of the Reich Hindenburg had appointed Hitler as Chancellor of the Reich, and thus was of necessity created a connection between Hitler and the Wehrmacht. Any decision of Raeder therefore did not come into consideration. As a subordinate to Hindenburg he had to put up with the political decision Hindenburg had taken as President of the Reich. The constitutional basis in regard to the Wehrmacht was in no way altered by the fact that Hitler came into power. As Chief of the Naval Command Staff Raeder took no part in this political decision, any more than he had taken part previously when Mueller of the Social Democratic Party or Bruening of the Center Party became chancellors of the Reich.

There was moreover no cause for Raeder to resign his post on account of this internal political decision, for Hitler explained to Raeder and the other high officers at the first conference of 2 February 1933 and particularly also upon the occasion of the first naval report in the same month, that nothing would be changed in the Wehrmacht and that the Wehrmacht was to remain outside of politics as provided by the constitution and the Wehrmacht Law. As attested by the testimony of Raeder and Schulte-Moenting, Hitler at the delivery of the naval report explained his fundamental ideas in regard to a peaceful policy, for which, in spite of the friendly revision of the Versailles Treaty that he was striving for, it was necessary to come to a reasonable understanding with England by virtue of treaty, in regard to the development of the navy in keeping with the general limitations of naval armament. During this conversation Hitler clearly gave to understand that he did not want to institute any naval armament race and that the development of the navy was to take place only by friendly agreement with England. This was a thought which absolutely corresponded to the fundamental viewpoint of Raeder and of the navy. It would have been absolutely out of question for Raeder on this given basis to go to his superior Hindenburg and declare that because of Hitler he could no longer hold the leadership of the navy.

DEFENSE

Now the Prosecution assumes that the men then holding leadership in Germany already knew Hitler's true intentions from Hitler's book "Mein Kampf." The Prosecution cited as proof several quotations partly torn from the context from Hitler's 1924 propaganda book. This line of argument by the Prosecution does not seem right because Hitler wrote this book as a private individual, belonging to an opposition party. In this trial it has several times been pointed out that the statements of private foreign individuals are irrelevant, even when these foreigners are ever so well known and subsequently—as in Hitler's case—were given a position in their government. Raeder could be allowed to assume, as could anyone else, that as Reich Chancellor Hitler would not maintain all the party doctrines he defended years before purely as a member of the opposition, particularly not when the statements of Hitler on military matter contradicted these former party ideas. Moreover for the navy the relation to England was always decisive and in this very connection Hitler had even on page 154 of his book "Mein Kampf" declared verbatim:

"For such a policy of course there was only one possible partner: England."

Moreover it must be said in rebuttal of the quotations submitted by the Prosecution, that they are all taken from the 1933 edition and that, in spite of great pains the General Secretary's Office has been unable to procure an earlier edition, particularly the 1st edition of 1925 and 1927. It is a known fact that Hitler himself in later years made changes on many points in numerous places in his book; it follows that the quotations from the 1933 edition cannot without further ado be taken as a basis.

2. Would Raeder in the following years have had to realize that Hitler wanted to depart from the described fundamental idea of a policy of understanding with England, and is it possible to follow the line of argument of the Prosecution that Raeder should have refused his further collaboration at any given time before 1939?

I am of the opinion that this question must be answered in the negative, and that the necessity of negation results quite naturally from the combining of various facts which were submitted by the Prosecution or by the Defense during the demonstration of evidence:

a. Hindenburg died on 2 August 1934, and the Prosecution reproaches Raeder with having thereupon taken an oath and particularly that he in this oath put the Fuehrer in the place of the Fatherland. (Transcript of session of 15 January 1946.)

This case was sufficiently explained in the presentation of evidence. I must therefore only refer to the error made by the Prosecution in its assertion; the Prosecution itself produced document D-481 which indicates the official oath taken by the soldier of the Wehrmacht on Hitler's orders. This document is a law signed by Hitler, Frick, and Blomberg. According to this law it is ascertainable that it was not Raeder, who replaced the word Vaterland by Hitler, but that the latter himself had demanded that allegiance be pledged to him as Commander-in-Chief of the Wehrmacht by all soldiers. Before the issue of the decree concerning this oath, cleverly devised by Hitler and so portentous for the following years, Raeder had neither been informed of it nor had his advice been solicited as to the textual draft of this oath, he was simply summoned to the Reich Chancellery without being given a hint as to what it was all about.

The question, what kind of oath is taken by a soldier is again a political one, a question of legislation upon which Raeder in his capacity as soldier and Commander-in-Chief of the Navy had no influence.

b. The prosecution charges Raeder with having been informed of many political decisions and of having, as Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, drafted on these occasions strategic plans and preparations. It is a question of the cases of the withdrawal from the League of Nations on 14 October 1933, the occupation of the Rhineland on 7 March 1936, the Austrian Anschluss in March 1938, the incorporation of the Sudetenland in the fall of 1938 and the establishment of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia in March 1939.

It refers principally to the following documents:

C-140—USA 51 of 25 October 1933

C-159—USA 54 of 2 March 1936

C-194—USA 55 of 6 March 1936

C-175—USA 69 of 24 June 1937

388-PS—USA 26 of 20 May 1938

C-136—USA 104 of 21 October 1938.

DEFENSE

There is one fact which is common to all these decisions namely the one, that Raeder has not politically taken part in any of these decisions. Raeder had never before been asked for any advice, he as Commander-in-Chief of the Navy had no authority to collaborate in such decisions. Raeder's sole activity consisted in receiving these documents and messages, and in the subsequent issue of military orders, which he was supposed to draw up in anticipation of the event, should belligerent complications arise. It is wholly incomprehensible how a Commander-in-Chief of a branch of the Wehrmacht can be reproached for having made strategic preparations for possibly forthcoming belligerent complications. I believe, that it is the same all over the world, an Admiral never takes part in political decisions while being obliged to make certain precautionary preparations according to these political decisions of the Government. This again is a case of the discrepancy I have mentioned before with regard to the position of a military commander, which though considered by the Prosecution to be a political one, is a purely military position in reality.

There should not be any doubt that on the very same dates the foreign military commands involved in political decisions or interested in them were likewise making military plans.

No military commander would ever judge whether these political decisions of Hitler were crimes or merely offenses against international law, and particularly not if he was never summoned to the discussions. Neither the withdrawal from the League of Nations resulting from the failure of trying to have all countries disarm—according to the Versailles Treaty—nor the occupation of the Sudetenland, nor the establishment of the Protectorates of Bohemia and Moravia could be regarded by the Prosecution as criminal activities committed by the uninterested Commander-in-Chief of the Navy. There certainly were deviations from the Versailles Treaty, but even the British Chief Prosecutor, Sir Hartley Shawcross, himself declared on 4 December 1945 that “many objections against Versailles were possibly justified.”

Even Justice Jackson has, as quoted above, explained that the boldest measures would have been justified for the purpose of a revision of this treaty, but not a war.

All these above mentioned measures of Germany were in fact accomplished without a war, thus they must be considered as being those Justice Jackson had declared justified, the more so as all these measures were quietly tolerated by foreign nations, even, as in the case of the incorporation of the Sudetenland, ratified by the Munich Agreement of September 1938, or by an agreement with the Government of the country in question, such as in the case of Austria. Should, in the case of Austria and the establishment of the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, the Prosecution rightfully consider from an impartial and retrospective point of view that Hitler had used most doubtful and possibly criminal measures for this achievement. That would be of no importance for the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, because of the established fact that he had not been informed about these activities, and still less regarding the measures to be taken.

It has been established, in particular, that Raeder was neither informed of the details concerning the Austrian Anschluss nor of the kind of conference which ultimately led to an agreement with President Hacha. He never knew of the discussions with Hacha, nor of the menace of a bombardment of Prague—expressed in the course of this discussion—in which case I might refer to the depositions of the witnesses Raeder and Schulte-Moenting. All these measures were therefore in the eyes of Raeder activities admitted by international law or agreements which could not lead him to interfere in any way or to make any inquiries of Hitler, quite apart from the fact that he as military commander would have had no right whatsoever to do so.

Moreover, exclusively land operations would have been involved from the military standpoint even if complications had arisen, which is evident immediately from the location of the countries concerned. It would have been impossible if the almost completely uninterested Commander-in-Chief of the Navy had paid attention to these things, although hardly any naval preparations were under consideration. One should keep in mind the case of Czechoslovakia in which connection document 388-PS has a provision that the navy is to participate in possible army operations by commitment of the Danube flotilla which for that purpose comes under the orders of the High Command of the army, a flotilla consisting of very small ships, that is of a few gunboats, if I remember correctly.

c. I further quote for the argument in this connection the words of Sir Hartley Shawcross of 4 December 1945 concerning the German-Polish non-aggression pact of 1934:

"Hitler, by concluding this treaty, convinced many people that his intentions were really peaceful." (German transcript.)

Consequently Raeder had to be convinced.

d. It is true that Raeder belonged to the secret cabinet council created in February 1938. The fact proved in the meantime that the secret cabinet council was purely a farce is equally correct. It is therefore unnecessary to deal with this point which was in the beginning considered so important by the Prosecution.

DEFENSE

e. The claim of the Prosecution that Raeder had been a member of the government and Reichsminister has been refuted in the same manner. This claim of the Prosecution has been incomprehensible from the start. Document 2098-PS presented by the Prosecution only states in an absolutely unequivocal manner, that v. Brauchitsch the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Raeder the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy held a "rank equivalent to that of a Reich Minister". This proves, that he was no Minister but for reasons of etiquette held a rank equal to that of Reich Minister. This makes it evident that Raeder was not assigned any political task through this decree of Hitler, as the Prosecution would like to have it. There is the fact to be added that through this decree he did not even receive the right to participate in cabinet sessions if he wished to do so, but, as stated by Hitler in the above-mentioned document only, "upon my order." This therefore means nothing more than that Raeder could have been called upon to participate in a cabinet session if technical naval problems were involved. In reality this politically unmaterial, hypothetical case never did occur.

f. The participation in the Reich defense council on the basis of document 2194-PS (Reich Defense Law of 4 September 1938) can also not be considered incriminating. On the one hand it deals, as becomes evident from the text, only with "measures for the preparation of Reich defense," therefore not with political activity nor with activity connected in any political sense with aggressive war.

Moreover, Raeder, contrary to the claim of the Prosecution, according to Document 2018-PS, a later issued Fuehrer decree of 13 August 1939, did not at all belong to the created Ministerial Council for Reich Defense that time, and this simply for the reason that he was not a Minister. On the other hand other countries, too, have the institution of Reich Defense Council or Reich Defense Committee. I want to remind you of the well-known fact that there existed in the British Government already a long time before the first World-War a Reich Defense Committee, which was of much greater importance than the equivalent institution in Germany.

g. As the last item in this connection, I want to point out that the claim of the Prosecution that Raeder had been a party member has also proved untenable. It is true that Raeder received the golden insignia of honor (Goldene Ehrenzeichen) from Hitler; this was nothing else, however, than the award of medal and it couldn't be anything else, because a soldier could not be a member of the Party. This becomes evident beyond doubt from paragraph 36 of the Wehrmacht Law, according to which soldiers can never engage in politics and which forbids them to be a member of a political organization.

Besides, I want to refer to the presentation of evidence which proved sufficiently that Raeder never had connections with the party, that he rather had differences of opinion with party circles and that he was spurned by typical National-Socialists because of his political and religious attitude; for instance he had on Goebbels the same effect as a red rag on a bull, and this was no wonder either, for on the one hand he prevented the Party again and again from obtaining any influence on the officer corps of the navy, and on the other hand assisted the Church to the greatest extent contrary to the principles of the Party and saw to it that the spirit of the navy received a Christian basis. I may refer in this connection to the typical National-Socialist phrase of Bormann:

"National Socialistic and Christian concepts are incompatible." In the same document Bormann, as he so often did, expressed himself so strongly in a train of thought contradictory to culture against Christianity, so violently propagandized for the destruction of all Christian ideas, that this attitude toward the party sufficiently proves that Raeder as a convinced Christian never could have affiliated himself with the Party.

h. I have already stated that Hitler in 1933 said that it would be one of the fundamentals of his policy to make Germany by peaceful means a sound and strong nation; and that it was absolutely necessary for peaceful development to acknowledge British hegemony and to come to an agreement with England about the size of the German fleet and if possible even to come to an alliance. These ideas agreed with the fundamental attitude of Raeder who stated it in detail during his hearing. Within the limits of my defense, it may be an open question, if and when Hitler abandoned that basic thought. For in any case Hitler has always emphasized this basic thought to Raeder and also supported it by deeds; this ever recurring thought runs like a red thread all through the years to the outbreak of war. The realization of this thought led to the conclusion of the German-British naval agreement in 1935, the conclusion of the German-British naval agreement of 1937, the agreement about submarines with Lord Cunningham in 1938, and to the London protocol of 30 June 1939 concerning the battleships; this throughout the years of the reconstruction of the German navy runs always the same idea, namely ever the idea of agreeing with England of acknowledging England's supremacy and of avoiding any difference which might lead to a break with England.

DEFENSE

Subsequently, in the full knowledge of all the documents and all the facts proved during this trial, it may be established that Hitler at some time probably in 1938 may have become unfaithful to his own thought and that thereby he has become guilty of the tragic fate of Germany. In order to judge the accusations made against Raeder the decisive thing is not that which must be acknowledged as being objectively true after having a knowledge of all facts but the only decisive thing is whether Raeder has realized or could ever possibly know of this deviation by Hitler from his own ideas. This however is not the case. Raeder could not guess, and even less know that Hitler had at any given time become so unfaithful to his own political ideas which he had repeatedly stressed and demonstrated and thus had become guilty of instigating the frightful danger of World War II. Raeder could not suspect or know that also in the last period before the war Hitler spoke to him differently from what he thought, and also spoke differently from the way he acted. In the matter of the navy in particular the relatively slow rebuilding of the German fleet showed that Hitler intended to remain faithful to the train of thought I referred to. A change of mind on Hitler's part in this connection was not perceptible; for a change of mind would have had precisely the result that he would have developed the navy to a larger extent than he did. He would then have had at least fully to exploit the possibility of the German-British Naval Agreement as to the size of the respective fleets. According to the naval agreement the German fleet was allowed a total tonnage of 420,595 tons. As a matter of fact this maximum was never reached. Even in regard to battleships Germany remained short of the naval agreement with the result that the battleships "Bismarck" and "Tirpitz" were not available in the first year of the war and therefore could take no part in the occupation of Norway; the "Bismarck" was completed only in August 1940, and the "Tirpitz" in 1941.

According to the naval agreement, Germany was allowed to have the same tonnage of submarines as England. Actually however, U-boat construction was so little speeded up that at the beginning of the war in 1939 as the hearings proved Germany had available only the minimum figure of 26 submarines suitable for Atlantic service. And further, as late as end of May 1939 according to document L-79, the so-called "Little Schmundt" was instructed verbatim that "nothing is changed in the shipbuilding program."

All these must have awakened the strong belief in the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy from his point of view and from his field of action that Hitler would stand by his oft stressed basic line, not to allow war to come to pass.

This strong belief of Raeder—and this seems important—was to the utmost extent strengthened by the attitude of foreign countries:

Winston Churchill wrote in 1935 in his book "Great contemporaries":

"It is not possible to pass just judgment on a personality in public life who has reached the enormous proportions of Adolf Hitler before his life's work stands revealed before us as a whole * * *. We cannot say whether Hitler will be the man who once again will unleash a world war in which civilization will go down irrevocably, or whether he will enter history as the man who has restored the honor and the peaceful intent of the great German nation and has brought it back cheerful, helpful, and strong to the front rank of the European family of nations."

One year later, at the Olympic Games in Berlin in the year 1936, the representatives of the foreign countries appeared in a body and greeted Hitler in a manner which, in its approval and partial enthusiasm, was incomprehensible to many Germans who were sceptically inclined. Subsequently the greatest foreign politicians and also members of various Governments have visited Hitler and reached a complete understanding with him, and finally in the autumn of 1938 an understanding was again reached under Chamberlain and Halifax which strengthened Hitler immeasurably, and by means of which Hitler tried to prove to the Germans how correct all his actions had been as they were being recognized by foreign countries. The proclamation defining their aims, which was issued by Hitler and Chamberlain in Munich on 30 September 1938, cannot be estimated high enough. I would therefore like to cite the two first decisive phrases from Raeder Exhibit 23, Document Book II, Pages 127 and 128:

"To-day we had a further discussion, and agree in the realization that the question of German-English relations is of primary importance for both countries and for Europe. We regard the agreement which was signed last night and the German-English Navy Treaty as symbolic of the wish of our two nations never again to conduct war against each other."

I believe that these references are sufficient and ask: Can it be demanded that a German Grand-Admiral, who has never been a politician and always only a soldier, should have looked farther ahead in judging Hitler than the great British statesmen Chamberlain and Churchill? I believe that the form of the question already harbors the negative form of the answer.

DEFENSE

3. The Prosecution can only seriously confront these numerous points of view with some few documents which might speak for Raeder's knowledge of Hitler's aggressive plans. The Prosecution has presented indeed innumerable documents in which it pointed out that Raeder or the Naval Operations Staff or the Supreme Command of the navy received a copy. However, in a very considerable number of documents the Prosecution could not state anything beyond the fact that Raeder received a copy, while a realistic connection on the subject did not exist for the most part and was not presented by the Prosecution, either. It is naturally not surprising that military documents for the sake of uniformity went to all branches of the Wehrmacht, even if in individual cases one branch of the Wehrmacht was not at all or hardly concerned with them. Of all these documents in the case of Raeder, only the 4 documents which the Prosecution described as key documents because of their importance can be really incriminating. These are the four speeches of Hitler of 5 November 1937, 23 May 1939, 22 August 1939, and 23 November 1939 to the Commanders-in-Chief. (386-PS—USA 25; L-79—USA 27; 798-PS—USA 29; 1014-PS—USA 30; 789-PS—USA 23.)

The Prosecution claims that these speeches show participation in the conspiracy, and that it could be clearly recognized from these speeches that Hitler wanted to wage wars of aggression. I would therefore like to state my opinion in detail as to these documents, and in so doing show why these documents cannot influence the picture which I have given as a whole.

Doubtlessly these key-documents are of the utmost importance for subsequent historical findings as to what trains of thought have directed Hitler; and for the reason that they are expressions of opinion by Hitler, and in spite of the large extent of the captured documentary material there exist almost no written drafts by Hitler. First of all the thought is also attractive that the contents must be true, because they deal with expressions of opinion which were only expressed before a small circle, before which Hitler, in accordance with his nature, preferred to express himself openly rather than in his public speeches. Even though I do not fail to recognize the value of the documents in any way, I still believe that the Prosecution overestimates by far the importance of these 4 documents. They certainly are key-documents to a certain extent, and that in as far as they provide the key to the recognition of Hitler psychologically and to the understanding of Hitler's methods. The documents, however, are not a key to the real intentions of Hitler, and particularly not a standard for the final conclusions which the listener would have had to draw from these documents according to the opinion of the Prosecution. In order to comprehend completely the value of the documents in this connection, I would like to group in advance several general points which apply equally to each of these 4 documents. All these points limit the evidential value of these documents which was overestimated by the Prosecution:

Point a. None of these speeches were recorded in shorthand, and therefore we do not have the actual text of any speech. In accordance with this, Hossbach in the record of 5 November 1937 correctly chose the indirect address, just like General Admiral Boehm in his record of the speech of 22 August 1939 (Raeder Exhibit 27, Document Book II, Page 144 ff.). Surprisingly and not quite correctly, Schmundt chose the direct address in the record regarding 23 May 1939, although it is not a literal record; however, he was at least careful and stated in the beginning that Hitler's statements were being reproduced "according to the sense." The weakest documents, to wit, the two versions of the speech of 22 August 1939, submitted by the Prosecution, 1014-PS and 798-PS, have chosen the direct address, and the authors of this document whose names are unknown have not even considered it necessary to give an indication as was done by Schmundt. However this may be, in considering the documents it must be kept in mind that they were not reproduced word by word, and that therefore the reliability of the reproduction depends on the manner of work and attitude of the originator of the document, especially on the fact of if and how many notes the individual made during the speech, and when he made his record. In connection with this it appears important that the Adjutant Hossbach, as is shown by document 386-PS, only made the record a full 5 days later, to wit, only on 10 November, while the speech had already been made on 5 November. In the case of Schmundt, a date for the record is missing altogether, and likewise in the two Prosecution documents regarding the speech of 22 August 1939. The latter also lacks the signature so that in this case it cannot even be ascertained who bears the responsibility for the record at all. The same applies to the document regarding the speech of 23 November 1939—so many formal mistakes and just as many doubts concerning the value as evidence and reliability of the documents.

Things are different with the document of Boehm who in his affidavit, Raeder 129, certifies, in lieu of oath, that he wrote down Hitler's speech simultaneously, and of particularly important parts jotted down the exact text, and who furthermore certifies that on the same evening he wrote down the final draft which has been submitted here. If in all these documents the true text does not exist, then it is plain how important it is if it can at least be established that the record was made simultaneously with the speech or at least on the very same day, and not, as in the case of Hossbach, 5 days later. With the best of memories even the best Adjutant, who daily has to handle quite many new things, can not possibly make an absolutely reliable reproduction of a speech after 5 days.

DEFENSE

Point b. Just as important is the second point, to wit, the fact that contrary to other military documents these are not official documents with a distribution list, therefore not documents which were subsequently received by those concerned. That the documents were not received by Raeder was established in the evidence by him and the witness Schulte-Moenting, apart from the fact that it is already shown by the lack of a distribution list on the document. This point particularly, appears of great importance to me. Listening to a speech once—and Hitler as is well-known spoke extraordinarily quickly—does not move the listener to final conclusions in the same way as the presentation of a record by which he can always make certain subsequently about the contents of the speech. We who have come to know these speeches in the proceedings by way of writing and have again and again judged them by the wording, naturally consider the individual words and application of phrases more important than we would have done with a quickly-delivered address. In addition to this comes the fact that all of us easily tend to lend more importance to the individual application of phrases, because all of us now can overlook everything better from the present standpoint and out of more extensive knowledge; because we do not only have one speech to base our opinions on, but also all speeches and in addition all the many other documents which show the historical development. In discussing these documents it must again and again be kept in mind how different the individual listener will react to the spoken word, and how frequently, after a few hours even, the reports of various listeners will differ from one another.

Point c. The Prosecution sees in these speeches of Hitler the basis of the conspiracy, and presents it in such a manner, as if Hitler had on this occasion consulted with the Commanders, and had then concluded a certain plan of conspiracy with them, and had finally reached a certain decision. The Prosecution must maintain this because in this lies the basis of a conspiracy which can only then be spoken of if something is being planned in common. In reality, contrary to what the Prosecution states, no influential group of Nazis assembled in order to examine the situation and to make decisions, but it was rather a one-sided presentation by Hitler in which no discussion and no consultation took place. No decision was reached, either, but Hitler rather spoke quite generally about possibilities of developments (see Hossbach document), if one could speak of resolutions at all, it was merely a matter of the sole decision of Hitler. All this stands in contrast to a real conspiracy. I furthermore have the impression that the Prosecution in the conception of a conspiracy to wage wars of aggression has formed for itself a completely false picture of the real power conditions in the National-Socialist State.

In my opinion it fails to recognize the characteristics of a dictatorship, and it actually may be very difficult to understand the immeasurable dictatorial power of Hitler if one has not personally constantly lived through the whole 12 years in Germany, and in particular in its development from the first beginnings until it finally became a dictatorship which worked with the most terrible, the most horrible, and the most undignified human terror. A dictator like Hitler, who furthermore apparently exercised an immense suggestive and fascinating force, is not the President of a parliamentary government. I have the impression that the Prosecution in judging the situation as a whole has never completely freed itself from the ideas of a parliamentary government, and it has never taken the uncompromising work of a dictator into account.

The extent to which the idea of a conspiracy between him and the members of the Cabinet or between him and the Commanders is averse to Hitler's mind became evident in the course of this trial through numerous examinations of witnesses. Particularly striking in that respect was the testimony of the Swedish industrialist Dahlerus, who by reason of his contacts with England and with Germany—in each case equally excellent and extensive—was in course of time enabled to obtain an objective picture of England as well as Germany, and who during his negotiations with Chamberlain and Halifax on one hand, and Hitler and Goering on the other hand, was best prepared to recognize the difference between the Parliamentary British Government and the German Hitler Dictatorship. The accounts of Dahlerus prove convincingly that the difference was such that no bridging-over was possible. After having spoken with Chamberlain and Halifax a discussion with the Cabinet took place, naturally, before a final decision was taken. On the other hand, in the night of 26 to 27 August 1939 when Dahlerus had a discussion of the utmost importance with Hitler in which only Goering was present, Hitler at once made 6 propositions, without saying a word to any of the Cabinet members or any of the military commanders, without even advising with Goering who sat there silently; proposals, by the way, which in no manner were in line with what he had said to Sir Neville Henderson. A stronger argument against a conspiracy with Commanders or members of Cabinet there hardly exists, unless reference be made to the equally important fact which the witness Dahlerus added, namely that during the entire 2½ hours Goering did not once dare to open his mouth, and that it was humiliation to see the degree of servility which Hitler demanded of Goering, his closest associate.

DEFENSE

Point d. All of these Hitler speeches are full of contradictions. Such contradictions naturally impair clarity of thought and they rob the individual thought of its importance. Reading documents in their entirety, the number of contradictions becomes evident, a fact on which a remark by Admiral Schulte-Moenting during examination and cross-examination was much to the point. It is just because of such contradictions and inconsistent thoughts that the evidential value of documents is diminished. It is quite natural that for a military adjutant such as Hossbach or Schmundt, it is difficult to record an unclear and contradictory train of thought; it is equally easy to understand that a military adjutant will be inclined to introduce as clear a line of thought as possible, and because of such endeavor he may happen to stress thoughts which have become clear to him more strongly than they actually presented themselves in the orally pronounced word. To this should be added the very appropriate remark of Raeder, who not only points to contradictions, but to Hitler's extraordinary sense of imagination, and who in that respect termed him "Master of bluff."

Moreover, in every speech of that type Hitler followed a very definite tendency. He had a definite purpose in view, namely, to bring about a desired impression on all or some of his hearers, either through intended exaggeration or by making things appear deliberately harmless, depending upon the purpose he pursued. While he spoke, Hitler followed the intuition of the moment. As Schulte-Moenting termed it, he freed himself of his concept. He thought out loud and wanted to carry his hearers with him, but he did not wish to be taken at his word. (Transcript of Court Session of 22 May 1946, afternoon.) One must agree with me that with such practices and such purposefully designed speeches there is at this time nothing really reliable to go by in order to discover Hitler's true opinion. In addition to that there is the following point of view for all these documents in general:

Item e. Following his address of 23 May 1939 "Little Schmundt", Raeder had an interview with Hitler alone in which he called Hitler's attention to contradictions in that address and, on the other hand, to contradictions deriving from the words—a remark previously made to him by Hitler—that under all circumstances he would also settle the case of Poland peacefully. Hitler then calmed Raeder down and told him that he, Hitler, had a firm hold of matters, politically. This was stated by the witness Schulte-Moenting who added that Hitler allayed Raeder's fears by an example of the contradiction between the speeches of 23 May 1939 and his other statements. He told him, that for him (Hitler) there were three ways of keeping things secret:

Firstly, the conversation with someone without other witness; secondly, the thoughts which he, Hitler, kept to himself and, thirdly, thoughts which he himself did not even think through to the end. I believe this manner of thought illustrates most strikingly how little reliance could ultimately be placed in statements made by Hitler before a small or large group of people. It seems to me quite natural then that in his deliberations Raeder kept neither to Hitler's general speeches nor to the address to the Commander which was discussed here, but that he went solely by what Hitler had told him when alone with him. In that respect, however, testimonies by Schulte-Moenting, Boehm, and Albrecht are in agreement in that they prove that as late as the year 1939, Hitler still gave Raeder repeatedly the explicit assurance that there would be no war; that is, he did this on occasions when for some reason or other Raeder was particularly worried and wanted to call Hitler's attention to dangers ahead.

In conclusion, I therefore believe it may be said that the so-called key documents are extremely interesting for a psychological opinion on Hitler; their evidential value as regards Hitler's real intentions, however, is very circumscribed and weak. No one can expect Raeder to accept for his guidance, speeches made by Hitler before his Commanders on the spur of the moment, but he based himself on assurances given him by Hitler, with no one else present, and on the fact that until the summer of 1939, until the outbreak of the war, these assurances were in perfect accord with facts and Hitler's actions, namely with the four Naval Agreements and the Munich Pact. There is some justification for Raeder not permitting himself to have this his basic attitude shattered by the speeches to the Commanders-in-Chief, though undoubtedly of a suspicious nature, but that he held steadfastly to his belief that Hitler would not deceive him. From the fact that we subsequently come to find that after all Hitler deceived Raeder in his private conversations, as well as by his special method of 2d and 3d classification of secrecy as described above, no guilt is attached to Raeder, but solely to Hitler. Considering the voluminous amount of evidential matter, there is no justification in it for evidence proving that even in 1938-1939 Raeder planned for a war of aggression, in violation of international law: it reveals only the intention of the part of Hitler to engage in a war of aggression in violation of international law.

DEFENSE

Having dealt with the key documents in a general manner, I am now asking the Tribunal's permission to add a few points to each individual document, since the Prosecution over and over again stressed such documents as basis for their charge of conspiracy.

a. Hossbach document, 386-PS, discussion of 5 November 1937 in the Reich Chancellery:

The critical phrases of this document cannot be refuted, and they were cited often enough by the Prosecution. In discussing that document it should at the same time be taken into consideration that Goering and Raeder unanimously stated that Hitler announced in advance that he wished to express a certain trend by his speech. Hitler was dissatisfied with measures taken by Field Marshal von Blomberg, and especially those of Generaloberst v. Fritsch, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and he felt that rearmament made but slow progress in the army. As a result, Hitler made a point of exaggerating, a fact known only to Goering and to Raeder, so that it is but natural that the impression of that speech on Neurath who had no idea about this intention was entirely different and deeply alarming. It is interesting to note that Hitler did not fully get what he wanted, because the two last paragraphs of the document indicate that to some extent Blomberg and Fritsch saw through Hitler's scheming, and that his exaggerations failed to deceive them. Though on similar occasions Hitler did not permit discussions, Blomberg and Fritsch intervened on this occasion and pointed to the need of preventing England and France from lining up as Germany's adversaries. Blomberg explained the reasons for his protest, and in the penultimate paragraph the document unmistakably expressed his scepticism as to Hitler's words in that he remarked that under such circumstances he would not be able to carry out his planned vacation abroad scheduled to begin 10 November.

It is equally interesting to note that thereupon Hitler came round and, in contrast to his early statements, declared himself convinced of England's non-participation, and that, consequently, he also does not believe in military action by France against Germany. The lack of tenability of Hitler's ideas shown in this document finds further expression in that he took as starting point for his statements an idea truly fantastic, namely, an Italo-French-

English war or—equally fantastic—a civil war in France. Continuing such contradictions, Hitler mentioned in his speech the application of force on one hand, an attack by Poland against East Prussia on the other hand—something which bore out a defensive idea only;—and in regard to Czechoslovakia he said that in all probability England and France had already written Czechoslovakia off their books without further ado.

This hint is an indication, however, that Hitler was prepared to negotiate, and this is in keeping with actual historic developments: he mentions that Austria and Czechoslovakia will be brought to their knees but, nevertheless, one year later, in March as well as September 1938, he carried on negotiations and settled both questions without war. This fact in particular seems very significant, in that it proved to Raeder by the events which followed that he was right in not ascribing undue importance to Hitler's rash words of 5 November 1937, because they were not supported by the fact that in reality Hitler, at a later date, carried on negotiations.

Raeder was also right when, during his interrogation, he pointed to the 2d Naval Pact that had been concluded with England just a few months earlier, and that as a result he could not really expect Hitler seriously to leave a path on which he was engaged.

And as a last point of view: Throughout its entire length, the document is dealing with political questions on one hand and with possible land operations on the other. Raeder had nothing whatever to do with political questions because he was no politician, while Neurath as Foreign Minister naturally had reason to place greater importance on Hitler's political attitude. It is of equal importance that Neurath testified that, as a result of that speech, he too asked Hitler in a confidential interview for his personal attitude, and that he refused to continue in the Foreign Office because Hitler stated that those are his actual intentions. To me it seems typical of Hitler to declare to one person, namely Neurath, that perhaps he would go to war, while he told another person, namely Raeder, that he would under no circumstances make war. This difference in expressing his position obviously can be explained by the fact that at that time he no longer appreciated Neurath as Foreign Minister, because he realized that in the foreign policy which he proposed to follow, Neurath would no longer be as yielding as the successor he had in view, Ribbentrop. On the other hand, at that time he still wanted in any case to keep Raeder as Commander-in-Chief of the Navy. This is another instance of Hitler's method of acting as the situation demanded, always and without any compunction paying homage to the principle: The end justifies the means.

DEFENSE

b. HITLER'S speech of 23 May 1939 ("Little Schmundt"), L-79, USA 27:

Here HITLER expresses himself once more in a most dubious fashion. He speaks of a program of aggression, of the preparation of a planned attack, and of the decision to attack Poland. I in no way fail to recognize that there is good reason for the Prosecution to consider this document as particularly good evidence. I believe, however, that in the case of Raeder, and taking into account the numerous points of view I pointed out, the value of this document as evidence is very much less than the Prosecution is inclined to think, and much less than warranted by the impression first gained from the wording of the Schmundt version. Schmundt obviously made an endeavor to formulate Hitler's contradictory, fantastic, and highly chaotic statements along the lines of his exact military thinking. This gives the document a clarity which is not that of Hitler. We do not know when Schmundt prepared the document, and Schmundt failed to show the copy he had made to other interested parties. During his examination and cross-examination the witness Admiral Schulte-Moenting pointed to the contradictions of this document in particular which I need not repeat here. Of greater importance is the decisive point, the contradiction between these words and the words which Hitler at the same time spoke to Raeder, and which always pursue the same old path, namely that he does not intend war and that he would not make excessive demands. Raeder was horrified at that speech, and he did not calm himself until after he had a private conversation with Hitler directly after that speech. As Hitler assured him in that personal interview that under all circumstances he would settle also the case of Poland in peaceful manner, he believed him, and he had every right to conclude Hitler was telling him the truth in answer to a question equally precise. I refer to the very precise statement on that document during the Raeder examination and the examination of the witness Schulte-Moenting. I especially refer to the comparison Hitler used (according to Schulte-Moenting's testimony) stating that nobody would go to Court if he had received 99 Pfennigs while the dispute involved one Mark, and concluded from it that he had received what he had asked politically, and that there could not be war because of the last political question, namely, the Polish Corridor.

All the statements made by witnesses whom I called, and among them the deposition by Doenitz is not the least in importance, to the effect that, incidental to the last U-boat maneuvers in the Baltic Sea in July 1939, Raeder expressed his firm conviction that in that respect he relied on Hitler's assurances. Raeder, furthermore, knew that the navy was absolutely unfit for a war at sea against England; he had explained that to Hitler time and time again: he trusted Hitler's words and was confident that also in the Polish question Hitler would resort to negotiations again and—as shown by the testimony of the witness Dahlerus—negotiations were in fact taking place, even successful negotiations in the beginning. The reason why the attempt finally failed after all and that it had to come to a second World War was stated in detail by the witness Dahlerus, who thus portrayed the awful tragedy of this event.

It seems important to me that up to August 1939 not only the witness Dahlerus but also Chamberlain still believed in Hitler's good intentions.

Therefore, here too we have the same question again and the same answer: One cannot expect Raeder as a soldier to have been more farsighted and to have recognized Hitler's dangerous ideas, if men like Chamberlain, Halifax, and Dahlérus themselves had not yet seen through Hitler at that time.

If I myself have referred to the seriousness and the incriminating character of this document, may I ask you to take into consideration that the incriminating character, just as in the document of 5 November 1937, concerns itself with political matters. As defense counsel for the Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, I have to judge the facts, not from the political but from the military aspect. From a military viewpoint, however, it is impossible to follow the arguments of the Prosecution under any circumstances, for the military are not authorized to take part in decisions of war or peace, but are merely obliged to make such military preparations as the political leaders consider necessary. In no country of the world does an Admiral have to give an opinion as to whether the possible war for which he must make plans is a war of aggression or a defensive war. In no country of the world does the decision of the question as to whether war is to be waged rest with the military, but on the contrary is always left to the political leaders, that is, to the legislative bodies.

Accordingly, article 45 of the German constitution stipulates that the President of the Reich is to represent the Reich in questions of international law and stipulates further:

"The declaration of war and the conclusion of peace take place by national law."

Therefore, the question whether a war has to be waged against Poland rested with the Reichstag and not with the military leaders. Professor Jahrreiss has already explained that in the legal development of the National-Socialist state these decisions rested in the last analysis exclusively with Hitler. From the viewpoint of my Raeder case it is of no consequence whether Hitler would be regarded as legally authorized to start a war himself, as he actually did in the fall of 1939. The deciding factor is only that in any case the military leaders from either a practical or a constitutional point of view do not have to participate in this decision. It is an untenable thought if the Prosecution tries to regard as a crime every act of military planning which has taken place on the part of Germany; for the military leaders, who merely receive the order to work out a specified plan, are neither authorized nor obligated to decide whether the execution of their plan will later on involve an aggressive or a defensive war. It is well known that the Allied military leaders rightly hold the same viewpoint. No admiral or general of the Allied armed forces would understand it if someone should bring a charge against him because of military plans that were made on the Allied side a long time before the war. I do not have to explain this any further. I believe it will suffice if I refer, for instance, to the Ribbentrop document exhibit 221. This is a question of a secret document, which, according to the title concerns "Second Phase of the Anglo-French General Staff Conferences." From this document it appears that exact plans were worked out on the part of the Allied forces for a war embracing many countries; plans which, according to this document include a war in Europe and a war in the Far East. There it expressly says that the French and British High Commands in the Far East "worked out a joint plan of operations." There it expressly speaks about the importance of the possession of the Belgian and Dutch national territories as a starting point for the beginning of the offensive against Germany, and the decisive point for this in this parallel military case seems to me to be the fact that this document is dated from the same month as Hitler's speech to the Commanders-in-Chief, which has already been discussed, namely, May 1939. The document bears the inscription: "London, May 5th 1939."

DEFENSE

c. Address of Hitler to the Commanders-in-Chief on 22 August 1939 at the Obersalzberg (798-PS—USA 29; 1014-PS—USA 30; Exhibit Raeder 77).

Regarding the value as evidence of both the documents 1014-PS and 798-PS submitted by the Prosecution, for the sake of brevity, I should like first of all to refer to my previous statements which I made to this Court when I made the formal proposal to cancel Document 1014-PS. Although this high Tribunal did not accept this proposal I still believe that my statements on the limited value of this document as evidence are important, so far that only a very small value as evidence can be attached to both these documents and particularly to Document 1014-PS. The American Prosecution, when submitting these documents, duly pointed out, (Transcript, 26 November 1945) that the Court should take into consideration, should the Defense be able to submit a more accurate version of this speech. In accordance therewith, I submitted the Raeder Exhibit 77, a version coming from the witness General-admiral Boehm, and believe to have shown within the framework of the evidence that it is here a question of a more accurate version than the versions of the Prosecution documents. Thereupon, Sir David Maxwell-Fyfe handed in two documents under GB 464 and GB 465 in which he compares in the most scrupulous way Boehm's version with the versions 1014-PS and 798-PS by which he considerably facilitated the comparison of these documents. In order on my part to facilitate also this comparison for the high Tribunal and for the Prosecution, I requested Generaladmiral Boehm in the meantime to compare the versions under consideration himself also and that by using the compilations of the British Prosecution mentioned just now. The result is to be found in Boehm's Affidavit which I submitted as Raeder Exhibit 129.

When surveying all this material, it results that Document 1014-PS is extremely incomplete and inaccurate, all the more so as, apart from its formal deficiencies, it is only 1½ pages long, and for this reason cannot be an adequate reproduction of a 2½ hours' speech.

Document 798-PS no doubt is better, but also reveals numerous inaccuracies as shown by Boehm's Affidavit. It is not a question of every passage. The point, however, is that precisely some of the most important passages from which the Commanders-in-Chief might more likely be charged have actually not been spoken according to Boehm's sworn statement. According to Boehm's Affidavit it is not true that Hitler declared that he had decided as early as Spring 1939 to attack the West first of all, and only afterward to attack the East. Nor have the words been used: "I only fear that at the last moment a filthy fellow will submit me an offer of mediation, we shall continue in the pursuit of our political goal." And the most decisive thing is that the words: "Annihilation of Poland in the foreground, the aim is to eliminate the living forces and not to reach a determined line," have not been used; Hitler only spoke of the breaking up of the military forces.

These differences in individual words and turns of phrase are very important. For the differences lie precisely in the sharp phrasing to which the Prosecution frequently drew attention, and from which the intention of a war violating international law, even the intention to assassinate civilians can be derived. If these phrases had been spoken, we would justly reproach the Commanders-in-Chief present with having waged the war at Hitler's order, in spite of the criminal end in view. If, however, these sentences have not been used, but, as Boehm testifies under oath, merely sentences aiming at the establishing of a military goal, the Prosecution cannot reproach any of the Commanders-in-Chief present with having remained at their posts. No one can in earnest demand of an Admiral the resignation of his post a few days before the outbreak of a war, thus shaking the military power of his own Fatherland. I am quite sure that the most serious reproaches can be leveled at any rate against Hitler's attitude after the Munich Agreement up to the outbreak of the war in Poland, but—and this is decisive for the Raeder case—not against the military command, but exclusively against the political Fuehrer. We know that Hitler himself also admitted this, and evaded the responsibility by committing suicide, without having the slightest regard even for the life and the well-being of the German people during and especially at the end of the war.

DEFENSE

d. Hitler's speech delivered to the Commanders-in-Chief on 23 November 1939 (798-PS, USA 23) :

I believe I can cut it relatively short with regard to this last key document. Again, it is a document without signature, the author of which, therefore, is not known, and without any indication as to the date of writing. It is no official transcript; again it pursues a special trend. Early in November 1939 a serious difference arose between Hitler and the Generals; for Hitler intended to start the offensive in the West immediately, whereas the Generals were of a different opinion, and apparently hoped that the outbreak of a real World War might still be avoided. Hitler's dissatisfaction and annoyance with his Generals show themselves clearly. In consequences of this, he strives to show by customary repetition of his former actions what he has accomplished and further to show that he has always been in the right. It is really a typical Hitler speech which corresponds to his public speeches in which he also loved to put on airs and to boast of being gifted with genius. Hitler, after all, belonged to those people who always believe themselves in the right and avail themselves of every opportunity to prove it. He further took the opportunity of stifling at birth, by threats, resistance in high military circles, resistance which had become known to him, and in this way of establishing his dictatorship. It is absolutely significant when he says literally in this document: "I shall not shrink from anything and will destroy everyone who is against me." This has also been recognized by leading foreign military personalities. I refer for example to General Marshall's official report which speaks about the "Lack in far-reaching planning in military respect" and in particular about the fact that the German High Command did not have an all-embracing strategic plan, and points out in this connection that "Hitler's prestige reached the stage that one no longer dared to oppose his views."

Finally it only remains to be pointed out in this last key document that at this time the war was already in progress, and that the higher military officers cannot be blamed if in the war they strove in all their plannings to come off victorious. The Allies were also planning at the same time. I refer to the documents Ribbentrop Exhibit 22 and Raeder Exhibit 34. The former document dates from 1 September 1939; it is a confidential letter from General Gamelin to Daladier, and contains the basic idea that it is necessary to invade Belgium in order to wage the war outside the French frontier. The latter document deals with military plans in the same way in a confidential letter from General Gamelin to General Lelong, military attache of the French Embassy in London, of 13 November 1939, and also concerns the enterprise in Holland and Belgium planned by the Allies.

IV

I now come to the events of the wartime period. I think I have shown that the navy had an extremely insignificant part in all events prior to the War, and that the transactions in which the navy was authoritatively involved were carried out on a peace basis, namely, on the basis of the Naval Treaty with England. When the war nevertheless ultimately broke out on the 3 September 1939, also involving England, a regrettable incident occurred at the outset, on the first day, namely the sinking of the "Athenia," from which the Prosecution attempts, in exaggerated terms, to construe a ponderous moral accusation against Raeder, not so much indeed on the basis of its actual military side, that is, the sinking, which my colleague Dr. Kranzbuehler has already discussed, as on account of an article published in the "Voelkischer Beobachter" of 23 October 1939 and entitled "Churchill Sank The Athenia." Were the statement of facts brought forward by the Prosecution correct, the moral accusations against Raeder and the navy would be justified, even though, of course, an untruthful newspaper article is no crime. Consequently, the accusation brought by the Prosecution is only made for the purpose of deprecating Raeder's personality in contradiction to the life-long esteem which Raeder has enjoyed in the whole world and especially abroad.

I think the evidence has sufficiently revealed that the statement of facts presented by the Prosecution is not correct. Surely this must be our conclusion if the Prosecution believed at first that the odious article in the "Voelkischer Beobachter" could not have appeared without the knowledge of the Naval Command. The Prosecution believed this because, in view of their conspiracy complex, they think there was permanent intelligence and close cooperation between the various departments in every case. The course of the Trial has shown how little this assumption is correct. The opposition between the individual departments and especially between the navy and Propaganda Ministry, between Raeder and Goebbels was far greater than the opposition between individual departments in a democratic State. Consequently, the testimonies of witnesses Raeder, Schulte-Moenting, Weizsaecker, and Fritzsche, together with the documents, establish the following facts absolutely clearly:

DEFENSE

1. In early September 1939 Raeder himself firmly believed that the sinking was not imputable to a German U-Boat because it was revealed by the reports that the nearest German U-Boat was at least 75 nautical miles away from the spot of the sinking.
2. Accordingly, Raeder, as stated in Document D-912, published a "bona fide" denial, and issued declarations to this effect to the American Naval attache and to the German Secretary of State Baron Weizsaecker.
3. Raeder did not realize the mistake until after the return of the U-30 on the 27 September 1939.
4. Hitler insisted, as evidenced by witnesses Raeder and Schulte-Moenting, that no rectification of the facts should be made to any other German or foreign department, that is to say, that the sinking should not be acknowledged as caused by a German U-Boat. He apparently yielded to the impulse of political considerations and wished to avoid complications with the USA over an incident which could not be remedied, however regrettable it was.
5. Fritzsche disclosed that after the first investigation by the navy in early September 1939, he made no further investigation and that the "Voelkischer Beobachter" article appeared as a consequence of a complete agreement between Hitler and Goebbels, without previous notice to Raeder. On this point the testimonies of Raeder and Schulte-Moenting coincide. It is consequently clear that Raeder—in contradiction to the claim of the Prosecution—was not the author of the article and moreover had heard nothing about the article before its appearance. I regret that, in spite of this clarification, the Prosecution apparently are intent upon persisting in their claim by the production, on the 3 July 1946, of a new Document D-912.

This newly submitted Document contains only radio broadcasts by the Propaganda Ministry which are of the same kind as the "Voelkischer Beobachter" article. These radio broadcasts were a propaganda instrument of Goebbels and cannot, any more than the article, be brought up as a charge against Raeder, who, in fact, was at the time informed of the article only and not of the radio broadcasts. Even the fact that Raeder did not attempt any rectification after being informed of the article, cannot be made a moral charge against him since he was bound by Hitler's order and had no idea at the time that Hitler himself had a hand in the article which Weizsaecker aptly described as perverse fantasy.

I venture, in this connection, to remind the Tribunal that it is a notorious fact that precisely at the beginning of the war, inaccurate reports also appeared in the English press about alleged German atrocities which even after this clarification were not rectified, as for instance, the false report about the murder of 10,000 Czechs in Prague by German elements in September 1939, although the matter had been cleared by a commission of neutral journalists.

The Prosecution believe they possess overwhelming material against all the defendants. If this presumption were correct with reference to Raeder, the Prosecution would scarcely have felt the necessity of bringing forward precisely this "Athenia" case in such ponderous and injurious terms with the sole purpose of discrediting the former Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy.

V

Concerning Greece the Prosecution makes accusation against Raeder of violation of neutrality and breach of international law, namely:

1. On the basis of Document C-12, according to which Hitler decided on the basis of a report by Raeder on 30 December 1939 that:

"Greek merchant ships in the zone around England which the USA declared prohibited are to be treated like enemy ships."

2. According to Document C-167 on the occasion of delivery of a report to Hitler on 18 March 1941, Raeder asked for confirmation that "all of Greece is to be occupied, even in case of peaceful settlement."

In the course of the trial both accusations have turned out to be without support; in both cases there is no action which violated international law.

DEFENSE

Ad 1. Raeder and the German naval command learned in October/November 1939 that quite a number of Greek merchant ships had been put at the disposal of England, either at the instance or with the approval of the Greek government. This fact cannot be reconciled with strict neutrality and, according to principles of international law, it gave Germany the right to take an equivalent countermeasure. This justified countermeasure consisted in treating Greek ships, which sailed for England, as enemy ships from the moment they were in the zone around England which had been declared prohibited by the United States.

Ad. 2. Germany, especially the High Command of the Navy, had received reports that certain Greek military and political circles maintained the closest connection to the Allied General Staff ever since 1939.

In time there had been more and more reports. What the Allies were planning on the Balkans is known; the intentions were the erection of a Balkan front against Germany. For this purpose local conditions in Greece, as well as in Rumania, were examined on the part of the Allied General Staff of the Allied officers in order to build airplane bases there. Furthermore preparations were made to land in Greece. As proof I have presented as Raeder Exhibit 59, the minutes for the session of the French war committee of 26 April 1940, which shows that the war committee at that time had already checked the question of possible operations in the Caucasus area and on the Balkans, from which results the activity of General Jauneaud in Greece for the continuation of investigations and preparations and the attempt to camouflage the trip by making it in civilian clothing.

This attitude of Greece and especially her agreement with Allied plans represents a violation of neutrality on the part of Greece; for Greece did not appear as England's ally, but formally continued to maintain her neutrality. Therefore Greece could no longer figure that Germany would fully respect Greek neutrality. Germany nevertheless respected Greek neutrality for a long time to come. The occupation of Greece took place in April 1941 only after British troops had already landed in Southern Greece on 3 March 1941.

The fact that Greece agreed to the English landing is, according to generally recognized rules, without importance in international legal relations and for the international legal decision between Germany and England and between Germany and Greece; it has importance only for the legal relations between England and Greece.

The British Prosecution tried to justify the occupation of Greece with the fact that Greek neutrality was menaced by Germany, especially by the occupation of Bulgaria on 1 March 1941. Herein the Prosecution is overlooking that not only the execution of the occupation of Greece by British forces, but also the planning of the Allies started essentially earlier than the German planning. But however that may be, no accusation, at all, can be raised against Raeder; because the date of Document C-167 submitted by the Prosecution is 18 March 1941, which means it is 14 days later than the landing of the English in Southern Greece. In any case, at that time Greece could no longer demand that her alleged neutrality be respected. But beyond that the accusation is also unjustified, when the Prosecution points out that Raeder asks for confirmation for all of Greece to be occupied. This question of Raeder was not a causal factor for the fact that all of Greece was occupied: for Hitler had provided already in his Order 20 of 13 December 1940—1541-PS—that the entire Greek continent was to be occupied in order to frustrate English intentions of creating a dangerous basis for air operations under the protection of a Balkan front, especially for the Rumanian oil district. In addition to that the inquiry of Raeder on 18 March 1941 was justified on strategic grounds because Greece offered many landing possibilities for the English, and the only possible defense was for Greece to be firmly in the hands of Germany, as witnesses Raeder and Schulte-Moenting have explained.

This strategic idea of Raeder had nothing to do with plans of conquest or desire for glory, as the Prosecution thinks; for the navy won no glory whatsoever in Greece because the occupation was a land operation, and the occupation of an originally neutral country is simply the regrettable consequence of such a big war; it cannot be charged to one belligerent if both belligerents had plans concerning the same state and carried out these plans.

VI

I should like now to go on to the subject of Norway. On 9 April 1940, troops of all 3 sections of the German Armed Forces occupied Norway and Denmark. From this and the preceding plans, the Prosecution have drawn up the most grave accusation against Grand Admiral Raeder, alongside, I understand, with the collective charge of participation in a conspiracy.

The British Prosecutor has pointed out that it was Raeder who first suggested the occupation of Norway to Hitler and believes that Raeder accomplished the occupation out of a spirit of conquest and vainglory. I propose to demonstrate that this argumentation is incorrect. Only one thing is correct, that is, that in this single instance Raeder took the initiative of first approaching

DEFENSE

Hitler on the subject of Norway, namely, on the 10 October 1939. I shall, however, show that he has in fact acted not as a politician but exclusively as a soldier. Raeder sensed purely strategic dangers, and pointed out these strategic dangers to Hitler, because he assumed that the Allies contemplated the establishment of a new front in Scandinavia, in Norway in particular, and knew that an occupation of Norway by England could have a militarily decisive consequence to the detriment of Germany. I shall show that Germany has committed no violation of international law by the occupation of Norway. Before I state the juridical foundation and connect the facts established by the appraisal of evidence with the principles of international law, I should like first to state an important fact:

It is very reluctantly that Raeder acted as Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy in the Norway action, as is disclosed by his own and Schulte-Moenting's interrogations. Raeder had the natural feeling of justice that a neutral state could not be drawn into the existing war without an absolutely imperative emergency. In the period between October 1939 and Spring 1940, Raeder had always defended the opinion that by far the best solution would be that Norway and all Scandinavia remain absolutely neutral. This, Raeder and Schulte-Moenting disclosed unanimously at their interrogation, and it is, moreover, proved by documents. For this, I refer to Raeder Exhibit 69. In this, the conviction of Raeder that the most favorable solution is undoubtedly the preservation of the strictest neutrality by Norway is entered in the War Diary on 13 January 1940. Raeder had clearly convinced himself that an occupation of Norway by Germany for motives of international justice or strategy could only be conceivable if Norway could not or would not maintain an absolute neutrality.

The Prosecution has referred to the treaties between Germany and Norway, in particular to Document TC-31, in which the German Government on 2 September 1939 expressly assures Norway of her inviolability and integrity. In this memorandum, the following legitimate remark is added:

"If the Reich Cabinet makes this declaration it, of course, also expects that Norway, in turn, will observe irreproachable neutrality toward the Reich, and that it will not tolerate breaches of Norwegian neutrality should attempts along that line be made by third parties."

If despite this fundamental attitude, Germany yet decided to occupy Norway, this was done because of the threat that the plans of the Allies created the danger of occupation of Norwegian bases by them. In his opening speech Sir Hartley Shawcross declared that according to the indictment, Germany's breach of neutrality and its war of aggression against Norway remained criminal, even if Allied plans for occupation had been correct; and he added that in reality such plans were not true. I believe that the argument advanced here by Sir Hartley Shawcross is contrary to accepted international law. If Allied plans for the occupation of Norwegian bases existed, and there were danger that Norway neither would nor could maintain strict neutrality, in such a case accepted standards of international law did justify Germany's Norway campaign.

I may first revert to the juridical angle according to accepted standards of international law in order to create a foundation for my own reasoning, while I shall at the same time try to set forth the legal viewpoints which contradict the Prosecution's interpretation. In order to save time in this legal exposition, and in order to make the conception comprehensible I have submitted as Raeder Exhibit 66 an opinion on international law on the Norway Campaign by Dr. Hermann Mosler, a Professor of International Law at the University of Bonn. The High Tribunal will bear in mind that I was given permission to make use of this opinion for purposes of argumentation and I may therefore refer at this point to this detailed scientific compilation and argument. In my final pleading I shall confine myself to a summary of the most essential concepts of legal opinion.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Hague Convention on Rights and Obligations of Neutrals in the event of Warfare at Sea stipulate that "the parties at war are bound to respect the rights of sovereignty of neutral powers in the territory and coastal waters of the neutral power," and that all unfriendly acts on the part of the belligerent parties within the delimitation of the coastal waters of a neutral power "are strictly banned as violations of neutrality." Contrary to these stipulations, Great Britain violated Norway's neutrality through the laying of mines in Norwegian coastal waters for the purpose of obstructing the legitimate passage of German warships and merchantmen, especially in order to cut off the exportation of iron ore from Narvik to Germany. In the letter of the Foreign Office which I received in reply to my petition for authorization to submit files of the British Admiralty, confirmation as per Raeder Exhibit 130 was received to the effect that His Majesty's forces laid mine fields in Norwegian waters, and in addition it was stated that this was a well known fact.

It should be an uncontested fact that thereupon Germany was justified in reestablishing the disturbed equilibrium between the belligerent parties, in other words in wresting from the enemy's forces the benefit they were deriving from violation of neutrality.

DEFENSE

Reaction against such violation of neutrality is primarily directed against the adversary and not against the neutral party. Legal relationship deriving from neutrality exists not only between the neutral party and the two belligerent parties, but the neutrality of the respective neutral State is at the same time a factor in direct relations existing between the belligerent parties. If the relationship of neutrality between one of the belligerent parties and the neutral Power suffers disturbance, the neutral Power can in no way file a complaint if the other belligerent Power take appropriate action, in which case it is entirely immaterial whether the neutral State is unable or unwilling to protect its neutrality.

The legal title under which the prejudiced belligerent Power can proceed to countermeasures is the "Recht der Selbsterhaltung" ["the right of self-preservation"]. As brought out in detail by legal opinion, this right of self-preservation is generally accepted by international law. It may suffice to point out here that this basic law is not affected by the Kellogg Pact so often mentioned in this Court. I may therefore also ask permission for a brief quotation from the circularized memorandum of the American Secretary of State Kellogg dated 23 June 1938, as follows:

"There is nothing in the American draft on an anti-war treaty which restricts or impairs the right of self-preservation in any manner. That right is inherent in every Sovereign State and is implicit in every treaty."

Justice Jackson will permit me to mention that he himself, in his opening speech of 21 November 1945, referred to "the right of legitimate self-preservation."

It is interesting that in his address before the Parliament, on 8 February 1940, the Swedish Foreign Minister Guenther recognized this idea, although he protected the interests of one of the belligerents and although this speech was made before Germany proceeded to retaliatory measures in Norway. In that address Guenther took the attitude to the English declaration that Sweden's neutrality would be respected so long only as it would be respected by England's enemies. Guenther took cognizance of the fact that Sweden, in its relationship with England, would lose its neutrality should Germany violate Sweden's neutrality and should Sweden not be willing or able to prevent such violation of neutrality through Germany. Consequently, so said Guenther, Great Britain would no longer be held to treat Sweden as a neutral country. It is clear that the conclusions drawn by Guenther in the event of a breach of neutrality through Germany must also apply to the tri-partite legal relationship between Great Britain—Germany—Norway. The real aim, however, and this I shall set forth in my presentation of evidence, was not Great Britain's mining actions in Norwegian coastal waters, but a much further-reaching Anglo-French scheme aiming at the occupation of Norwegian bases and of a portion of the Norwegian home territory. The mining action enters into the picture merely as a part of the total plan.

According to Mosler's opinion and in the light of the above remarks, it is absolutely certain that Germany was justified in occupying Norway had the Allies carried part of their plan into effect by landing at a Norwegian base before German troops made their appearance. This, however, did not occur; rather, as I will show, the situation was that Germany anticipated an Anglo-French landing, in other words decided for countermeasures on account of the imminent danger which threatened.

Legally a second question should also be investigated: Assuming the same conditions, are countermeasures not permitted until after the other belligerent has proceeded to violate neutrality, or is reaction permitted in the presence of the imminently threatening violation of neutrality in order to anticipate the enemy's attack?

According to the findings composed by Dr. Mosler the preventive countermeasure is permissible, and the directly impending violation of neutrality which can be expected with certainty is to be considered equal to a completed violation of neutrality.

The well-known Anglo-Saxon specialist on international law, Westlake, states to the question of the preventive measure:

"Such a case in its character resembles that one, that a belligerent has the certain knowledge that his opponent, in order to gain a strategic advantage, is just about to have an army march through the territory of a neutral who is apparently too weak to resist; under these circumstances it would be impossible to refuse him the right to carry out the attack on the neutral territory first."

The justification for such a preventive measure, according to Westlake lies in the right for self-preservation which also applies against a threatening violation of neutrality. Another concept would also have been not true to life and would not correspond to the character of the society of nations as a majority of sovereign states with an as yet incompletely developed common law code. In the innerstate law system of every civilized country, the repulsing of an immediately threatening attack is a permissible defense act, although there even the help of the state against the law-breaker is furnished. In the society of international law, where this was not the case, anyway not at the beginning and during the 2d World War, the viewpoint of self-preservation must apply to an unequally stronger extent. In conjunction with this concept, the British government during this war also considered the preventive measure as justified, when it occupied Iceland on 10 May 1940. The British government has justified this measure clearly and correctly in accordance with international law in an official announcement of the Foreign Office, as follows:

DEFENSE

"After the German occupation of Denmark it has become necessary to count on the possibility of a sudden German advance to Iceland. It is clear, that the Icelandic government, in view of such an attack, even if it was only carried out with very small forces, would be unable to prevent its country from falling into the hands of the Germans completely."

The preventive measure was carried out, although Iceland expressly defended herself in a note of protest against the occupation.

I also ask to note that the United States agreed with this standpoint of law, as is proven by the well-known message of the President of the United States to Congress of 7 July 1941, and the subsequent occupation of Iceland through armed forces of the American Navy.

In accordance with these basic principles of law, the charge at hand must be examined. I have tried to clarify the charge in the presentation of evidence, and may I summarize the major viewpoints which actually showed a closely impending violation of neutrality on the part of the Allies through the partial occupation of Norway, and thereby justified the German action against Norway.

At the end of September and early October 1939, Grand Admiral Raeder, as the presentation of evidence has shown, received various information through the current reports of Admiral Canaris as director of intelligence, and through General Admiral Carls, which let the danger be recognized, that the Allies, in accordance with their plans to encircle Germany, would occupy bases in Norway in order to halt in particular the imports of ore from Scandinavia.

English airplane-crews camouflaged in civilian clothing were seen in Oslo, and survey works by Allied officers on Norwegian bridges, viaducts, and tunnels up to the Swedish border were identified. Furthermore, the quiet mobilization of Swedish troops because of the endangerment of Swedish ore-territories had become known. Raeder was justified in considering himself obligated to report this state of facts to Hitler and to point out the danger to him which would arise for Germany, if English and French armed forces were actually to fortify themselves in Scandinavia. The dangers were clear. They consisted of the cutting-off of all imports from the industrial areas of Scandinavia, in particular of the ore-imports, as well as in the fact, that the Allies obtained a favorable base for air attacks, and last but not least in the fact, that the German navy was threatened in its flank and its operational potentialities were limited. (Transcript, Morning Session, 22 May 1946.)

The blockade of the North Sea and Baltic would have had strategically disastrous consequences.

As the information did not yet offer a final over-all picture, Raeder did not suggest immediate occupation, but only pointed out the dangers in order to wait for further developments for the time being. Hitler therefore also did not make a final decision during this discussion of 10 October 1939 but agreed to wait. Similar information was received during the months of October and November and now also by the Naval attache Lieutenant Commander Schreiber who had in the meantime been sent to Oslo to whose Affidavit (Raeder Exhibit 107) I refer. The Norwegian shipping association had made tanker tonnage of about 1 million tons available to England with the consent of the Norwegian Government (see also Raeder Exhibit 86, War diary of 6 April 1940) according to which 90 percent of the Norwegian tankers had been put at the disposal of England.

In Winter 1939-40, the information concerning espionage missions of the English and French Secret Service to Norwegian agents and English harbor consulates for the purpose of reconnoitering landing opportunities and examination of Norwegian Railroads with regard to their capacity, particularly the Narvik line and missions concerning information about land and sea airports in Norway, took more definite form. By reason of the fact that the information from 2 different sources, namely the Naval Attache Oslo and Admiral Canaris, corresponded and became gradually more extensive during the months of October to December 1939, the reported danger seemed to increase slowly all the time.

In addition, in December 1939 Quisling and Hagelin sent to Rosenberg—entirely independent of the sources of information which had existed up to that time—the same or similar information concerning the landing intention of the Allies, and not directly to Raeder, for the only reason that Raeder didn't know either Quisling or Hagelin at that time. As the question involved was a purely military-strategic one, Rosenberg asked Raeder to discuss things with Quisling so that Raeder could examine the military technical possibilities in consideration of the fact that an aggression by the Allies in Scandinavia must be expected according to the information received. This is evident from the letter of Rosenberg to Raeder of 13 December 1939 which I submitted as Raeder Exhibit 67. Raeder now considered it his duty from the purely military point of view to inform Hitler with whom he had not discussed this question in the meantime that corresponding information had meanwhile been received from Canaris, the Naval Attaché in Oslo and Quisling. Hitler wished to speak personally with Quisling, which he did, and decided then to make the necessary preparations for a possible preventive measure to counter the danger threatening, namely, the occupation of Norway (C-64 —GB 86 of 12 Dec. 1939, where it is pointed out that the danger of the occupation of Norway by England was very threatening, and that Norway must not fall into the hands of England, as this could be of great importance to the course of the war).

DEFENSE

The final decision was still deferred and information as to what further news would be received and whether the danger increased was awaited.

This caution and delay seems particularly understandable in the case of Raeder. As I have already remarked, Raeder would have preferred if the strict neutrality of Norway had been maintained, especially as he was against every conquest just for the sake of conquest. He knew on the other hand that an occupation required the commitment of the whole navy, thus involving the fate of the entire navy, and that the loss of at least a third of the fleet had to be reckoned with. It should be clear without further ado how hard, from such political and strategic view-points, such a decision was for a conscientious man and soldier.

There was more news unfortunately during the first months of the year 1940 and always more definite. In March 1940 surprisingly many English speaking persons could be seen in Oslo, and Raeder received very serious information, worth of credit, about shortly impending measures by the Allies against Norway and also Sweden. As far as landing intentions were concerned, Narvik, Drontheim, and Stavanger were mentioned. Thus it came about that the military planning only took place in February and March and that the final instructions were issued to the Wehrmacht even as late as March 1940. (See testimony Schulte-Moenting of 22 May 1946, morning session of transcript.)

There were also numerous violations of neutrality in March 1940 which have been collected in the war diary (Raeder Exhibit 81; see also further entries in the war diary of 27 March 1940 Raeder Exhibit 82), and also the mine laying in Norwegian territorial waters at the beginning of April.

The Prosecution has delivered only a few documents against this comprehensive information material, according to which the German Ambassador in Oslo, Braeuer, did not regard the danger so great, but believed that the English attitude, mentioned also by him, pointed merely to provocation of Germany in order that Germany might give cause for war operations in Norwegian waters. (D-843, GB 466; D-844, GB 467; D-845, GB 486.)

Baron Weizsaecker's point of view in cross-examination was that at first he did not consider the danger so great, but admitted that later on the facts proved that he and Braeuer were wrong, but Raeder on the contrary was right in his apprehension.

This objective accuracy of the conception of Grand Admiral Raeder and of the information which was the basis of his conception is shown from separate documents submitted by me and accepted by the Court.

Since 16 January 1940, the French High Command had been working on a plan which had in view, amongst other things, the occupation of harbors and flying fields on the West Coast of Norway. The plan contemplated in addition that the operations should possibly be extended to Sweden and the mines of Gaellivare be occupied. Efforts have been made to justify this plan by stating that it was elaborated solely to help Finland against the Soviet Union. To begin with it could be objected that an action in support of Finland does not justify any occupation of Norwegian territory. Moreover the documents show that it was not a question of only altruistic measures in favor of Finland. During the interallied military conferences on 31 January and 1 February which preceded the meeting of the Supreme Council on 5 February, the question of direct help for Finland was relegated by the English to the second place; they showed themselves to be determined adherents of an enterprise against the mines of Northern Sweden. This is confirmed by General Gamelin in a note of 10 March 1940 and he adds that this opinion obtained the majority vote in the Supreme Council, and that the preparation of the Scandinavian Expedition should be started immediately. And so it came about that the Franco-British fighting forces had been ready for transportation since the first days of March, whereby, according to Gamelin, the leadership of the proposed operations in Scandinavia was transferred to the British High Command. Gamelin adds finally that the Scandinavian plans must be resolutely pursued further in order to save Finland "or at least to lay hands on the Swedish ores and the Northern harbors".

Lord Halifax informed the Norwegian Ambassador on 7 February that England wished to obtain certain bases on the Norwegian coast in order to stop the German transport of ore from Narvik.

DEFENSE

In mid-February, English and French general staff officers visited landing places in agreement with the Norwegian authorities.

According to a report of the Embassy in Stockholm, dated 16 February 1940, the English intention in this respect was to land troops simultaneously in Bergen, Drontheim, and Narvik.

On the 21 February 1940, Daladier communicates to the French Ambassador in London, Corbin, that the occupation of the most important Norwegian ports and the landing of the 1st Division of the Allied Fighting Forces in Norway would give Sweden a feeling of security and goes on to say that this operation must be planned and executed at shortest notice, "independently of Finland's call for assistance." In the event of this "démarche" in Norway meeting with refusal, which was likely, the British Government was to confirm the Norwegian refusal and immediately seize control of the bases it needed for the safeguarding of its interests, and was to do so in the form of a "surprise operation." Whether Sweden refuses the passage through to Finland does not appear important; what is emphasized is rather the "advantage of having secured a dominating position against Germany in the North, interrupted the sea transport of Swedish ore, and brought the Swedish ore districts within the radius of action of our aviators".

On the 27 February 1940, Churchill declared in the British House of Commons that he was "tired of considering the rights of Neutrals."

It is interesting to note that unanimity is achieved in the 6th session of the Supreme Council on the 28 March 1940:

"Every attempt of the Soviet Government to obtain from Norway a position on the Atlantic coast runs counter to the vital interests of the Allies and would elicit due countermeasures."

The conception thus defended by the Supreme Council with reference to the vital interests of the Allies coincides exactly with the legitimate notions of "right of self-preservation" presented by me and is in complete contradiction to the interpretation of international law propounded in this respect by the Prosecution.

The ultimate execution of the operation in Norway, that is, the landing and the constitution of bases, was decided on the 28 March 1940 between the authoritative British and French departments. This date was indicated at a session of the French War Committee by the French Prime Minister, and General Gamelin added that he had on the 29 March impressed upon General Ironside the necessity of having everything ready for a swift occupation of the Norwegian ports. He said he had also informed Mr. Churchill to the same effect on the occasion of a visit to Paris.

On the 30 March, Churchill declares on the Radio:

"It would not be fair if, in the fight for life or death, the Western Powers adhered to legal agreements."

On 2 April 1940, at 19:12 o'clock, London notified Paris by telegram that the first transport was "to sail on J. 1. day" and that J. 1 day was in principle 5 April.

On 5 April Earl De La Warr established that neither Germany nor the Neutrals could be certain that "England would allow her hands to be tied behind her back while following the letter of the law."

The English Minister of Labor Ernest Brown declared on 6 April 1940 that neither Germany nor the neutrals could be certain that the Western Powers would adhere to the letters of international law.

On the same day—this was one day after the laying of mines in Norwegian territorial waters—a secret English operational order was given "concerning preparations for the occupation of the northern Swedish ore fields outside Narvik."

In this order it was decided that the task of Avonforce consisted first of all in "securing the port of Narvik and the railroad to the Swedish border." It was added that it was the intention of the Commander-in-Chief to advance into Sweden and to occupy the Gaellivare ore fields and important points of that territory as such an opportunity occurred, a formulation, which almost reminds one of the words in prosecution Document L-79: "to attack Poland at the first appropriate opportunity."

The original plan to send the first transport to Norway on the 5 April was altered; for on the evening of the 5 April, the British High Command informs the Commander-in-Chief of the French navy that "the first English convoy could set out before the 8 April which, within the framework of the established time schedule, means that the first French division is to leave the embarkation port on the 16 April".

To complete the story, let it be pointed out that the Norwegian operation was designated by the allies by the camouflage name of "Stratford-Plan," meaning the action, while the German Norwegian operation was referred to by the camouflage name of "Weser Exercise" (Weseruebung).

The preceding facts show that:

Since Autumn 1939, preparations for eventual action in Norway were made by the studying of landing possibilities. Since January/February 1940 the danger of an occupation of bases in Norway by the Allies was threatening. In March 1940, the execution of the scheme was ultimately decided upon and the departure of the first convoy scheduled for the 5 April. Simultaneously, mine-laying was carried out in the Norwegian territorial waters and troops were at the same time concentrated in British and French ports for the Norwegian operation. Thus, factual illegality in the form of imminent neutrality violations existed from the point of view of international law, and neutrality violation had indeed been already committed to a certain extent (mine-laying). This was the point where Germany, in accordance with the international notion of the right of self-preservation, was entitled to resort to equivalent measures, that is, to occupy Norway and prevent the threatened occupation by other belligerent States. It was, in fact, as was shown later, the last moment; for Germany frustrated the allies only because the British High Command had postponed the departure of the first convoy originally scheduled for the 5 April. The German operation in Norway must therefore be considered as legitimate according to the principles of international law. I have the firm conviction that the High Court, in view of the circumstances just exposed in relation to existing international law, will conclude that Grand Admiral Raeder has, with regard to the occupation of Norway, acted from purely strategic points of view in due consideration of international legal standards and accordingly acquit him of the charge made by the Prosecution.

DEFENSE

With reference to Norway, the Prosecution has moreover charged against Raeder and incidentally against Doenitz that a violation of international law is entailed by the fact that according to an order dated 30 March 1940, the Naval Forces were, until the landing of troops, to fly the English flag. (C-151, GB 91; C-115, GB 90.)

This too is an error of the Prosecution as regards international law for sea warfare. The Hague regulation on land warfare does expressly forbid the abusive flying of flags. But in sea warfare the answer to this question, according to the prevailing international law, is definitely that until hostilities begin, ships may sail with their own or with enemy or neutral flags or even with no flags at all. I take the liberty, in this respect, of availing myself of Dr. Mosler's juridical treatment of the question in his judgment appearing under item 7 and in particular of his references to scientific literature on the subject, according to which the use of a foreign flag is universally considered as a legitimate war deception and is allowed and especially condoned by British practice, this in accordance with the historical precedent when Nelson, in the Napoleonic wars, flew the French flag off Barcelona to lure the Spanish ships.

This dispute is however superfluous in the present case because actually the order just mentioned instructing the flying of the English flag was according to documentary evidence cancelled on the 8 April, that is to say, prior to the execution of the Norway operation.

In conclusion, I only wish to emphasize with reference to the subject of Norway that after the occupation of Norway Raeder and the navy did everything they could to give a friendly character to the relations with Norway and to treat the country and the people honorably and well during the occupation, and to spare them every unnecessary burden. Raeder and the Admiral Commanding in Norwegian waters General Admiral Boehm have moreover endeavored to conclude a peace with Norway guaranteeing Norwegian national interests. Their efforts were frustrated by the institution by Hitler and Himmler of a so-called civil administration by the Reich Commissioner Terboven which unlike the Wehrmacht was connected with the Party, the SS, SD, and Gestapo. As confirmed by Boehm in his affidavit, Raeder repeatedly intervened with Hitler in favor of the ideas he shared with the Admiral in Command in Norwegian waters for good treatment of the Norwegian people and an early conclusion of peace and, together with Boehm, set himself with the utmost vigor against Terboven. Again, the tragic event is repeated here that the Wehrmacht, despite its utmost efforts, has neither been able to oppose Hitler's dictatorship nor the dictatorship exercised to Hitler's knowledge by such a mediocre Reich Commissioner as Terboven. The Norwegian people who had to suffer under the occupation know—and this is the only gratification for Raeder—that the navy was not the cause of these sufferings. On the other hand, it is interesting to know that the differences which cropped up between Hitler and Raeder with reference to Norway are precisely one of the chief motives which caused Raeder ultimately to insist upon his resignation. Other motives were that Raeder also had differences with Hitler, with reference to France, because here again Raeder urged the conclusion of peace, while Hitler with his excessive character was opposed to conciliatory steps of this kind in occupied countries. Raeder also had differences with Hitler with reference to Russia, because he was in favor of observance of the German-Russian treaty and declared against the breach of the Treaty and against war with Russia.

VII

I now come to the charge of the Prosecution with regard to a war of aggression against Russia. The charge of the Prosecution on this subject cannot be very well understood. It dealt with land warfare so that the navy did not have to meet any preparations with the exception of the few preparations in the Baltic Sea. The Prosecution itself has furthermore stated that Raeder had been opposed to the war against Russia. The only thing which could remain from the charge of the Prosecution is its claim (Transcript, afternoon session, 13 May 1946) that Raeder had fundamentally been in favor of the war against Russia also and had only been opposed to Hitler with regard to the time factor. With reference to C-170 the Prosecution states that Raeder had only recommended the postponement of the war against Russia until the time after the victory over England. According to Document C-170 this actually could appear this way. In reality, however, the case is different, and the true state of affairs has been cleared up by the detailed presentation of evidence. The witness Admiral Schulte-Moenting has clearly stated, without being contradicted in the cross-examination, that Raeder not only raised objections with regard to time limits, but that he fundamentally argued with Hitler against a campaign against Russia, and that because of moral reasons and reasons of international law; just because he was of the opinion that the nonaggression pact with Russia, as well as also the trade agreement would have to be observed under all circumstances. The navy was especially interested in the delivery agreements with Russia and has always tried to closely observe the treaties. Besides this basic principle of observing treaties, i.e., besides this general reason, Raeder represented the opinion that a war against Russia would also be false from the strategical standpoint. His own testimony and that of Schulte-Moenting show that in September, November, and December of 1940 Raeder tried again and again with Hitler to dissuade him from the thought of a war against Russia. It is correct that in Document C-170 only the strategical justification for his opposition has been recorded. However, this is not at all surprising because in the papers with the Naval Operations Staff naturally only justifications were recorded which were of naval technical and strategic importance, but not political reasons.

DEFENSE

I have already shown that Hitler fundamentally did not permit that Raeder as Commander-in-Chief of the Navy intervene in foreign-political questions, i.e., in things which did not belong in his department. If Raeder did once try this, contrary to the will of Hitler, and that in cases of special importance, then he could do it only under four eyes and accordingly could not then record these conversations in the war diary; however, he has always told everything to his chief of staff as his closest confidant. As the result of this, Schulte-Moenting could confirm clearly that Raeder in this case opposed Hitler because of moral misgivings, also with regard to international law and furthermore also employed strategical reasons in the hope of being able to influence Hitler sooner in this manner. Schulte-Moenting even stated—just like Raeder—that in November the latter had gained the impression after a discussion that he had dissuaded Hitler from his plans. I believe that this has clarified the matter, and only the tragical factor remains here also that Hitler paid just as little attention to Raeder in regard to political objections to Russia also, as in regard to Norway and France.

VIII

A similar fact is the reproach of the Prosecution referring to the war of aggression against U.S.A. and the violation of the Neutrality of Brazil. As both these reproaches are sufficiently refuted within the framework of the evidence, I am only going to discuss them briefly.

According to the statement of the Prosecution, Raeder somehow collaborated in the plan to induce Japan to attack America. As a matter of fact no naval strategic conferences were held between Japan and Raeder. Raeder was always of the firm conviction that a war against the USA must be prevented just as much as one against Russia. This perception is also understandable, because, furthermore, it had always been his opinion that Hitler should never be allowed to start a war against England. Since the war against England had now come about, it was Raeder's duty as Commander-in-Chief of the Navy to use all his strength to fight successfully against England. Raeder knew the limitations of the fighting ability of the navy, and it was therefore quite out of the question that he should have collaborated in an extension of the war, considering as he did the conduct of a war against England as a too difficult task. The GB 122 Document C-152 submitted by the Prosecution mentions a proposition that Japan should attack Singapore and that the U.S.A. should be kept out of the war. This suggestion made to Hitler that Japan must attack Singapore was in all points correct.

We were now in a war against England, and Raeder was forced to try to concentrate all his forces against England. He was thus justified in suggesting that Japan—as Germany's ally—should attack England. Moreover this one discussion of Raeder was held on 18 March 1941, whilst Hitler in his Instructions 24 of 5 March 1941 had established the directive that Japan must attack Singapore which he considered a key position of England (C-175, USA 151).

DEFENSE

According to the confirmation of Schulte-Moenting, Raeder was just as surprised as any other German by Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor. The Prosecution failed in its attempt to shake Schulte-Moenting's statement during his cross-examination by producing a telegram of the military attache in Tokio sent to Berlin on 6 December 1941. Not only had Raeder probably received this telegram after the attack had started, but in this telegram Pearl Harbor is not mentioned at all. (D-872, GB 480.)

That the charge of the Prosecution dealing with Brazil is refuted is proved by the fact that the Prosecution did not take up this point in any of the cross-examinations of Raeder, Schulte-Moenting, and Wagner. It deals with the charge that according to Jodl's diary, already 2 months before the outbreak of the German-Brazilian war, the Naval command had demanded the delivery of the arms needed against the Brazilian Warships and Merchantmen, which was agreed to. (1807-PS, GB 227.)

Apart from this testimony this case is refuted by documents, namely the complete excerpt of Jodl's diary, which I submitted as Raeder Exhibit 115 as well as by further submitted documents, Raeder Exhibit 116-118. These documents prove that Brazil had violated the rules of neutrality by permitting the USA to make use of Brazilian airdromes as a base for attacks on German and Italian U-Boats. The Brazilian Air Ministry has furthermore officially announced that attacks had been made by the Brazilian air-force. Considering such conduct against all rules of neutrality, the demand of the naval command for armed action against Brazilian Vessels is justified. In this case also the Prosecution did not succeed in proving Raeder to have committed a crime or even an offense against international law.

IX

The Prosecution has very carefully submitted an exceedingly large amount of material, and the many details implied necessarily great exactitude in the taking of evidence. I have endeavored to deal with all remonstrances regarding the evidence or in my pleading, and have endeavored to demonstrate that all the remonstrances, partly on factual, partly on legal grounds, do not represent the facts of a criminal case within the meaning of this Charter. In as far as I have not, in spite of my striving for great exactitude, dealt with certain documents, it was because they seemed to me of small importance, and in any case of no importance in criminal law, for instance the many cases in which Raeder was only mentioned because—without officially taking any part—he received a copy of the documents for routine reasons. It would have been tiring to go into such recurrent cases, even if the Prosecution unremittingly reiterated these formal indications, so that one was often inclined to remember the saying of Napoleon that repetition is that turn of speech which is the best evidence.

I further believe that in the final pleading for Grand Admiral Raeder I may leave aside an argumentation regarding the real war crimes or crimes against humanity, as I cannot establish any connection between these and Raeder from the material submitted by the Prosecution. Further no particular reproach is made against Raeder in this connection with the exception of the two cases connected with the commando order, namely the shooting of two soldiers in Bordeaux and the shooting of the British soldier Evans who was made a prisoner by the SS on the Swedish border after he had previously participated in the small weapons attack on the "Tirpitz". Thus far the reproach has been refuted by testimony so far as it concerns the navy. Both cases did not come, or came only later, to the knowledge of the Naval Command just before Raeder's departure. In both cases the act was committed on the basis of the commando order of Hitler himself or by the Security Service (SD) without the knowledge and will of the Naval Command; and—what is the most important—in both cases the documents of the Prosecution showed that these soldiers were in civilian clothes, and therefore were not entitled to the protection of the Geneva Convention. (See Doc. D-864, GB 457 concerning Evans. Document UK-57, GB 164, page 4 of original under figure 2 concerning Evans, where in the English translation the words "in civilian clothes" were inadvertently missing, and UK-57, page 5 of original concerning the Bordeaux case, where the express reference to civilian clothing does also exist. See further my re-cross-examination concerning Admiral Wagner on 14 May 1946, transcript, morning session, also my re-cross-examination of Admiral Schulte-Moenting on 22 May, afternoon session.)

All other criminal facts which the Prosecution submitted especially for the East I need not deal with, as Raeder did not participate in them. I hope also to have the approval of the Court in mentioning the handling of the Katyn case, in which the Court pointed out that Raeder was not involved, and therefore refused my collaboration as Counsel in this connection; from this I intend to draw the legal conclusion that, even in this round about way by the conspiracy, Raeder cannot be considered as burdened with these criminal facts, since he did not know of these events and had nothing to do with said events.

The evidence of the Prosecution rests on the wish to have its theoretical basic assumption prevail and be acknowledged, namely the idea that so many crimes cannot have been the conception of a single person, but rather that they result from the conspiracy of many, that they must have originated in a plot. These conspirators could logically in the first place have been only Hitler's own collaborators, that is to say the real National-Socialists. As, however, Hitler wished to realize, and did realize, results of military and economic importance, something peculiar occurred: There were no specialists among the National-Socialists for these particular tasks. Most of the National-Socialist collaborators did not previously follow a trade requiring technical education. Hitler therefore, despite his desire to have only National-Socialists around him took on as key people in particular fields persons who were not National-Socialists, such as for instance Schacht for economics, Neurath for politics and, for military tasks, Fritsch for the army and Raeder for the navy. The Prosecution followed him in the interests of its conspiracy theory without paying attention to the fact that these were no National-Socialists, and therefore in the last analysis could not really be counted among the conspirators, and without taking into account that Hitler used these non-National-Socialists only as technicians in a well-defined field, and this moreover only as long it seemed absolutely necessary to him and therefore he agreed to the elimination of these men which at bottom were not in sympathy with him as soon as the differences between them seemed irreconcilable which was bound to happen sooner or later with each of them in his own particular field.

DEFENSE

By this wide conception of the idea of conspiracy and by this extension of the Prosecution's fight against non-National-Socialists, the Prosecution has abandoned the basic concept which was formerly propagated abroad, namely that of the fight against National-Socialism, but not against the whole of Germany, two ideas which at no time and in no place have been really identical, as the Prosecution now tries to make out. I do believe that thereby the Prosecution also abandons President Roosevelt's basic idea.

But another factual and legal point of view has not been taken into consideration by the Prosecution. I mean the concept of division of competence in political law, that is to say the subdivision into individual competencies. This division of competence—resting on the idea of division of labor—has, in accordance with its essence, a separative character; it divides the field of work from the angle of local, functional, and technical points of view. For one thing it positively defines the limits within which any single division is to become active; at the same time it defines negatively the boundaries of this activity by specifying which are the things which no longer concern the agencies in question, that is to say where they must not develop any official activity.

In a democracy, an additional contact exists by virtue of the general Cabinet meetings and/or through the Prime Minister, the Reich President, or the Reich Chancellor. But it is different in a dictatorship, particularly if the dictator—as it was the case with Hitler in the National-Socialist State—uses the separation between the individual governmental departments with extreme skill and sees to it that the individual departments are as isolated as possible, with the result that all decision rests finally with him as the dictator, in which case he even plays out one department against the other.

The partitioning into governmental departments carried out in the National-Socialist State contradicts the concept of conspiracy especially distinctly, making it difficult for the individual to go above his own department in any manner.

This significance may be described by the following example: The formulation of political relations with other States, the contracting or rescission of agreements or alliances with other States, declaring war and concluding peace are matters within the jurisdiction of the authority directing foreign affairs, but they are not within the jurisdiction of the authorities concerned with domestic tasks, such as for instance the Reich Finance Administration, Justice, and the Military.

The result is: Since the decision concerning war and peace is not a matter of the military, the military has to accept the decisions made by the political leadership, decisions which have a binding obligation for the military authorities.

The military commander must assume for his department the consequences resulting from the decision. As soon as war is declared, the military forces must fight. They do not bear any responsibility for the war because they were not able to take part in the decision concerning the declaration of war.

Consequently for an army the concept of war of aggression exists in the strategic sense only. Moreover, every war, the waging of which is charged to it, is simply war regardless whether it may legally be justified or not.

Responsibility from the point of view of constitutional law and criminal law corresponds to the field of jurisdiction. Therefore, if the Commander-in-Chief of a branch of the Wehrmacht assumes responsibility solely for the waging of war, not for the causes leading to war, his responsibility in respect to strategic planning must be confined to planning as such, but not to the possible causes which brought about that war on which the strategic planning is based.

DEFENSE

This constitutionally and criminally important division of governmental departments and the distribution of authority was carried out by Hitler in a particularly emphatic manner in the interest of strengthening his own power in many domains, such as for instance, the creation of "The Commissioner for the Four-Year-Plan" whose field of work actually belongs to the Ministry for Economics; the creation of Reich commissioner in the occupied territories, whose activity really comes under military administration, and, finally, a fact of interest in the case Raeder, the strict limitation between the three branches of the Wehrmacht and the elimination of the Reichswehr Minister of the and/or Minister of War who held the three branches of armed services together and unified them. The greater the number of the governmental departments became, and the more the departments were cut off from one another, the stronger Hitler became as a dictator as the only one with authority over all the innumerable agencies. But with this the constitutional as well as the criminal responsibility of the chief of the individual department decreased and with it also the responsibility for strategic planning in one individual department, in this instance the navy.

Consequently, the Commander-in-Chief of a branch of the Wehrmacht, thus for instance the navy, can in case of strategic planning only be responsible for the planning of naval strategy; he did not have an over-all view of the total planning. Total planning was discussed nowhere; politically and militarily it was in Hitler's hands exclusively because he alone was the center where all threads and all activities of the individual departments joined.

In addition, no purely strategic planning as such can be criminal because it is customary in every country and because in every country the military commander of a branch of the armed forces does not and can not know for what purpose the political leadership will use the plan prepared by him, whether it is a war of aggression or a defensive war.

The documents submitted in my document book prove convincingly that the military agencies, both of the Allies as well as in Germany, worked out strategical plans in the same way and in the same areas and at the same times, namely in regard to Norway, Belgium, Holland, Greece, Rumania, and moreover the Allied plans for the destruction of the Rumanian oil fields and especially of the oil sources in the Caucasus. Especially the plans concerning the Caucasus on the part of the Supreme Council, i.e., of the combined British and French General Staff, show the correctness of the statements. The Supreme Council would certainly decline to be made politically responsible for these strategical plans, although the Soviet Union was still neutral at the time thereof, and the execution of the plans were to strike not only the enemy country Germany, but also the neutral Soviet Union, as the documents also show.

The similarity of the documents concerning such plans is absolutely convincing and shows a strong parallel trend. May I point in this connection to my earlier statements made here on the occasion of the comprehensive discussion regarding the importance and admissibility of the documents submitted by me; may I also point in addition to Document Raeder Exhibit 130, namely, the letter of the Foreign Office in which submission of the British Admiralty files is refused, but in which the plans in regard to Norway and the whole of Scandinavia are admitted, but with the addition that the planning was not transformed into action, a fact which depended only on Germany's having started the execution of the planning first.

One may be a pacifist and therefore basically opposed to military force, but then one must be consistent and must take a stand not only against German military force, but against any military force. One may condemn the fact that the military, as the operational authorities, prepare military plans, and may in future insist that such plannings are punishable. But then not only German military planning, but also foreign military planning must be punishable.

The above statements show that the Prosecution misjudges the actual and legal conditions, if it wishes to make Raeder responsible for political decisions, although he had nothing to do with them, but has always worked as soldier only. Just as little as it could be suggested 130 years ago to bring before a Court an Admiral of the dictator Napoleon, so just as little can one now condemn an Admiral of the dictator Hitler. Particularly with dictators—and the Prosecution overlooks this—not only the power and the influence of a military commander diminishes but his responsibility must also diminish to the same extent; for the dictator has seized all power and with it all responsibility. All the more so, if a dictator appears with such an extraordinary will and such immense power, as Hitler. The French Prosecutor said in a particularly pertinent way on 7 February 1946 before this Tribunal word for word:

"Hitler was actually the incarnation of all willpower."
The resulting strength and power has been hardly considered by the Prosecution, and, in any case, it has not been taken into consideration at the presentation of the facts and the legal conclusions. How great this power is, Gustave le Bon shows in his famous book "Psychology of the Masses" in the chapter "The Leader of the Masses." I quote from it:

DEFENSE

"Within the class of leaders a somewhat strict division can be made. The energetic people with strong wills, but without perseverance belong to the one kind; the people with a strong, persevering will belong to the other kind, which is much rarer * * *. The second class of leaders, those with a persevering will, exercises a much more important influence, in spite of its less brilliant appearance."

Hitler belongs to this second class of leaders, who, in agreement with this quotation, exercised an immense influence, and who, on the other hand, was unimpressive in his brown uniform.

Gustave le Bon continues:

"The unyielding will, which they possess is an exceedingly rare and powerful attribute which subordinates everything to it. One does not always realize what a strong and persistent will can achieve. Nothing can resist it, neither nature nor Gods nor men."

In view of these words, one must realize that Raeder could not resist also.

Accordingly, only the question remains: can revolt ever be a soldier's duty, an open revolt? This question will be denied by every commander all over the world and likewise by any other men with one exception only, if it is the case of a dictator committing a crime the criminality of which is recognized by the military commander himself. Accordingly, Raeder could be made responsible for a military crime only, but not for a political one, because for the political crime, the dictator himself must answer. Should the Prosecution have come to some other conclusion regarding Raeder it has only occurred—as I have already emphasized in my introduction—because, in their misconception of the actual and juridical pacts, they regarded Raeder as politician and soldier. But he was a soldier only. He lived for the navy alone, for the welfare of the navy for which he also is now prepared to bear all responsibility to the full extent. He has led the navy in a unified manner, and, aided by his officer-corps, has taught them to think decently and to fight morally, to fight up to humanity's expectations of a soldier.

It must not be that, as a result of the deeds of a Hitler and his National-Socialism, the officers and soldiers of this navy be defamed by their highest ranking officer being declared a criminal. From an historic viewpoint Raeder may be guilty, because he, as many others within the country and abroad, did not know or see through Hitler, and did not have the strength to resist the dynamic strength of a Hitler, but an omission is no crime. What Raeder did or left undone in his life was in the belief that he was acting correctly and, that as a conscientious soldier, he had to act in this way. Raeder is highly regarded as an officer who is not a criminal and cannot be a criminal since all his life he has lived honorably and as a Christian. A man who believes in God does not commit crimes, and a soldier who believes in God is not a war criminal.

I therefore beg the Tribunal to acquit completely Grand Admiral Dr. H. C. Erich Raeder regarding all points of the indictments.

2. FINAL PLEA by Erich Raeder

This trial, at the end of the taking of evidence, has had a result beneficial for the German nation yet surprising to the Prosecution. Unshakeable testimony of witnesses has cleared the German people and with it all the persons who are in the same situation to-day as I am of the most serious of all accusations, that it had known of the killing of millions of Jews and other people if it had not even participated in it. The attempt of the Prosecution, who through earlier interrogations had known the truth for a long time, and who nevertheless continued its accusations in the trial brief and during cross-examinations, raising the finger of the preacher of morale, this attempt, repeated again and again, to defame the entire German people has suffered collapse.

The second result of this trial, which is of general and therefore of interest for me, is the fact that it was necessary to confirm as a matter of principle the cleanliness and decent fighting habits of the German navy on the strength of the evidence taken. The German navy stands before this Court and before the world with a banner and a flag which is unstained.

The attempt in the plea of Shawcross to place the submarine warfare on the same level with atrocities can be refuted with the clearest conscience, because after the clear results of the evidence they can not be maintained. In particular, the accusation that the German nation had never had the intention to observe the laws of naval warfare, as Shawcross said (Pages 70, 71), has been completely deprived of its status. The same applies to the fact that it has been proved that the naval command staff and its chief has never shown the attitude of despising international law, but to the contrary, that from the first until the last moment it has made honest endeavors to conduct the modern conduct of a naval war in accordance with the principles of international law and human demands, a basis which was the same as adopted by our opponents.

DEFENSE

I regret that the prosecution have tried again and again to defame me and the German navy, as is proved by the submission of its second altered trial brief, which only differs from its first versions in that the number and the severity of the insulting statements have been increased. This fact proves that the Prosecutors themselves felt that the factual accusations were too weak; but it is also my conviction that the British and American Prosecution have rendered a service, a bad service to their own Navies. They lower the esteem of that opponent morally and describe him as inferior against whom the Allied naval arms have conducted a serious, honest, and year-long naval battle. I am convinced that the admiralties of the Allied powers understand me and that they know that they have not fought against a criminal. The only way I can explain to myself this attitude adopted by the Prosecution is by assuming that the representatives of the Prosecution, as I had to find them again and again, had at their disposal only very little judgment regarding the principles of true soldierly conduct and true soldierly leadership, and that, therefore, they hardly seem suited to judge soldierly honor.

I summarize: I have done my duty as a soldier because it was my conviction that this would be the best way for me to serve the German people and the German nation for which I have lived and for which to die I am prepared at every moment. If I have become guilty in any way, then only in this way, that in spite of my purely military position I may not only have been a soldier but, up to a certain point, a politician, something however which, considering my entire career and the tradition of the German Wehrmacht, would not suit me. This, on the other hand, would have been a moral guilt before the German people and it could never at any time brand me a war criminal. This would not be a guilt before the penal courts of humanity; it would have been a guilt before God.

XVI. BALDUR VON SCHIRACH

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Fritz Sauter, Defense Counsel

Baldur v. Schirach, who at that time was Reich Youth Leader (Reichsjugendfuehrer) welcomed in 1936 the guests to the Olympic Games in Berlin with the following words:

“Youth throws a bridge across all frontiers and seas!”

“I call to the Youth of the World and through them, to Peace.” And Baldur v. Schirach, then Gauleiter of Vienna, said to Hitler in 1940:

"Vienna cannot be conquered with bayonets, but only with music." Those two sayings are characteristic and show what kind of man is this defendant. It is the duty of the defense to examine the evidence produced in this trial for the purpose of ascertaining whether the said Baldur v. Schirach who expressed his political programme by such utterances, really committed those crimes against law and humanity with which he is charged by the Prosecution.

Schirach is the youngest defendant here. He is also, of all the defendants, the one who was by far the youngest on his joining the Party which he did when he was not yet 18. Those facts are perhaps already of some significance for the judging of his case. When still at school, he entered the fold of the rising National Socialism; he was particularly attracted by the Socialist idea which had already in his country school recognized no difference between the sons of fathers of different classes and professions; those boys around Schirach actually saw in the popular movement of the 1920's in Germany the promise of the resurgence of our Fatherland from the aftermath of the last Great War, to a happy future, and fate willed it that as early as 1925 Schirach came into personal contact with Hitler in Weimar, Goethe's old town. Hitler's personality made a fascinating impression on young Schirach, as he himself admitted; the program for the Racial Community (Volksgemeinschaft) which Hitler had evolved at that time met with Schirach's hearty approval, because he thought he saw, reproduced therein, on a full-size scale, that which he had personally experienced in a small way in the comradeship of the country school and in his Youth organization. To him and his comrades Hitler appeared as the man who would open for the younger generation the road into the future, from him this younger generation also got its hope for a possibility to work, its hope for a competency, its hope for a happy life. So the young man became a convinced National Socialist; he became one as a result of the environment in which he had spent his youth, and which offered a soil which was only too fertile for the growth of that ideology ("Weltanschauung") which young Schirach embraced, because at that period he held it to be the right one. This environment of his childhood and a biased reading of political books, which the young man devoured in his hunger for knowledge, made of him, while still an inexperienced youth, also an anti-Semite. It is true that he did not become an anti-Semite in the sense of those fanatics who ended in not recoiling with horror from acts of violence and pogroms, nor in the sense of those fanatics who finally created an Auschwitz and murdered millions of Jews, but of an anti-Semite in that moderate sense, who would merely restrict Jewish influence in the government of the state and in cultural life, but for the rest would leave untouched the freedom and rights of Jewish fellow-citizens, and who never thought of exterminating the Jewish people. At least, that is the picture of Hitler's anti-Semitism which young Schirach drew for himself during those years.

DEFENSE

That this was really Schirach's opinion is also substantiated by the declaration which Schirach made here in the morning of 24 May 1946, and in which he described without reservation the crimes committed by Hitler as a spot of shame in our history, as a crime which fills every German with shame; that declaration in which he openly expresses that Auschwitz was bound to be the end of each and every racial policy and anti-Semitism. This declaration came from the deepest spot in the heart of the defendant Schirach; it was the result of the terrible disclosures which these trials have brought him also, and Schirach has given this declaration here before the broadest public, in order to bring back the German youth from a wrong road to the road of justice and tolerance.

Let us now regard the more important accusations which have been raised against Schirach, and the major results which the evidence has shown in the individual points:

1. The defendant Schirach is first of all accused that BEFORE the seizure of power, therefore before the year 1933, he ACTIVELY FURTHERED the National-Socialist Party and the youth-organization linked with it, and that he had thereby contributed that the PARTY could COME INTO POWER; he had been, as is stated in the Trial Brief, a close and subordinate follower of Hitler; he had stood in blind loyalty to Hitler and the latter's National-Socialist world of thinking; and he had, as leader of the student-league, led the students ideologically and politically to National Socialism and won them for it."

All this is not denied by Schirach in any manner: He has done what he is being accused of in this respect; this he confesses openly, and for this he naturally holds himself responsible to-day also. The only thing which he denies for this as also the later time the more emphatically is the accusation that he had participated in a CONSPIRACY. According to Schirach's opinion, the Fuehrer-principle and dictatorship in their character and their theory are absolutely incompatible with the idea of a conspiracy, and a conspiracy appears to him as a logical impossibility if many millions of members are to be included in it, and its existence and aims lie exposed before the country in question as well as the foreign countries. We furthermore know from the results of these trials that Hitler, aside from Bormann and Himmler, did not have any friend, any advisor, with whom he expressed himself as to his plans and aims; he rather drove the Fuehrer-principle to the furthest extremes; he took no cognizance of any advisory meetings and discussions, but reached his decisions solely by himself, without even listening to only the opinion of his closest surroundings; with him there were only orders on his part and unconditional obedience on the other side. That is how the "conspiracy" actually looked and all of us who have lived through these trials would never have considered this most radical increase of the Fuehrer-principle possible, had not ALL defendants and ALL witnesses who know about this, in complete agreement, and without a single exception, shown the same picture to us again and again.

Schirach now is not denying at all that already in his very early years he came completely under the influence of Hitler; that he had placed himself with his whole young personality in the service of this idea; and that at the time, as is stated in the indictment, he was devoted to Hitler with unconditional loyalty.

If this was a crime of young Schirach, a crime which millions of older, more experienced, mature Germans have committed with him, then you as judges may condemn him for this, if our law code furnishes a legal basis for it. This then would be a further disappointment in addition to the many others which he has already experienced for years: Schirach knows to-day that he has given loyal support unto the end to a man who did not deserve this, and he also knows to-day that the ideas for which he was enthusiastic in his young years and for which he sacrificed himself led in practice to aims which he himself had never thought of. But also the Schirach of to-day, cleansed by many experiences, cannot see any criminal act in that activity of his younger years carried out in good faith which he developed for Hitler and the latter's party. Because the Party, at that time, appeared quite legal to young Schirach, Schirach never had any doubt that it also came into power by legal means. The seizure of power by the Party, the appointment of Hitler as Reich Chancellor by Reich President von Hindenburg, and winning the majority of the people through the Party in repeated elections confirmed young Schirach again and again the legality of the movement. If to-day he is to be punished, because he acknowledged this same Hitler as his Fuehrer whom millions of Germans and all states of the world have recognized as legal head of the state, so Schirach could never acknowledge such a decision as being just. In spite of the severe judgment, which he himself has pronounced in this Court Room about Hitler, he would feel himself as a victim of his POLITICAL CONVICTIONS, if he were to be sentenced because as a young, enthusiastic man he had joined the National-Socialist Party and collaborated in its construction and seizure of power. At the time he did not recognize that as a crime, but from his standpoint he considered it as his patriotic duty.

DEFENSE

2. The second, far more important accusation which has been raised against the defendant v. Schirach goes to the effect that he, as Reich Youth Leader in the years 1932-1940, in order to cite the accusation word by word, "poisoned the world of thought of the youth with the Nazi-ideology, and especially trained it for AGGRESSIVE WAR." Schirach has always refuted this claim with all decisiveness, and these claims have not been substantiated either by the results of the evidence.

The law on the Hitler Youth of 1936 described Schirach's task as Reich Youth Leader "to educate the youth outside of the parental home and outside of the school physically, intellectually, and morally for service to the people and to the community of the people in the spirit of National Socialism through the Hitler Youth Movement and its leader, the defendant v. Schirach." This program is being repeated word for word in the enactment decree of 1939, which came out so late because Schirach did not intend to introduce compulsory membership until the movement would practically include the entire German youth on the basis of voluntary membership so that future joining by compulsion would exist on paper only.

The Hitler Youth program as it is formulated by Schirach in his speeches and pamphlets does not contain a single word which would indicate a military education of youth, much less an education for aggressive warfare. But even in practice the education of youth according to Schirach's ideas in no way gives evidence of a military education of German youth for such a purpose. In that respect the point was stressed that the Hitler Youth was organized in various "Battalions and divisions," that is correct although the designations listed by the prosecution are not correct and although they do not have the least bit in common with military formations. But, in the last analysis, every youth movement the world over will show a classification into smaller or larger units; each of these units naturally needs a name also, and it must also have a responsible leader, and similar to other countries, character of youth education. From his own familiarity with practices in foreign countries Schirach knows that foreign youth organizations in Switzerland as well as in France, in England as well as in America, in Czechoslovakia as well as in Yugoslavia, also have similar classifications and similar insignia, and it never occurred to us so far to make that a reason for considering such foreign youth organizations as military associations.

It was furthermore stressed that formations of the male youth in Germany were also given training in shooting. That is also correct but proves equally little, because the shooting instruction for the Hitler Youth consisted fundamentally and without exception of low-caliber target practice, in other words, using short, light rifles (Flobertstutzen) which are nowhere in the world considered as a military weapon and which are not even mentioned in the enumeration of military weapons in the Versailles Treaty. "Hitler Jugend" in Germany did not possess a single military weapon, no infantry rifles and no machineguns, no motorized airplanes, no cannon, and no tanks. However, if one wants to speak about military training, the training would have to be primarily in military weapons, such as are used in modern warfare. As a matter of fact, and in order to give added importance to his office a certain Dr. Stellrecht, a technical adviser on shooting instruction in the leadership of the Reich Youth attempted, as was established in his cross-examination to ascribe a certain considerable importance to this very branch of youth training in order to make his own office appear particularly important; Schirach, however, was able to show without refutation that for this very reason he developed differences of opinion with this technical adviser and so finally parted from Dr. Stellrecht because he (Schirach) rejected any development which might perhaps have led to a military training of the youth. However, this Dr. Stellrecht also, who was brought forward by the Prosecution as a witness against Schirach, has nevertheless also admitted for his part "that not a single boy in Germany was trained in handling weapons of war" and that "not one boy was given a military weapon." Of further importance for consideration of these questions is the fact that Schirach as a matter of principle refused to permit the youth to be trained by active officers or former officers, because he considered these persons entirely unsuitable to educate the youth in that spirit which he envisioned as the goal of his activity. Moreover, neither Schirach nor any of his closer associates, were officers before the war and the same holds true for the overwhelming majority of the high- or low-ranking HJ leaders subordinate to him.

All these facts are firmly established through the testimony of the defendant Schirach himself and through depositions made by the witnesses Lauterbacher, Gustav Hoepken, and Maria Hoepken during their examination. For a number of years these witnesses were Schirach's closest assistants; they are thoroughly familiar with his views and principles and they have unanimously confirmed that it is entirely out of the question to speak of a military, or even a pre-military, training of the Hitler Jugend.

DEFENSE

I have just mentioned, as witness, the name Lauterbacher. The Prosecution, during the course of their cross-examination, made the attempt to doubt the credibility of the witness Lauterbacher.

On 27 April 1946, during his interrogation, the witness was asked about how many people Lauterbacher had hanged publicly and furthermore by putting to him the statement that he had ordered that four or five hundred prisoners from the penitentiary in Hanover should be poisoned or executed by shooting. In this connection the American Prosecutor had submitted seven affidavits under Document USA 874, offered in evidence.

Amongst them there was one by a certain Josef Kramer, who in fact has made the assertion in his affidavit that the witness who appeared here for Schirach, witness Lauterbacher, in his function as Gauleiter at Hanover, had given him the order concerning the murder of the inmates.

During the Court's session of 27 May 1946 I had protested against the use of that affidavit by Kramer and I had shown to you gentlemen a newspaper article, according to which the witness Kramer on 2 May 1946, by a court in the British sector, had been condemned to seven years imprisonment. Several days ago I submitted a report of the Rheinische Zeitung of 6 July 1946 as evidence to show that our witness Lauterbacher in the meantime had been acquitted by the Supreme British Military Court in Hanover.

From that it can be seen that the accusations which at the time the Prosecution made against the credibility of the witness Lauterbacher and at which time they based their statements on the affidavit of Kramer, was not justified.

It has also been repeatedly emphasized in rebuttal that the Hitler Youth wore a uniform. That is correct, but it proves nothing. For the youth organizations of other countries, too, are accustomed to wear a common costume, some sort of a uniform, without anybody for this reason terming them military or semi-military corporations, and Schirach and several of his associates have informed me that in many democratic countries which certainly do not contemplate war, much less a war of aggression, the male youth is being trained in handling actual military weapons and that every year contests are held in shooting with military rifles.

But why was it that Schirach introduced a uniform for the Hitler Youth, and indeed not only for the boys but also for the girls? We have heard the answer to this from several witnesses: Schirach saw in the uniform of the boys and in the uniform costume of the girls the "dress of socialism," the "dress of comradeship." The child of the rich industrialist was to wear the same clothes as the child of the miner, the son of the millionaire the same as the son of an unemployed. The uniform of the Hitler Youth was to be as Schirach already wrote in 1934 in his book "The Hitler Youth," "the expression of an attitude, which did not ask for class and property, but only for effort and achievement." The uniform of the Hitler Youth was for Schirach, as expressed further in this same book of his "not the sign of any militarism, but the emblem of the idea of the Hitler Youth, namely, the idea of the classless community," in the spirit of the election slogan which he gave the Youth in 1933: "Through Socialism to the nation." Schirach always remained faithful to this principle. Thus he wrote in the official publication of the Hitler Youth 1937 "The uniform is not the expression of a martial attitude, but the dress of comradeship; it extinguishes class difference and again makes the child of the most insignificant worker socially acceptable today; the young generation in our new Germany must be united in an indissoluble community." Schirach had this comradeship and this socialism in mind when he described in 1934 in his book "The Hitler Youth," how he imagined this socialism: "Socialism does not mean to take the fruits of his work away from someone in order to give everybody something produced by the work of another. Everyone is to work, but everyone is also to harvest the fruits of his work. It is also not to be that one person should get rich, while thousands of others must suffer want because of him. Whoever exploits his work and spoliates the community in order to fill his cash box, is an enemy of the German people."

Schirach has pointed out again and again in his numerous writings, articles, and speeches, which have been collected in the document book and have been submitted to the Tribunal, that he did not desire any "pseudo-military exercise" which would only spoil the joy of the Youth in the movement." The training of the boys in small caliber shooting went hand in hand with the training in all sports activities and complied with the inclination of the male youth which surely favors in all states the shooting sport with particular interest. But this training had to be decreased very much in volume and importance in favor of the greater aims which Schirach pursued in the Hitler Youth and about which the examined witnesses give as clear a testimony as the writings and speeches of von Schirach. These aims of the Hitler Youth education are to be explained here briefly, as they have been proven by the presentation of evidence; Schirach is naturally not being charged with these other aims of the Hitler Youth education, but one must consider them nevertheless if one is to obtain a total picture of his activity and of his plans.

DEFENSE

Besides the already mentioned education of the youth for comradeship, for socialism in the sense of overcoming class distinction, Schirach had, as he explained here, primarily 4 aims in mind:

First the training in sports of the youth in the most varied types of sports and in connection with it the hygienic care of the youth; this branch of the education of the youth took up a very large part of the training of the Hitler Youth, and if the German youth obtained such unexpectedly great success at the Olympic Games in 1936, it was to a certain degree due to the activity of the leadership of the Hitler Youth in cooperation with the sports leader of the Reich v. Tscharmer-Osten.

A further aim was the further professional training and advancement of the working youth and the improvement of the position of adolescents in the youth laws, particularly by prohibition of night-work, by increasing the free time, by granting of paid vacations, by prohibition of child labor, by raising of protected age of adolescents etc., the vocational advance training was promoted so strongly that finally over 1 million boys and girls entered professional competition annually, and from year to year the average performance in each profession rose very considerably.

A third primary aim was the advancement of love of nature, far away from the slums of large cities, during hiking trips and in youth hostels, inns. Thousands of youth homes and youth hostels were built in the course of these years because of Schirach's initiative and, namely, by the own means of the Hitler Youth itself to get the youth out of the large cities with their temptations and vices and return to rural life to show them the beauties of the homeland and also to give a vacation to even the poorest child.

But Schirach dedicated his greatest care to a fourth goal of the education of youth: namely, the understanding with youth of other nations, and this activity especially is a particularly suitable test for the question, whether one can accuse defendant von Schirach to have taken part in the planning of wars of aggression. Schirach has told us here on the witness stand, that again and again, in summer as in winter of every year, foreign youth groups were the guests of the German youth and it is shown by the documents in von Schirach's document book for instance that already in the year 1936, no less than 200,000 foreign youths received overnight lodgings in German youth hostels, vice versa, year after year German youth delegations went abroad, especially to England and France to enable youth to get acquainted and respect one another. Those very endeavors of Schirach's, which would be absolutely incompatible with the intention to prepare wars of aggression, received unlimited recognition before the war abroad as well. In one of the special numbers of the Hitler Youth magazine in "Wille und Macht" (Will and power) of 1937, dedicated to this task of understanding, which was also published in French and which is quoted here only as an example, the French Premier Chautemps declared his willingness, as chief of the French government, to advance the further development of these peaceful meetings. "I wish," he wrote, "that the young men of both nations could live every year side by side by the thousands and in this way learn to know, to understand, and respect each other." And further: "Our two nations know, that an understanding between them would be one of the most valuable factors for world peace; therefore it is the duty of all those, on both sides of the frontier who have a clear view and human feeling to work for the understanding rapprochement of both nations. But no one could do it more sincerely and more enthusiastically than the leaders of our beautiful youth of the French and of the German youth. If they understood it to unite this youth, they would hold in their hands the future of European and human culture." The mayor of Versailles of that time wrote in the same spirit, ending his appeal in the monthly of the Hitler Youth with the words: "The education of youth in this spirit is one of the most important tasks of the politicians of both our countries." The French ambassador Francois Poncet recognized just as heartily Schirach's efforts in the same publication under the title "Youth as a Bridge" and concluded his lengthy article with the words: "French participation enriches German soil. German influence fertilizes French spirit.

* * * May this exchange develop further. May also the generations, which will benefit of it at one time, contribute to bring the two halves of Charlemagne's empire closer and to create between them those relations of mutual respect, harmony, and of good comradeship for which both nations are deeply longing, because their instinct tells them that the welfare of European culture depends on it and because they know very exactly, when they look into themselves that they have many more reasons to respect and admire each other than to hate each other."

And Schirach himself answered in the next issue of his monthly publication with an enthusiastic article, under the title: "Salute to France." In it he writes for instance: "The rapprochement of our two people is a European task of such urgent necessity that youth has no time to lose in order to work for its achievement." Then further: "Youth is the best ambassador of the world, it is disinterested, frank, and without the eternal distrust of which diplomats can frequently not be cured because to a certain extent it is their professional disease. However no propagandistic intentions may be hidden behind youth exchange. * * * I consider it now as my task to bring about a conversation between German and French youth, which must not be on the German side composed of nice statements from me, but of many personal conversations of thousands of young Germans with just as many young Frenchmen. * * * One must believe in youth, because it above all, can carry out a true understanding." And at the end Schirach reminds that all higher youth leaders of the German Hitler Youth shortly before expressed their respect in the name of the young generation of Germany to the French unknown soldier by placing a wreath under the Arc de Triomphe, and he concludes with the words: "The dead of the great war died while carrying out their patriotic duty and nobly devoting themselves to the ideal of liberty, but Germans as well as French were always full of respect for the gallant foe. If the dead respected themselves, then the living should try to shake hands. If the returned combat veterans of both nations could become comrades, why should the sons and grandsons not become friends?

DEFENSE

These are the words of the same Baldur v. Schirach, whom the prosecution tries to brand as a deliberate partner in a Hitlerian conspiracy for war! The Prosecution wants to make a war criminal out of this untiring prophet of international understanding and of peace who is charged with having militarized youth and prepared it bodily and psychologically for wars of aggression. So far, the Prosecution has not been able to furnish evidence to this effect.

Schirach has written various doctrinal books for youth, which were used against him in the Trial Brief; he has published a quantity of essays on the most varied problems of Youth education; his innumerable speeches, addressed to youth, have been published; his orders and instructions to youth are available in a collected form; it must, however, be concluded that amongst all this which constitutes his utterances not a single item is to be found in which he made instigations in favor of war or preached attacks against other countries. The Prosecution has stated in this very connection that he has referred to Lebensraum in his book "The Hitler Youth" and by so doing adopted as his own an unpleasant slogan of the Hitlerite aggression policy; this claim is however unjustified, for the whole book "The Hitler Youth," does not, any more than every other speech and writing of Schirach, contain this word at all. True, he has referred to "Eastern Space" (Ost Raum) in two places in the said book "The Hitler Youth," published in 1936, but he quite obviously did not in any way refer by this term to Polish or Soviet-Russian territories, but to the Eastern provinces of the former German Empire, that is to say, to territories which formerly belonged to Germany but were notoriously very thinly populated and well-suited as settlements for the excess of population.

Nowhere has Schirach at any time up to the outbreak of the second World War expressed the idea that he might wish Germany to conquer foreign territories; neither has he ever uttered the odious slogans of German "Master Race" or "Subhumanity" of other nations; he has, on the contrary, always opined in favor of the preservation of peace with the neighboring Nations and always intervened in favor of the peaceful settlement of any conflicts that cropped up and of inevitable clashes of interests. Had Hitler possessed but a fraction of the love of peace which his Youth Leader preached time and again, then perhaps this war would have been spared us Germans and the whole world.

4. Since the Prosecution could not prove to defendant v. Schirach that he ever served Hitler's war policy before the War, he is now charged with having had various relations with the SS and SA and especially to have drawn his young recruits from the Hitler Youth as well as the SS and SA, as also the Leader Corps (Fuehrerkorps) of the Party. This last fact is correct but proves nothing as to Schirach's attitude toward Hitler's war policy and is equally pointless as regards the question of his participation in a war conspiracy of Hitler's. For if 90 to 95 percent or more of German youth belonged to the Hitler Youth, then it was only natural that the Party as well as its formations should draw their young recruits from year to year and to a growing extent from the Hitler Youth. Practically no other youth was available. If the Prosecution, however, refers to the agreement between the Youth Leadership and the Reichsfuehrung SS dated October 1938 (2396-PS) concerning patrol service for the Hitler Youth, it cannot, by any means, draw any inference therefrom, for patrol service in the Hitler Youth was only an institution designed to control and supervise the discipline of the Hitler Youth members when they made a public appearance; this was therefore a kind of corporative police operation carried out by the Hitler Youth against their own members and against them alone. In order, however, to guard against difficulties with the general police, an arrangement by agreement with the Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler was necessary because the latter was the Chief of the whole Police Organization in Germany and could have made difficulties for the institution of the patrol service. This was the only object of the agreement of October 1936, which in reality had just as little to do with providing new blood for the SS, as with the conduct of and the preparation for war. Moreover, it can clearly be seen how much Schirach resisted any influence the Party might win over the Hitler youth from the fact that in 1938 he protested very sharply against having the education of the Hitler Youth during the last two years, namely from 16 to 18 years, taken over by the SA; he sharply rejected this plan and through a personal visit to Hitler succeeded in having the Fuehrer order in question not carried out in practice. As for his attitude toward the SS, we know from the testimony of the witness Gustav Hoepken that Schirach always feared he was being shadowed and spied upon by the SS in Vienna. He always had an uncomfortable feeling because at the beginning of his activity in Vienna there had been appointed for him for the business of Reichsstatthalter and Reich Defense Commissioner, a permanent representative in the person, of all things, of a higher SS leader (Dr. Delbruegge), who, as Schirach knew, had direct connections with the Reich leader SS, that the same man who proposed to Hitler in 1943 to have Schirach imprisoned for defeatism and to have him placed before the people's court, which meant in practice that by Himmler's urging, Schirach would be hanged. These facts alone already prove what was the real relation between defendant v. Schirach and the SS and it is then comprehensible why Schirach finally refused even the "Protection" by the police force appointed to him and preferred to transfer his personal protection to a unit of the Wehrmacht which did not understand the order of Himmler.

DEFENSE

5. The defendant v. Schirach's attitude with reference to the Church question, included in the Indictment, is also in keeping with his portrait as depicted by the details so far given. This issue is, in fact, given a minor part in the Indictment, but turns out nevertheless to be of considerable importance for the judgment of Schirach's human personality.

Schirach himself, as well as his wife, always remained in the bosom of the Church. To the foreign critic this circumstance may perhaps appear an unimportant detail, but we Germans know the amount of pressure exercised upon ranking Party officials precisely in such matters, and how few, in this position, ventured to resist such pressure. Schirach was one of those few. He was that high-ranking Party Leader who constantly and invariably stepped in with extreme severity when he learnt of hostile interference and outrages against the Church on the part of the Hitler Youth. He has indeed been reproached of the fact that various songs were sung by the Hitler Youth, which contained outrageous remarks about religious institutions, but in this respect Schirach could with a good conscience, confirm his oath to the effect that he was to a certain extent unaware of these songs, which is entirely conceivable where an organization of 7 or 8 million members is involved, and moreover that certain songs, now considered objectionable, date back to the Middle Ages and have figured in the Song-book of the "Wandervogel," a former Youth organization which the Prosecution surely does not propose to condemn. Schirach has, however, especially pointed out that in the years 1933-1936, several million youths from an entirely different spiritual environment joined the Hitler Youth, and that in the first revolutionary years, that is, in the period of storm and stress of the movement, it was quite impossible to hear of and prevent outrages of this sort.

Whenever Schirach heard of such things he intervened and repressed abuses of this kind, which naturally represented only excesses on the part of isolated elements and could not commit the Youth organization as a whole.

It is Schirach's conviction that the examination of evidence leaves no doubt as to his conciliatory behavior in the matter of the Church, and to the fact that he strove to establish a proper relation of mutual respect between the Church on the one hand and the 3d Reich, and more especially the Reich Youth Leadership on the other hand, and to observe their respective rights and competence. At his own request, Schirach was invested by the Reich Minister of the Interior with the direction of the Concordat negotiations with the Catholic Church in 1934, because he hoped, by his personal cooperation, to achieve an agreement with the Catholic Church more easily. He has honorably endeavored to find, for the settlement of the Youth question, a formula upon which unanimity with the Catholic Church could be possible. His moderation and good will in this respect were then indeed frankly acknowledged by the representatives of the Catholic Church. But it was all ultimately frustrated by Hitler's opposition, and the complications created, particularly for these negotiations, by the events brought about on the 30 June 1934 by the Roehm putsch.

With the Protestant Church on the other hand, Schirach achieved an agreement with the Reich Bishop Dr. Mueller so that the incorporation of the protestant Youth associations in the Hitler Youth was not achieved by constraint but by mutual agreement, and therefore not by the "breaking up of these associations" by the State or Party as the Prosecution assumes, but upon the initiative of the Ecclesiastical head and in complete agreement with him.

DEFENSE

It must be pointed out here that it was always Schirach's policy that on the part of the youth leadership neither then nor later restrictions were imposed on church services for youth. On the contrary, as he himself has testified and as was confirmed by the witness Lauterbacher, Schirach emphatically stated in 1937 that he would leave it to the churches to educate the Youth according to the spirit of their faith and at the same time he ordered that, as a principle, no Hitler Youth duty was to be arranged on Sundays during the time of church services; he gave strict orders to the unit leaders of Hitler Youth that organizational duty was to interfere in no way with Sunday church services. If however in individual cases such interferences occurred anyhow and,—as it was proven in the cross-examination,—religious authorities made complaints about this, then the defendant Schirach can not be blamed for this nor does it alter the good intentions which he had.

Not one single case could be proven when he incited against the church or had made anti-religious statements; on the contrary, at numerous rallies, contained in the von Schirach document book which has been presented to the Tribunal, he not only repeatedly rejected the accusation that the Hitler Youths were enemies of the church or atheists, but he positively always inculcated the leaders and members of the Hitler Youth with the obligation to fulfill their obligation toward God; he would not tolerate anyone in the youth who did not believe in God; every true educator would have to be at the same time an educator for religious feeling, it being the basis for all educational activity; Hitler Youth duties and religious convictions could very well be associated with each other and exist side by side. The Hitler Youth leader was to bring no conflicts of conscience whatsoever to his adherents. Leave from duty was to be granted to Hitler Youth members for religious services, rites, and such.

Whoever gives such instructions to his deputy and repeats them over again can claim that he will not be judged as an enemy of the church and as an enemy of religious life. By the way, it is interesting in this connection, what such a reliable judge as Neville Henderson wrote in his oft-quoted book "Failure of a Mission" about a speech which he heard from the lips of Schirach at the 1937 Reich Party Rally. Henderson, who as ambassador in Berlin, knew intimately the German conditions evidently expected that Baldur v. Schirach would speak against the church at the Reich Party Rally and would influence the youth in the spirit of enmity to the church, as was often heard from the other leaders of the Party. Henderson writes: "On this day it was Schirach's speech which impressed me most, although it was quite short." A part of this speech surprised me, when he, addressing himself to the youth, said: "I do not know whether you are Protestants or Catholics, but I do know that you believe in God," and Henderson added: "Formerly I had the impression that all connections with religion were abolished within the Hitler Youth, but these expositions by Schirach appear to refute my assumption."

How Schirach really did think with regard to religion and in what sense he influenced the youth is proved not only by his declaration of opinion which he expressed incidentally once in his speech to the teachers of the Adolf Hitler Schools at Ordensburg Sonthofen that Christ was the greatest leading personality of the world, but also similarly the small book submitted to you, entitled "Christmas Gift of War Welfare Service"; this book, which was sent to the front in large editions, was dedicated by Schirach to the front soldiers who came forth from the Hitler Youth in 1944, thus at a time when radicalism in all districts of Germany could not be carried too far.

Here also Schirach was an exception: you will find no swastika, no picture of Hitler, nor an SA-song in the book of Reich Leader v. Schirach, but among other things an avowed Christian poem from Schirach's own pen, next a picture of a Madonna, beside it a reproduction of van Gogh who, as is generally known, was strictly prescribed in the 3d Reich. Instead of inflammatory words, we find an exhortation to a Christian way of thinking and a copy of the "Wessebrunner Gebet," the most remarkable prayer in the German language, as everyone knows.

Bormann was enraged when he saw the little book, but Schirach remained firm and refused to withdraw the little book or alter it in any way.

The defendant v. Schirach has now been charged with having once undertaken a hostile action against the Church and with having thereby taken part in the persecution of the Church: From a letter of Minister Lammers of 14 March 1941 (R-146) it appears that Schirach proposed to keep confiscated property at the disposal of the districts (Gau), and not to hand it over to the Reich, this case alone is no justification at all for connecting the defendant v. Schirach in some way or other with the persecution of the Church. In the case mentioned by the Prosecution, it does not concern Church property at all, but confiscated property of a Prince Schwarzenberg in his Vienna palace; this affair therefore had nothing to do with the Church; this is also confirmed unequivocally by Minister Lammer's letter of 14 March 1941 (R-146), which mentions only a "confiscation of property hostile to the people and the State," whereas Bormann's far reaching personal intention becomes apparent and betrays its hostile tendency toward the Church, when Bormann speaks about "Church properties (Monasterial possessions and so forth)" in his accompanying letter of 20 March 1941 referring to this case. Moreover, the confiscation of Prince Schwarzenberg's property has not been caused, pronounced, nor carried out by Schirach. Schirach had nothing to do with the confiscation as such; Schirach, however, agreeing with the other Gauleiter of the Austrian NSDAP and at their request, personally then applied to Hitler and requested that such confiscated property should not be taken to the Reich and not be used on behalf of the Reich, but that it should remain in Vienna. This proposal was crowned with success. Hitler complied with his request, the result being that, when the confiscation was rescinded later on, the property could be returned to its legitimate owner whereas it would otherwise have been lost to him. By acting thus, Schirach no doubt rendered a service to the Vienna Gau and to that person who was the owner of the seized property. This case therefore cannot be charged to the defendant v. Schirach, on the contrary, it speaks in his favor just as in the other case where, whilst circumventing Bormann, he intervened on behalf of Austrian nuns and as a result obtained that the whole project of confiscating Church and Monastery property was discontinued in one day in the whole of the Reich by a direct order of Hitler.

DEFENSE

If, however, the Prosecution intends to reproach the defendant with the fact that the Vienna Authorities, subordinate to him, intended to remove an Adolf Hitler School into the Monastery of Neuburg in 1941 (3927-PS), it must on the other hand be pointed out that, even prior to the requisitioning of this monastery, entirely independent of Schirach, the Vienna Police and several Vienna Courts had established the occurrence of considerable criminal offenses in this monastery; furthermore that the confiscation of part of the monastery seemed entirely justified to the defendant Schirach, as the very spacious rooms of this religious establishment were not required for monastery purposes.

It must finally be pointed out that the monastery did not complain to the Reich Minister of the Interior of the decision to confiscate, and therefore recognized the confiscation as just, although it had been expressly informed in the confiscation decree of the possibility of lodging a complaint. Moreover, the confiscated rooms were afterward not used for the establishment of an Adolf Hitler school, but for the purpose of the Museum of Historical Art, thus for no Party establishment, which again testifies to the fact that the confiscation decree had in no way been rescinded through Schirach's hostile attitude toward the Church. For, had it been of importance to Schirach to injure the monastery, it being an Ecclesiastical Institution, he would also have confiscated the rooms used for religious ceremonies. He, however, strictly forbade their confiscation.

After all, when appreciating this case, attention should be paid to the fact that the justification of the Confiscation Decree of 22 February 1941 had one remarkable reservation, the decree restricts itself to justifying the confiscation by the fact that on the one hand Vienna badly needed rooms and on the other the confiscated rooms were superfluous for the purposes of the monastery; not a single word mentions or even suggests that criminal offences had been established in the monastery as mentioned in a Police report of 23 January 1941. If this confiscation had been the result of a hostile attitude to the Church, we could have been sure that somehow or other reference would have been made to these offences for justification of the confiscation. At Schirach's instigation, a monthly rent was paid for it to the clergy who had occupied some of the confiscated rooms for which rent there existed no political obligation whatever.

Defendant v. Schirach's further behavior does not reveal at all a hostile attitude toward the Church, particularly, if one considers, whilst appreciating this behavior, that during these years a Reich Leader was also under strong pressure by the Reich Chancellery and by Bormann and that a considerable amount of courage was necessary to resist this pressure and carry on a policy in opposition to the Berlin policy. The witness Wieshofer of Vienna who had the opportunity of watching Schirach's activities confirmed that Schirach in Vienna also strove to establish correct relations with the Church, that he was always willing to listen to Cardinal Innitzer's complaints, and took severe measures against the excesses of individual members of the Hitler Youth or Hitler Youth Leaders. In Vienna, he thus carried out a policy toward the Church quite different from that which his predecessor had favored, and it is beyond doubt that the Ecclesiastical circles in Vienna and the whole of the Vienna population appreciated Schirach's attitude toward the Church. This is also confirmed by the witness Gustav Hoepken who, by order of Schirach, held regular conferences with a Vienna theologian, Dekan Prof. Ens, to be able to inform the defendant Schirach of the clerical wishes and the differences which had arisen with Ecclesiastical authorities. Schirach could not do anything more in the prevailing political circumstances, as they are described in the Affidavit of Maria

DEFENSE

Hoepken, if he did not wish to expose himself to the most serious danger.

6. The Prosecution has connected the defendant with concentration camps, not in the bill of indictment but during the presentation of evidence, and the witness Alois Hoellriegel questioned here, was asked in the witness box, whether Schirach had ever been in Mauthausen concentration camp. To this I should like to remark: The defendant Schirach already mentioned his visit to Mauthausen in his own examination by the American Prosecution before the beginning of the trial; it would, therefore, not have been necessary to have this visit testified to again by the witness Hoellriegel. He visited the Mauthausen concentration camp in the year 1942 not in 1944, as the witness Marsalek erroneously stated; the exact year 1942 has been confirmed by the witness Hoellriegel, and in the same way also by the witness Hoepken and Wieshofer, from whom we heard that neither after 1942, nor at any other time, did Schirach visit concentration camps. The visit to Mauthausen in 1942 cannot charge the defendant Schirach in this sense with having known, approved, and supported all the conditions and atrocities in concentration camps.

In 1942 he saw nothing in Mauthausen which might have indicated such crimes. There still were no gas ovens and such at Mauthausen in 1942. At that time mass executions did not take place as yet at Mauthausen. The statements of the defendant von Schirach concerning his impression of this camp appear to be plausible, on the whole, because through the testimony of numerous witnesses, who have been heard during the course of this trial, it has been confirmed again and again that on the occasion of such official visits, which had been announced previously, everything was carefully prepared in order to show to the visitors only that which did not fear the light of day. Mistreatments and tortures were concealed during such official visits in the same manner as arbitrary executions or cruel experiments. This was the case at Mauthausen in 1942 and also at Dachau in 1935, where Schirach and the other visitors were shown only orderly conditions. Conditions which at a superficial glance appeared to be almost better than in some ordinary prisons. As a result, Schirach only knew that since 1933 there were several concentration camps in which, in his opinion, incorrigible habitual criminals were confined. However even to-day, Schirach still cannot believe that the mere knowledge of the existence of concentration camps in itself is already a crime, since he at no time had done anything whatsoever to promote concentration camps, never has expressed his approval of this arrangement, never has sent anybody to a concentration camp, and since he also would never have been able to make any changes in this institution or to prevent the existence of concentration camps. Schirach's influence was always too small for that. To begin with, as Reich Youth Leader he of course had nothing to do with concentration camps, and it was lucky for Schirach that in his entire Vienna district there was not a single concentration camp.

His entire relations with concentration camps were therefore limited, to attempt again and again to have people released from the concentration camps, and it is significant, after all, that he used his presence in the concentration camp Mauthausen—the one and only time he was there—to use his influence for Viennese citizens who were imprisoned in Mauthausen, and to obtain their release.

6 a. I do not want to go any more into many details which have played a larger or smaller part in the presentation of evidence of the case Schirach. In the interest of saving time I shall not deal more specifically with the alleged connection of Schirach with Rosenberg or Streicher, nor into his alleged collaboration with the program for slave workers about which not even the slightest cooperation of the defendant could be proven, nor into a telephone conversation which allegedly had been made by one of the Viennese officials with a SS - Colonel (SS - Standartenfuehrer) about the compulsory work of the Jews which has been used by the Prosecution.

But I should like to make a short remark about one subject which, particularly in connection with the case of Rosenberg was dealt with. That is, a short explanation concerning the action by which thousands of youngsters in the eastern combat zone were collected and brought partly to Poland and partly to Germany.

That action had as its aim, as far as von Schirach could see from the documents presented here, apparently to bring the youngsters who had been in a zone of operation, that is, immediately behind the front, and wandering around without homes, to bring them together, to lead them into professional training and into professions so that they should be saved from physical and moral neglect. The defendant von Schirach doubts whether that could be viewed as a crime against humanity or as a war crime.

But it is certain that of that affair the defendant von Schirach did not know anything at the time. He was not competent for it at the time. That entire affair was handled by the army group center, together with the Ministry for the Eastern Territories, and it is quite credible that the Eastern Ministry, as well as the army group center, did not approach the Gauleiter of Vienna in order to get his approval of that action, or even to notify him about it.

DEFENSE

The only thing which, a considerable time later, came to the knowledge of the defendant von Schirach, and which possibly has any connection with that action, was an occasional information by the Reich Youth Leader Axmann that so and so many thousand youngsters were brought to the Junkers works at Dessau as apprentices.

The defendant von Schirach stressed the importance of clearing up this matter because he had been Reich Youth Leader before, and he wants to make it quite clear that also after leaving that office, of course, he would not have done anything against the interests of the Youth.

May I add another remark here concerning the letter which the defendant von Schirach, at the time after the assassination of Heydrich, sent to Reichsleiter Bormann, and in which he has suggested to Bormann reprisal measures in the form of terror attacks against English centers of culture. That letter was actually sent by the defendant to Bormann. He stands for it. I have to point out at the very beginning that fortunately the suggestion remained a suggestion, and it was never carried out.

The defendant, however, has told us that at that time he had been strongly under the impression of the assassination then brought against Heydrich, and it had been clear to him that a revolt of the population in Germany would necessarily lead to a catastrophe for the German armies in Russia, and in his capacity as Gauleiter of Vienna he had considered it his duty to undertake something to protect the rear of the German army fighting in Russia. And that explains that letter to Bormann, that teletype to Bormann of the year 1942, Document 3877-PS, which, as I have already pointed out, fortunately remained unsuccessful.

I shall not deal in detail with the Adolf Hitler Schools which were founded by Schirach, nor into the fifth column which somehow was connected with the Hitler Youth, about which nothing definite could be charged to the defendant. I shall no longer dwell either on the repeated attempts of the defendant Schirach and his friend Dr. Colin Ross for peace and neither shall I discuss the merits of the defendant concerning the evacuation of children to the rural areas which took millions of children from bomb endangered districts during the war into more quiet zones and which thus saved their lives and health.

The defendant von Schirach has already talked about all these affairs in detail himself, and I should therefore like to refer to his own statements. I shall discuss only one more problem here, namely, Schirach's position and attitude concerning the Jewish question. Schirach has admitted here on the witness stand that he has been a convinced National Socialist and thus also an anti-Semite from his earliest youth. He has also made clear to us what he understood by anti-Semitism during those years: He thought of the exclusion of the Jews from civil service and of the limitation of Jewish influence in cultural life and perhaps also in economic life up to a certain extent. But that was all which in his opinion should be undertaken against the Jews, and this was in accordance with the suggestion which he had already made as leader of the students' organization for the introduction of a quota. The defendant's decree concerning the treatment of Jewish youth is, for example, also important for his attitude where he expressly orders that the Jewish youth organizations should have the right and the possibility to practice freely within their framework; they were not to be disturbed in their own life. "In the youth (it says there) the Jewish community shall already to-day take that secluded and in itself unrestrained special position which at some time the entire Jewish community will receive in the German State and in the German economy." Obviously Schirach was not at all thinking about programs, nor about bloody persecution of Jews, and such, he rather believed at that time that the anti-Semitic movement has already reached its aim by the anti-Jewish legislative measures of the years 1933-34; with this he believed the Jewish influence to be removed as far as it seemed unhealthy to him. He was therefore surprised and seriously perplexed when the Nurnberg Laws were issued in 1935 which expressed a complete exclusion of the Jewish population and carried it out with barbaric severity. Schirach has in no way taken part in the planning of these laws; he has nothing whatsoever to do with their content and their formulation.

When he heard on 10 November 1938 about the program against the Jews and about the brutal excesses which were staged by Goebbels and became known throughout the entire youth; we have heard from the witness Lauterbacher, how Schirach reacted to the report of these excesses: He immediately called his assistants together and gave them the strictest orders that the Hitler Youth had to be kept out of such actions under all circumstances. In this sense he also had the officers of the Hitler Youth in all German cities notified by telephone, and he warned every noncommissioned officer that he would hold him personally responsible, if any excesses should occur in the Hitler Youth.

But even after November 1938, Schirach never thought of the possibility that Hitler was thinking about the extermination of the Jews. He rather only heard about it that the Jews should be evacuated from Germany into other states, that they should be transported to Poland, and that they should be settled there at worst in ghettos, but probably in a closed settlement area. When Schirach received in July 1940 Hitler's order to take over the Gau Vienna, Hitler himself also talked to him along the same lines, namely that he would have the Jews brought from Vienna into the General Government; and even to-day Schirach has no doubt that Hitler himself was not thinking about the so-called "final solution" of the Jewish question at that time (1940). We learn from the Hossbach minutes and other evidence of these trials that Hitler was planning the evacuation to Poland already in 1937, but that he decided on the extermination of the Jewish people only in the year 1941 or 1942.

DEFENSE

Schirach had nothing to do at all with the evacuation of the Jews from Vienna; the execution of this measure was exclusively in the hands of the Reich Security Main Office (RSHA) and the Vienna office of this agency, and it is known that the Vienna SS Lieutenant (SS-Sturmfuehrer) Dr. Brunner has in the meantime been sentenced to death because of it. The only report which Schirach received and carried out concerning the Viennese Jews was to report to Hitler in 1940, how many Jews there were still left in Vienna, and he gave this report in a latter part of December 1940, where he gave the figure of the Viennese Jews for 1940 as being 60,000. As it is known, Minister Lammers answered this letter by the defendant Schirach with a letter, dated 3 December 1940 (1950-PS), which shows with all clarity that it was not Schirach who ordered the evacuation of the Viennese Jews into the General Government, but Hitler himself, and that it was not Schirach, either, who carried out this measure, but the Reichsfuehrer-SS Himmler who delegated his Vienna office with this task. It therefore has to be stated here categorically that Schirach is in no way responsible for the deportation of the Jews from Vienna; he did not execute this action and he did not start it; when he came to Vienna in the summer of 1940 as Gauleiter, the large part of the Viennese Jews had already voluntarily emigrated or had been forcibly evacuated from Vienna, a fact which was also confirmed by the defendant Seyss-Inquart. The remaining 60,000 Jews who were still there at the beginning of Schirach's time in Vienna were deported from there by the SS, without his participation and without his responsibility. In spite of it, Schirach held the well-known Viennese speech of September 1942 (3046-PS) in which he stated that every Jew working in Europe was a danger for European culture; Schirach furthermore said in this speech: If one wanted to make reproaches to him now that he had deported 10,000 and more Jews into the Eastern ghetto from this city which had once been the metropolis of Judaism, then he had to answer: "He considers that as an active contribution to European culture." Schirach has openly and courageously admitted that he actually expressed himself in this sense at that time, and he has stated here remorsefully: "I cannot take back this wicked word, I must take the responsibility for it, I spoke this word which I sincerely regret."

Should the Tribunal see in these words a legally punishable crime against humanity, Schirach must make atonement for this single anti-Semitic remark which could be proved against him, though they merely remained words and did not result in any harmful aftermath. Schirach's attitude here does not exempt the Tribunal from its duty to verify carefully what Schirach has really done, furthermore under what circumstances he made this remark, and finally whether Schirach had also made any other spiteful remarks against the Jews or committed any malicious actions against Jewry as a whole.

The foremost question is: What has Schirach really done? The reply to it as arising from the results of these proceedings can only be: apart from the fact that he made some isolated anti-Semitic remarks in September 1942, he has not committed any crime against the Jews. He had no competence in the question of the deportation of the Vienna Jews, he did not participate in it at all, and having too little power he could not prevent them altogether. It is just as the Prosecution incidentally stated: He boastfully attributed to himself an action which in reality he had never committed, and in view of his entire attitude could never have done.

What, however prompted Schirach to make this remark? How did he come to attribute an incident to himself and incriminate himself for an activity which he had never committed? The answer is given by the results of the evidence: It demonstrates how very difficult a position Schirach had in Vienna; without giving any reason, Hitler dismissed him as Reich Sport Leader, presumably because he no longer trusted him. From one year to another Hitler's fear was growing that the more youth stood behind Schirach, the more they would be alienated from him (Hitler), the more the black wall of his SS was separating him from his people.

Hitler possibly saw in his Youth Leader the personification of the coming generation who thought in worldwide terms, whose feelings were humane and who felt themselves more and more bound to those perceptions of true morality which Hitler had long ago thrown overboard for himself and his leadership of the nation because they were no longer concepts of true morality but mere slogans of a meaningless propaganda. This feeling might have been a deeper reason for Hitler to dismiss Schirach as Youth Leader suddenly in the summer of 1940, without any word of explanation, and send him to Vienna as Gauleiter, a most difficult position in the city he (Hitler) hated from the bottom of his heart, even whilst he spoke of his "Austrian Fatherland." In Vienna Schirach's position was extremely complicated. Wherever he went he was shadowed and spied upon, his administrative activity there was sharply criticized, he was reproached for not looking after the interests of the Party in Vienna for hardly ever assisting at Party meetings and for not making any public speech. The Berlin Party Chancellery received any complaints the Vienna Party members made about their new Gauleiter with satisfaction and this fact alone might explain the unfortunate speech Schirach made in September 1942, which was diametrically opposed to the attitude he had always maintained to the Jewish question. After the interrogation of the witness Gustav Hoepken, there can be no doubt as to how the Vienna Speech had come about, for it indicates that Schirach had then expressly commissioned his press agent Guenther Kaufmann to emphasize this particular point when telephoning his report of the Vienna speech to the German News Agency, "because he had to make a concession to Bormann in this respect," a point stressed by Schirach himself in the course of his interrogation with the words "out of false loyalty he had morally identified himself with these acts of Hitler and Himmler."

DEFENSE

This malicious speech which Schirach made in September 1942 is, however, in another sense a very valuable point in favor of Schirach: in the course thereof Schirach speaks of a "Transfer of the Jews to the Ghetto of the East." Had Schirach known at that time that the Vienna Jews were to be sent away in order to be murdered in an extermination camp, without doubt—in view of the purpose of this speech—he would not have spoken of an Eastern Ghetto to which the Jews had been sent, but he would have reported the extermination of the Vienna Jews; but even at that time, in the fall of 1942, he never had the slightest idea that Hitler wanted to kill the Jews. That he would never have approved of and never accepted, his anti-Semitism had at no time gone so far.

Schirach has also frankly stated here that he had at that time approved of Hitler's plan for a Jewish settlement in Poland, not inspired by anti-Semitism or hatred of the Jews, but by the reasonable consideration that with regard to actual conditions it would have been in the own interests of the Jews to leave Vienna for Poland, because the Jews could not in the long run have been able to stay in Vienna for the duration of the Hitler-regime, but would have always been exposed to serious persecution; as Schirach declared on 24 May 1946 "considering Goebbels' temperament" it always seemed possible that incidents like those of November 1930 could be evoked in one night, and under such conditions of legal unsecurity the existence of the Jewish population in Germany would be unimaginable. He thought that Jewry would be safer in a restricted settlement area of the General Government than in Germany and Austria, where it was exposed to the "whims of the Propaganda Minister," who indeed had been the main supporter of the radical anti-Semitism in Germany. Schirach was well aware of this fact. He could not shut his eyes to the knowledge that the drive against the Jews in Germany daily became obviously more drastic, more fanatic, and so very much more violent.

This conception of the Vienna speech of September 1942 and the true cause of its genesis coincide with the declaration of the defendant Schirach at the meeting of the Town Councillors of Vienna on 6 June 1942 (3886-PS), namely, that in the late summer and fall of this year all Jews would be expelled from this city, and likewise with the file note of the Reichsleiter Bormann of 2 October 1940 (USSR 142), according to which, at a social meeting at Hitler's home, Schirach had remarked that he still had more than 50,000 Jews left in Vienna, which the Governor General of Poland must take over from him. This remark finds its reasoning in Schirach's embarrassing situation at that time; Hitler, on the one hand pressed more and more for the expulsion of the Jews from Vienna, the Governor General Dr. Frank on the other hand strove against the acceptance of the Vienna Jews in the General-Government. This disagreement was evidently the reason for Schirach discussing this fact at the above-mentioned meeting on 2 October 1940 in order to avoid renewed reproaches by the Fuehrer. He, Schirach, personally was not interested in the slightest in the removal of the Vienna Jews, as was proved by the testimony of the witness Gustav Hoepken regarding the discussion between Schirach and Himmler in November 1943. But Hitler demanded it and Himmler insisted on its execution.

The Prosecution has now thought it possible to reproach Schirach with having made another malicious anti-Semitic remark, namely a speech which he supposedly made in late December 1938 at a Student's Meeting at Heidelberg. Across the Neckar River he pointed to the old University town of Heidelberg, where several burned-out synagogues were the silent witnesses of the anti-Semitic activities of the students of Heidelberg and where the "little stout Reichstudents' leader"—as it is stated literally—is said to have by this incident approved and praised the anti-Jewish pogroms of 9 November 1938 as a heroic act. This accusation is supported by the declaration in lieu of oath of a certain Gregor Ziemer (2441-PS, USA 679). However there can be no doubt, that this claim of Ziemer is false. Ziemer never belonged to the student movement or the Hitler Youth, and obviously was not personally present at the student assembly in question; the affidavit does not state from what source he is supposed to have obtained his knowledge; however, that his claim is false is already proven by his description of physical appearance when he speaks of a "little, fat student-leader;" for this does not at all apply to Schirach; perhaps it would to some extent apply to his successor, who was Reich Student Leader at the end of 1938, but it certainly was not Schirach. As is known he had already in 1934 given the office of Reich Student Leader back into the hands of the Fuehrer's deputy, after he himself had in the meantime been appointed Reich Youth Leader. Schirach did not hold a speech at the end of 1938 or at any other time before Heidelberg students, and by the affidavit of the witness Mrs. Maria Hoepken it has been clearly proved, that at the time stated, from 9 November 1938 until the end of the year 1938, Schirach was not in Heidelberg at all. Schirach has also stated this under oath and his own statement can lay claim to credibility because he has not white washed anything for which he was responsible, and he has not wrongfully denied anything, but on the contrary has accounted for all his actions like a man and with love of the truth.

DEFENSE

Still another fact decisively confirms that the claim of the Ziemer affidavit is untrue, at any rate in regard to the person of Schirach. In the presentation of evidence it happened to be stated by chance how Schirach reacted to the November-pogroms of the year 1938. The witness Lauterbacher has informed us here, as already mentioned on another occasion, that Schirach on 10 November 1938 had condemned most vehemently the events of 9 November 1938 before his collaborators, and declared that he felt ashamed for the others and the whole party. The 9 November 1938 would go down to German history as a unique German cultural disgrace. "We could not wash ourselves clean of it; Such a thing could have happened with an uncivilized people but it should never have occurred with us Germans who imagine ourselves to be a highly civilized people." The Youth Leader had to prevent such excesses under any circumstances; of his own organization he did not wish to hear anything like it, neither now nor in the future. The Hitler Youth must be kept outside such things under any circumstances. Schirach then had all the offices of the Hitler Youth informed by phone from Berlin in the same sense. If Schirach in November 1938 condemned and disowned in such an extremely sharp manner the events of 9 November 1938, it is impossible for him to have celebrated at about the same time the bloody acts which had been committed and thus have incited the Heidelberg students and the question therefore arises as to why a single participant of that student meeting in Heidelberg was not brought here as a witness, but that the Tribunal was satisfied instead with a witness who could only testify from hearsay. Moreover, the representative of the Prosecution did not revert to this alleged Heidelberg speech during the cross-examination and thereby acknowledged Schirach's own presentation of the facts as correct.

It is also a very significant fact, that the Hitler Youth did neither participate in the excesses of 9 November 1938 nor did they commit any violence of such a kind either before or afterward. The Hitler Youth was then the strongest Party organization; it comprised about 7-8 million members and in spite of that not one single case has been proved where the Hitler Youth participated in such crimes against humanity, although its members were mainly of an age, which according to experience is only too easily tempted to participate in excesses and acts of brutality. The only exception which has been claimed, concerns the testimony of the French woman Ida Vasseau, who is said to have been head of an Old People's Home in Lemberg and who is supposed to have claimed, according to the report of the Commission (USSR 6) "that the Hitler Youth had been given children from the Ghetto in Lemberg whom they used as living targets for their shooting practice." This single exception, however, which has been claimed so far, could not be cleared up in any way, particularly not in the direction of whether members of the Hitler Youth had really been involved. But even if there had been such a single case among the 8 million members during 10 or 15 years, this could not in any way prove that Baldur von Schirach had exercised an inciting influence.

Let us at last examine all the speeches and articles which Schirach wrote as Reich Youth Leader and which are in the possession of the Tribunal in the document book. They extend over a long period of years, yet they do not contain a word inciting to race hatred, preaching hatred of Jews, or exhorting the youth to commit acts of violence or defending such acts. If it has been possible to keep the members of the Hitler Youth, who numbered millions, apart from such excess, it proves the fact that the leaders endeavored to imbue the youth with the spirit of tolerance, love of his neighbor, and respect of human dignity.

DEFENSE

How Schirach thought about the treatment of the Jewish question is clearly evident from the scene which occurred in spring 1943 on the Obersalzberg and which is also described in the affidavit of the witness Maria Hoepken. I refer to the scene where Schirach's wife told Hitler in his home how she had witnessed with her own eyes from a hotel-window in Amsterdam, how the Gestapo had deported hundreds of Dutch Jewesses. Schirach himself could not dare at the time to bring such matters to Hitler's attention; a decree of Bormann had expressively prohibited this to the district leaders (Gauleiter). Schirach therefore agreed with his wife that the latter should try to gain an improvement in the treatment of the Jewish question with Hitler. She did not succeed in this; Hitler dismissed Frau von Schirach with the harsh words "these were sentimentalities," and Frau von Schirach did not understand anything about it. Because of this intervention on behalf of the Dutch Jews the situation of the defendant von Schirach had become so critical that he preferred to leave the Obersalzberg immediately in the early morning of the following day, and since that time Hitler was on principle no longer accessible to Schirach.

This intervention of Schirach for a milder treatment of the Jewish question perhaps also contributed to the fact that Hitler, a few months later, in the summer of 1943, seriously considered having Schirach arrested and having him brought before the People's Court for the reason alone that Schirach had dared in a letter to Reichsleiter Bormann to describe the war as a national disaster for Germany.

In any case all this shows that Schirach forcibly stood for moderation in the Jewish question, and that in a manner whereby he endangered his own position and existence. In spite of the fact that he was an anti-Semite,—and it is just because of this that it deserves attention—he withheld all pressure from Berlin and refused to have an anti-Semitic special edition published in the official journal of the Hitler Youth, while he had published his own special editions for an understanding with England and for a more humane treatment of the Eastern nations; it is no less worthy of consideration that Schirach in conjunction with his friend Dr. Colin Ross strove for the emigration of the Jews into the neutral foreign countries in order to save them from being deported to a Polish Ghetto.

7. The prosecution has now endeavored to justify the accusation of a certain share of the defendant von Schirach in the responsibility for the pogroms against Jews which occurred in Poland and Russia, by trying to use against him the so-called "Reports on practice and situation" which were regularly sent in by the SS to the "Commissioner for Defense of the Reich in Military Administrative District XVII" (3876-PS). In fact it must be said: If Schirach had at that time had cognizance of these regular "Reports on practice and situation of the operational groups of the Security Police and the Security Service" in the East, then this would indeed entail for him a grave moral and political charge; he could then not be spared the reproach that he must have been aware that, apart from the military operations in the East, horribly cruel mass murders of Communists and Jews had also taken place. The character picture we have had so far of von Schirach, who was also described by the Prosecution as a "cultured man," would be obscured very materially if von Schirach effectively had seen and read these reports. For he would then have known in Latvia and Lithuania, in White Ruthenia and in Kiev, mass murders had taken place, and this quite obviously without any judicial proceedings of any kind and without sentence being passed.

What has, however, been proved by the evidence?

The reports referred to went, as to dozens of others offices, also to that of the "Reich Commissioner in Military Administrative District XVII" and moreover with the express direction "for attention of Government Councillor (Regierungsrat) Dr. Hofmann" or "for attention of Government Councillor (Regierungsrat) Dr. Fischer." From this style of address and from the way in which these reports were initialed at the office of the "Commissioner for Defense of the Reich" it can be established beyond question that Schirach did not have an opportunity of seeing these reports and that he obtained no knowledge of them in any other way either.

Schirach, as is well-known, occupied three extensive offices in Vienna: as Reichsstatthalter and Reich Defense Commissioner he was the chief of the whole State administration, as Lord Mayor he was the head of the Communal administration, and as District Leader (Gauleiter) of Vienna, he was the top of the local Party-machine. It is now only natural that Schirach could not fulfill all these three tasks by himself, especially since in 1940 he had entered a completely different field of tasks, and first had to become accustomed to the work in the state as well as in the communal-administration. He therefore had a permanent deputy for each of his 3 tasks, and this was for the affairs of the state administration, Regierungspräsident Dr. Delbruegge. Subject Dr. Delbruegge had to handle the current affairs of the state administration completely on his own; Schirach occupied himself only with matters of the state administration with regard to such matters, which were directed to him by his permanent deputy Dr. Delbruegge in written form or about which Dr. Delbruegge or one of the departmental assistants reported to him orally.

DEFENSE

Now, if this had been the case with regard to the aforementioned "Situation and Experience-Reports" ("Lage- und Erfahrungsberichte") then this would have somehow been noted on the documents in question. On the "Experience- and Situation-Reports" submitted there is not a single note however, which shows that this report was submitted to the defendant von Schirach or that he was oriented about it. This can also be understood without further explanation; because after all, the experiences which the police and the SD had accumulated in the partisan-struggles in Poland and Russia were completely inconsequential for the Vienna administration; therefore there was not the least cause to inform the defendant von Schirach in any way who was very much overburdened anyway with administrative matters of all kinds of these reports.

This result not only depends primarily on the testimony under oath of the defendant, but also on that of both witnesses Hoepken and Wieshofer, who as Chief of the "Central Office" and/or as adjutant of the defendant were able to give the most exact information about the Vienna conditions. It is certain that these "Experience and Situation Reports" never came into the distribution of the "Central Office" in Vienna, but only into the distribution of Regierungspräsident Dr. Delbruegge, and that Hoepken as Chief of the Central Office, as well as Wieshofer, as adjutant of the defendant, likewise did not have any previous knowledge of these "Experience and Situation Reports" but came to see them for the first time here in the Court Room during their questioning.

In any case the result is, as has been proven by the file notes which are on the documents, that Schirach did not have any knowledge whatsoever of these reports, that he is not co-responsible for the atrocities described therein, and therefore cannot be criminally charged on account of these activity reports.

8. In order to judge the policy of Schirach, his behavior during the last weeks in Vienna is also not without importance: for Schirach it was only natural not to carry out the various insane orders which came from Berlin then: he has turned the lynch-justice concerning enemy aviators which was ordered by Bormann far from himself, and likewise the order to hang defeatists without pity, regardless whether they were men or women; his summary court has never even been in session, his summary court has not pronounced a single death sentence, NO BLOOD STICKS TO HIS HANDS. On the contrary, he has done everything, for example, in order to protect enemy aviators who had made an emergency landing from the excited mob, and he has, as we have heard from the witness Wieshofer, for example, immediately sent out his own motor vehicle in order to bring American aviators who had parachuted into safety; thereby he again placed himself in conscious contrast to an order of Bormann, that such aviators were not to be protected from lynching acts of the civilian population. He also did not pay any attention to the order that Vienna was to be defended "to the last man," or that in Vienna, bridges and churches and residential sections were to be destroyed, and he abruptly refused the order to form partisan units in civilian clothing or to continue the hopeless struggle in a criminal manner with the aid of the "Werewolf"; he refused such demands from his sense of duty, especially since this would have caused him to violate international law.

9. The picture of the character of the defendant von Schirach would be incomplete if we did not recall at this moment in addition the declaration which he deposed here in the morning of 24 May 1946. I am speaking of that declaration in which he has described Hitler as a MILLIONFOLD MURDERER, here before the whole German people and before the whole world public. Schirach has already in the past year made declarations which show his feeling of responsibility and his preparedness to answer for his actions and those of his subordinates to the full extent. This was the case on 5 June 1945, for example, when he was hiding in Tyrol, and heard over the radio that all Party leaders were to be brought before an Allied court. Schirach as a result of this reported himself immediately and in his letter to the American local commander stated he was doing this in order to prevent others being made to account for his actions, who had only executed his orders; he surrendered voluntarily, although the English radio had already announced the news of his death, and although Schirach could have hoped to remain in his hiding-place undiscovered. This manner of action deserves consideration in judging the personality of a defendant and in estimating his guilt. The same love of responsibility was then shown by Schirach in the autumn of 1945 as he was heard by the Prosecution: he believed then that his successor Axmann had fallen; in spite of this, Schirach did not attempt to pass his responsibility on to his successor; on the contrary, he expressly stated that he assumed full responsibility also for the time of his successor, as well as for what had been done under his successor in the Reich Youth Leadership. The keystone in this line is now fashioned by the statement which Schirach made here on 24 May 1946 and which went out of this room into the wide world, into all the German lands up to the last farm, up to the last workman's hovel.

DEFENSE

Any man may err, he may even make mistakes that he later may not himself understand; Schirach also has erred; he has brought up the youth for a man whom he for many years held as unimpeachable and whom he must now brand as a diabolical criminal; in his idealism and out of loyalty he remained faithful and true to his oath to a man who deceived and cheated him and the German youth and who, as we learned here from Speer, up to his last breath placed his own interests higher than the existence and the happiness of 80 million people.

Schirach is perhaps the one defendant who not only clearly realized his mistakes, which you may judge whichever way you like, but who confessed them most honestly and who through his plain speaking prevented creation of a legend in the future. Such a defendant must be given the benefit of his trying to repair as far as lies within his possibilities the damage which in good faith he has caused.

Schirach has tried to do that: he took pains to open the eyes of our people about the "Fuehrer," in whom, together with millions of Germans he saw, through many years, the deliverer of the Fatherland and the guarantor of its future. The former leader of the Reich youth wanted before anything else to tell the German Youth openly that so far, quite unknowingly and with the best intentions, he had led them astray, and that now they must take another direction, if the German people and the German culture were not to perish. In this, Schirach did not think of himself; he was thinking of the youth of to-day, which not only is facing the ruins of our cities and dwellings, but is also wandering about among the wreckage of its former ideals; he was thinking of the German youth, which is in dire need of a new orientation and which must base its future existence on another foundation. Schirach hopes that the entire German youth has heard his words. What was particularly valuable in his confession of 24 May 1946 was his assurance that he alone bore the guilt for the young people, just as he formerly bore the command over them. If this point of view is acknowledged as being right, and if the necessary conclusions are drawn therefrom, the result would be for our German youth a valuable outcome of these trials.

My time is getting short; therefore I wish to come to the end of my considerations of the case of Baldur von Schirach.

You are the highest tribunal of our times; the power of the whole world stands back of you; you represent the four mightiest nations on earth; hundreds of millions of men, not only in the defeated countries, but also in the victorious nations listen to your opinions and anxiously await your judgment.

This high authority gives you the possibility of doing much good through your verdict and its foundations in order that out of to-day's disaster the way to a better future may be found for the benefit of your own people and for the blessing of the German people.

To-day Germany lies on the ground, a poor people, the poorest of all: the German cities are destroyed; the German industry is smashed to pieces; on the shoulders of the German people rests a national debt representing many times the whole national wealth and which means want and poverty, hunger and slavery for many generations of the German people if your people do not help us.

The argument supporting your verdict will in many respects point the way for the help needed to emerge from this desperate plight.

For reasons of sentiment, it may be hard for you to consider this idea and to take it into account, when you think of the misfortune which the past six years also brought to your own countries. It becomes doubly hard, because for months these Court proceedings revealed nothing but crimes committed for a great number of years by a tyrant with the misuse of Germans and in the name of this same German people of whose future you as judges are now asked to think. Hitler is dead, with him his tools who in these years committed crimes without number tyrannizing over Germany and nearly all of Europe. The German people on the other hand lives and must be allowed to live if half a universe is not to fall into ruins.

With this trial and during this epoch, the German people is undergoing a very serious operation; it must not bring death; it must bring healing. Your verdict can and must make a contribution in that direction, so that in future the world may not see in every German a criminal but revert again to the concept of Professor Arnold Nash of Chicago University who a few days ago when questioned about the purpose of his present trip to Europe replied: "Every scientist has two fatherlands, his own and Germany."

Do not forget: there always was and there still is to-day another Germany, a Germany that knows industriousness and economy, a

DEFENSE

Germany of Goethe and Beethoven, a Germany that knows loyalty and honesty and other good qualities which in past centuries were proverbial for the German character. You may believe us: in this epoch, as Germany regains consciousness after a severe illness, as she proceeds to rebuild a better future from the ruins of an evil past, a future for its youth which has no part in the crimes committed—at this time 70 or 80 million German people are looking to you and are awaiting from you a verdict which will open the way for a reconstruction of German economy, of the German heart, and true freedom.

You are independent judges not bound by a written law, pledged to serve your conscience only, and called by destiny to give to the world a legal order which will preserve for future generations that peace which the past was unable to preserve for them. A well-known democrat of the old Germany said this in a recent article on the Nurnberg Trial: In a monarchist State, justice would be administered in the name of the King; in a Republic, Courts would pronounce their rulings in the name of the people but you, the Nurnberg Tribunal, you should administer justice in the name of humanity.

It is, indeed, a wonderful thought for the Court, an ideal aim, if it could believe that its verdict could realize the commands of humanity and that for all time it could prevent crimes against humanity. But in certain respects this would still remain an unsteady foundation for your verdict. Because ideas on what humanity demands or prohibits in individual cases may vary, depending upon the epoch, the people, the attitude of the party according to which one judges.

I believe you may find a reliable foundation for your verdict when you revert to the phrase already coined by the ancient Romans, the phrase which endured throughout centuries and which certainly will still remain valid in ages to come:

Justitia est fundamentus regnorum. (Justice is the basis of every state.) Pronounce a judgment hailed not only by the victor nations of to-day as the last victory over Germany, but which history also will recognize as just; pronounce your verdict in the name of justice!

2. FINAL PLEA of Baldur von Schirach

On the 24th of May I made a statement here which I answer before God and my conscience and to which I fully stand even to-day at the end of the trial because it was and is in compliance with my honest innermost conviction.

The British Prosecution, in their final statement, pronounced the following sentence: "Schirach spoiled millions of German children so that they became what they really are to-day, the blind instruments of that policy of murder and domination which these men have carried out." If this accusation were justified I would say no word in my defense. This accusation, however, is not justified; it is untrue. Whoever in any way takes into consideration the results of the evidence in this trial and honestly appreciates it can never and under no circumstances raise the accusation against me that I, through my educational work, had spoiled the youth and poisoned their souls. The principles and aims which I set for the youth and which were accepted for the community built up by the youth with their own powers under my leadership were the following: Self-sacrificing love for the Fatherland, the overcoming of snobbery and class hatred, the planned taking care of health, training by means of walks, games, and sports, cooperation in professional training, and particularly a comradely understanding of the youth of foreign countries. These principles and aims were mine since my own youth and I consider them to be the ideals of a national German education. Those principles and aims were not dictated to me by the Party or the State, and if Hitler were present here to-day, then it would be completely irrelevant for my defense, because as the leader of youth in the Reich I do not rest upon him but upon myself.

These principles of education, however, which in all my speeches, writings, and instructions have been proved a thousand-fold and to which I have been faithful as the leader of German youth, are, according to my firm conviction, principles of every leader of youth in this world if he is conscious of his duty toward the people and youth. The activities of our youth and its moral attitude has proved me right and has proved that they have never been spoiled and were not spoiled through me either. German youth was and is industrious, decent, honest, and full of idealism. In peace it honestly contributed toward the education and in war it did its duty bravely to the limit, its duty toward our nation and our German people.

In this hour when I can speak to the Military Tribunal of the four victorious powers for the last time, I want to testify on behalf of our German youth, and with a clear conscience, that it is innocent regarding the atrocities of the Hitler regime unveiled during this trial, that it never wanted this war, and that neither in peace nor in war it participated in any crimes. As the leader of German youth of long standing, I know the development, the inner attitude, and the conduct of our young generation. Who could know it better than I? This youth always gave me the greatest pleasure. In their midst I was always happy and at all times I have been proud of them.

DEFENSE

I know that in the years when I was the leader of German youth and in spite of the fact that their membership counted millions, youth, as a matter of principle and without exception, has remained removed from any actions of which it might have to be ashamed to-day. It knew nothing of the numerous cruelties which have been committed by Germans, and just as it knew of no wrongs, it has not desired any wrong. It must not be overlooked that even during the strongest embitterment of its days after a war nobody could expect to accuse the organization of German youth and its leaders of being criminal. Unselfish comradeship in a youth movement which showed the greatest love for the poorest children of the people, faith to the homeland, pleasure in outdoor life, and honest understanding of the youths of foreign peoples, that was the aim of our youth and those were the contents of its education from the first to the last day of my time as Reich youth leader. This youth truly does not deserve the serious fate which has come upon it.

My personal fate is of no importance, but the youth is the hope of our nation. And if in this last moment I may make a request, then it is this:

Will you, as judges, help so that the distorted picture will be removed which the world may have of the German youth to-day and which could not stand up under historical investigation. Will you tell the world in your findings that the distorted writings of a Gregor Ziemer used by the Prosecution contain nothing but the evil slander of a man who transfers his hatred against everything German to the German youth also. Will you, as judges, help also that the youth organizations of your peoples will once again take up the work together with the German youth where, in 1939, without the guilt of the young generation, it has been interrupted.

With a grateful heart our youth has listened to the words of Lord Beveridge who farseeingly and with passion, spoke for having German youth declared free of guilt. With great joy it will grasp the hand stretched out toward it across ruins and debris.

Will you, gentlemen, of the Tribunal, contribute with your judgment to create an atmosphere of joint respect for German youth, an atmosphere which is free of hatred and free of revenge.

That is my last request, made with all my heart on behalf of our German youth!

XVII. FRITZ SAUCKEL

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Robert Servatius, Defense Counsel

May it please the Tribunal:

The defense of the defendant Sauckel has, in the first place, to deal with the charge of "slave labor".

What is slave labor?

One cannot accept this as an established concept comprehending all the occurrences with which the defendant Sauckel is, in a bewildering abundance, charged under the heading slave labor.

Those actions, particularly, ought first to be examined from a juridical point of view. The legal basis for this examination is the Charter.

However, this Charter does not say what is to be understood by "slave labor" and what by "deportation." Therefore, these concepts should be clarified by interpretation. Article 6 of the Charter speaks, in two passages and from two different points of view, of "deportation" and of "slave labor". Deportation is called both a war crime and a crime against humanity, and forced labor appears as well as "slave labor" under the heading of war crimes and as "enslaving" under the heading of crimes against humanity.

The question, under what heading the deployment of labor (Arbeitseinsatz) of the defendant Sauckel should fall is of decisive importance; if it is a war crime, then it should be judged exclusively by martial law. If it is a crime against humanity, then the latter presupposes the commission of a war crime or of a crime against peace.

It follows thereof that deportation mentioned in Article 6(b) cannot be the same thing as deportation according to Article 6(c) nor can forced labor according to Article 6(b) be identical with forced labor of Article 6(c). The difference between the two kinds is to be found in the fact that something contrary to humanity has to be added to the war crimes.

The correctness of this interpretation may also be recognized in the terminology of the Charter, however fluctuating it may be. For instance, the Russian text for deportation as a war crime chooses the word "uvod", which only means removal from a place, while on the other hand it uses, for crimes against humanity of the same kind, the technical expression "ssylka" under which penal deportation under the rule of the czars is understood as identical in sense with deportation as penal deportation.

One can deduce therefrom that simple removal from occupied territory for labor purposes is only to be considered as a war crime, but that removal becomes a crime against humanity when it assumes the penal character of a transportation of prisoners. Yet the question arises whether, beyond this, according to the Charter, any removal of the population is punishable as a war crime, without considering whether it occurs for deployment of labor or for other reasons. According to the text of the Charter, the latter seems at first sight to be the case, as it renders punishable "removal for slave labor, or for any other purpose." Upon closer examination, however, it becomes evident that this rule does not seem to be meant in such a sense, as there are cases in which a removal is not only consistent with international law but even becomes imperative.

DEFENSE

Accordingly, the Charter should only be understood to mean that the prerequisite of the punishable is not just plain "removal" but the composite concept "removal for slave labor" and "removal for any other purpose".

The clause "or for any other purpose" should be understood so as to mean only that an illegal purpose corresponding to slave labor exists. If removal of any kind was to be made punishable, then the qualifying addition "for slave labor or for any other purpose" would be contradictory to common sense.

This identification is important for the defendant Sauckel, as otherwise the existence of deportation classified as a war crime would be evident from the acts admitted by him. Just as for the various kinds of deportation, the difference between the kinds of slave labor according to the Charter should be clarified. Here too a clue for the interpretation is given by the terminology of the different linguistic versions of the text, but not because of their clarity and consistency, but by their very opposite.

The English version speaks of "slave labor" as a war crime and of "enslavement" as a crime against humanity; the French version states "travaux forces" and "reduction en esclavage"; the Russian version accordingly "rabstvo" (-slavery) and "poraboschtschenie" (-enslavement). It is not discernible how the chosen terms differentiate in re.

Starting from the fact that labor inconsistent with humanity must be carried out under more severe conditions than other labor, and considering that "slave labor" appears to be the severest form of labor conditions, one sees that no definition can be derived from this terminology of the Charter, rather that an ethical valuation and stigmatization of the incident is intended.

Accordingly, an objective division of the kinds of labor should be carried out, independent of the terminology, by considering exclusively the degree of severity of labor conditions. If one tries to analyze the terminology used, one finds the designation "enslavement", "esclavage", and "poraboschtschnie" for the inhuman form of labor, whereas the labor not inconsistent with humanity is called "forced labor", "travaux forces", and "prinuditjenaja rabota". Slave labor (Slave labor, travaux forces, and rabstvo) consequently is the general term comprehending both kinds.

What does this verification mean for the defense of the defendant Sauckel? The defendant Sauckel admits having negotiated the "forced labor" in the form of compulsory labor which, as stated before, is being termed by "slave labor" in general. He denies, however, having demanded slave labor, which could have been considered as inhuman labor, i.e., enslavement. A different standard applies here, just as for deportation, to the facts of these two cases; "compulsory labor" is but a war crime and is to be judged according to rules of war; the crime against humanity has, as already stated above for the deportation as crimes against humanity, the additional features of connection with war crimes or crimes against Peace.

If it can be proved that the mobilization of manpower, as ordered by the defendant Sauckel, was permitted by the rules of war, then the same act cannot be held to be a crime against humanity.

The indictment too has made a difference as to the kinds of labor. It has treated, under paragraph 3, Chapter VIII H, as a separate war crime under the title of "Conscription of civilian labor", the mobilization of manpower directed by the defendant Sauckel, which I shall call "regulated labor conscription", "geordneten Arbeitseinsatz" and speaks here only of "forced labor"; the French version speaks here of "travaux forces" and uses terms such as "les obligent à travailler" and "mis en obligation"; the Russian version follows this and also speaks only of "enforced labor" as "prinuditjelenaja rabota", but not of this being slave labor.

The defendant Sauckel does not deny the facts taken here as a basis, but I shall submit the legal reasons which justify this mobilization of labor and I shall prove that it does not involve any war crime inconsistent with international law.

The rules of international law are authoritative when considering the question whether "regulated labor conscription" is a war crime. The Charter cannot prohibit what international law permits in wartime. Such international law is laid down in the agreements on rules of war and in the general legal principles and usages as they are applied by the States.

DEFENSE

The Prosecution, when judging the labor conscription as a war crime, bases it on the definitions of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare, as well as on the agreements and rules of war and the criminal codes of the countries concerned. If it is shown that the labor conscription is permitted by international law, then a judicial inquiry into the penal regulations is, of course, not necessary. The Hague Convention on Land Warfare can be considered as basis for the law of warfare with which we are concerned here. Whether it was recognized by all states involved here is of practically little importance as, inasmuch as it was not recognized or cannot be directly applied, there is a gap in the international law which is closed in accordance with the principles of necessity for belligerent and with the duty for staying within the boundaries of humanity. The principles of international law as established in the Hague Convention on Land Warfare are in all cases an important guidance.

The Prosecution quotes in the first place Article 46 of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare which is to safeguard the fundamental rights of the population. It is typical of forced labor that it restricts liberty, but it is exactly this basic right which is not protected by this article.

If the Hague Convention on Land Warfare is examined for a definite rule concerning deportation and forced labor it will be realized that there is no such regulation. Just as in the sphere of air warfare and the use of new weapons, the Hague Convention on Land Warfare could not deal with questions, which at the time of its drafting were far from the mind of the contracting parties. The first world war was still fought between 2 armies with already prepared material and the fight should be ended after it was used up. The idea of a long war which was a war of material and which required a continuous production with all available labor was for the Hague Convention on Land Warfare no problem to be discussed.

Article 52 of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare which deals with the principle of the right for requisition touches on the matter under discussion, but it can be seen that the rules deal only with the merely local requirements of the army which appears to be equipped and which has only additional local requirements.

It is characteristic, for the purely local meaning, that the authority for requisitions is entrusted to the local commanders in contrast to Article 51 of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare which permits only an independent commanding general to impose compulsory contributions. The literature about the right for requisition in international law quotes accordingly only examples of local significance.

Although Article 52 of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare can accordingly not be directly applied, its basic principles are nevertheless binding on the belligerents.

The basic idea is that the army can demand practically everything that is necessary for the satisfaction of their requirements. There are only two limitations, it can not take more than it needs, and not more than is compatible with the resources of the country.

The idea of the local duty for supply "oertlichen Leistungspflicht" is to adapt to modern warfare. The Hague Convention on Land Warfare thought of the use of smiths and wheelwrights which were necessary for the maintenance of the equipment of the army; work inside the country of the occupying power was, with regard to the undeveloped transportation conditions, out of the question and could not be considered.

Today, the necessary work cannot be done any more near the front lines but must be done in the belligerents' own countries. It must therefore be possible to demand labor only where it can be done and where it is necessary. It must be possible to demand this work also for the new war requirements of mass production for the current replacements.

What is necessary at any given time can be demanded and the amount depends on the respective conditions. If in earlier times, according to the principle, "the war supplies the war," the equipping of the army, detached from the homeland with regard to transportation, was also done on a large scale in the occupied territory, it must be possible today to supply the army by moving the workers to the factories in the country of the belligerent. The evolution of the law of warfare is influenced by the requirements to which this law has to serve.

With the basic idea of the duty for supply, the basic idea of the limitation has to be accepted. These limitations must also be interpreted in accordance with the changed conditions.

If the duty for supply is justified, no more work can be demanded than the occupying power demands from its own people at home. The intensity of the war as total war must be taken in consideration. The duty for supply may hereby become very large.

The meaning and the purpose of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare are certainly not to place the nationals of a defeated state in a better position than those of the victorious state which occupies the country. This, however, would be the result if the Hague Convention on Land Warfare would be interpreted according to its original wording. If this is claimed, France which had unconditionally capitulated, as well as the other occupied countries, could have looked on in security how Germany, strangled by the blockade, exhausted herself in an indefatigable struggle in sacrifices of life and property. Can one really demand that the prisoners in a besieged fortress lives better than the defender of the fortress? If Germany could live today according to the idyll of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare, this would be preferable to the burden of the peace treaty to be expected.

DEFENSE

Actually the Hague Convention on Land Warfare has not been adhered to in its original interpretation, if it is true that already, before the conclusion of the armistice agreement, the Soviet Union as occupying power transferred the population on a large scale from the eastern parts of Germany for work outside Germany. The Tribunal could obtain official information about this through an inquiry with the Control Council. Also I have information that German civilian internees are used for work in France today. Here too the Tribunal could obtain official information.

The second limitation of the duty for work is embodied in the rule that no participation in war enterprises against the fatherland of the worker can be demanded. Any work for the occupying power benefits indirectly its war effort; the prohibition is therefore restricted on direct participation in "operations" of the fighting force. The literature on international law contrasts the participation in military operations with the permissible participation in preparations.

A participation in war operations in this sense was asked of no worker; rather the purpose was to keep workers employed unmolested, away from these operations.

Consequently, only such activity as is directed against one's own country is forbidden. Thus, the feeling of the individual is to be taken into consideration. The protection of the enemy state is not aimed at. Wherever therefore the individual renounces his country and, in the struggle of ideologies, opposes the government of his country, such a restriction cannot be kept up. In connection with this it is pointed to the great amount of foreigners who adopted such an attitude and who, in part, still live in Germany today.

The same applies when the state, to which the worker belongs, has ceased fighting. This question is of special importance with regard to the obligation to work in the armament industry. The rules of the Geneva Convention, with regard to work permissible for prisoners of war, are known. The basic notion, that no one may be forced to make weapons against his own brother, must apply to civilian workers also.

The fact, however, that one's country is no longer in a state of war is one of the reasons that nullify this restriction. The need for protection also ceases to exist when a country—though legally participating in war—no longer is able to furnish proper resistance in the field with fighting forces and thus ceases to exist as a military object of attack.

The fact that this very country has allies, who fight for it, cannot arbitrarily extend this restriction beyond agreements of the Geneva Convention; it also is not the duty of a subject of a State to protect allies fighting for him and to participate in the policies of his government.

Puppet Governments cannot change reality. Recognition cannot be granted to them unless they come forward as independent fighters under command of their own and if they are recognized as such.

These aspects apply to all States defeated by Germany.

At the time of the mobilization of labor only England, the United States, and the Soviet-Union were active combatants against Germany. Englishmen and Americans were not subjected to this mobilization, although citizens of the Soviet Union were in part used in the armament production. The legal position of citizens of the Soviet Union is however fundamentally different.

Under Document EC-338, USSR 356 the Prosecution submitted a decision of the peoples commissars of 1 June 1941 (Beschluss der Volkskommissare). This decree involves the utilization for labor of prisoners of war; it deals however also with the employment of interned civilians. According to it, armament production is not forbidden for both forms of labor. However, two restrictions are provided for in the decree, namely, work in the combat zone and such work as might be done by an orderly.

Reciprocally speaking, no objection can be raised against the employment of Soviet citizens in armament production. During examination before the Tribunal, the witness, General Paulus, confirmed that prisoners of war were employed in factories of the Soviet Union and that in a state with a directed economy they will be employed in the armament industry only, for the duration of the war. According to the decree it must be assumed that these workers were employed in the armament production also.

The significance of such a violation of the principle of forbidding armament production lies in the grave consequence that the formulation of a generally recognized rule of the international law in the modern field of utilization of manpower cannot be proven. Under these circumstances, therefore, Germany was likewise free to employ workers of the Soviet Union and workers of all other states in the armament production.

DEFENSE

If on one hand the Hague Convention on Land Warfare does not oppose regulated utilization of manpower, then there remain further international aspects permitting such a utilization of manpower. The permission of the Government of the occupied state is of primary consideration. This permission has been given by France.

The objection that Marshal Petain's Government was not a constitutional Government is invalid, for it was the legitimate successor to the visionary armistice Government. That it represented the French State to all foreign governments is of decisive consideration in international relations. This authority of representation was confirmed by the United States, by her maintenance of an Ambassador in Vichy, even after her own entry into the war. Great Britain also agreed upon terms of an armistice with a general of the Vichy Government in Syria in 1941. This government once recognized could not lose its lawful position by the simple declaration of an opposing government even though this opposing government might have been recognized by the Allies. A government loses its international position only if it is forced to transfer its actual power to the opposing government. Up to such a moment it remains authority inside its sphere of influence.

The other objection that the Government of Marshal Petain was not free to deal as it wanted and that consequently agreements with Germany in the field of utilization of manpower were reached by coercive measures and therefore invalid, is not justified from the point of view of international law.

Negotiations for armistice and peace treaties are always conducted under great pressure. That this does not infringe upon the validity of such treaties cannot be denied from the point of view of international law. This has constantly been emphasized when refusing German demands for a revision of the Treaty of Versailles.

Agreements which are reached in periods between the armistice and peace treaty are subject to the same conditions. This also applies to the agreement with France with respect to the utilization of manpower. Thus, if—contrary to the statement of the defendant Sauckel—negotiations about the utilization of manpower were conducted in the form of an ultimatum, there could, from the point of view of international law, still be no reason for an objection. Besides, Sauckel's influence surely could not have been so great that he could have exerted an excessive amount of pressure.

The validity of such agreements can only be doubted under very special conditions, that is, when unusual duties have to be performed which obviously violate principles of humanity; for instance, if the agreements contain a liability to work under slavery conditions. The motive for these agreements was, however, to offer especially to the French workers favorable working conditions and salaries for their obligatory labor in Germany, and so to gain the willingness of the workers.

Military reasons too can command the evacuation of an occupied territory by parts of the population and therefore the shifting of manpower. This happens when the population participates in battle of partisans or resistance groups and so endanger security instead of behaving themselves peacefully according to their duty to obedience.

Also to eliminate this support it is already sufficient if the population in the so-called partisan territories is being enlisted even against its will. That such conditions were organized by Germany's enemies in an increasing manner first in the East and later in the West, are looked upon today as patriotic achievements. In view of this one must not forget that the herewith connected shifting of workers was exactly the consequence of their action and that these actions were permitted by international law.

Evacuation had to be carried out in the interest of security and assignment of labor elsewhere already was necessary to uphold order. It is the right of the occupying power to utilize this labor in a regulated state economy as seems most practical in the prevailing conditions.

Similar measures could also take place in areas of retreat after it was ascertained that the male population illegally took part in battle during the retreat when it was summoned by the enemy and sometimes even supplied with weapons.

Evacuation measures for the security of combat troops correspond with international law; to engage evacuated persons in new work is not only legal but also the duty of the occupation administration. The state which summons its members to fight and thereby intensifies the battle is guilty of such an evacuation. The necessary retaliations therefore must be legal.

If such evacuations are necessary, then they must be carried out without undue suffering for the population. Thereto advance measures are necessary which alone can avoid these hardships. This is the duty of the administration "Verwaltungspflicht", as confirmed in Article 43 of Hague Convention on Land Warfare.

Hereto appertain the proposals made by Sauckel for the evacuation of territories of retreat in France in the case of the invasion

DEFENSE

(1289-PS). These proposals were not materialized and can therefore not incriminate the defendant Sauckel.

This administrative duty can also demand to shift labor in order to avoid unemployment and famine. This, for example, took place when the industrial areas of the Soviet Union were occupied and there were no more working possibilities and securing of supply after the population was unemployed because of the scorched earth policy chosen by the Soviet Union, and supply failed to arrive because of transport difficulties.

These military and administrative points of view of the international law can invalidate a number of reproaches, but they do not answer the basic question, namely, whether the enlistment of workers is also permitted outside the Hague Convention of Land Warfare, especially for the purpose of work, i.e., to enable the state to carry on the war through increase of production and thus release its own workers for front duty. A purely military emergency could give no excuse for disregarding international law. The endangered victory must not be pursued by breaking the law because of necessity, because the law of warfare is supposed to correct just this conflict which is always connected with need.

International law decides to the contrary if a measure is concerned which has to be taken in order to save the existence of the state. This is concerned with a law of self-preservation which every state is entitled to because higher institutions are lacking which could protect it from destruction.

It has repeatedly been stressed by all concerned that in this war our existence was at stake. This became evident for Germany after the ominous battles at the eastern front in the winter 1941 and 1942. Whereas, up to that time, a general employment of foreign labor had not been necessary, now new equipment had to be produced immediately. The number of our own workers, who were drafted for front-service, had to be diminished by 2 million. The employing of unskilled women and young people could not immediately relieve the situation. By later development of the war, especially by the aerial warfare, the armament demands were increased to such an extent that, in spite of the increased employment of women and young people, the level could not be maintained. The means were exhausted.

The official figures the defendant Sauckel made public in his speech in Posen in February 1943 (1739-PS) proved that, already in 1939 at the beginning of the second world war, more than twice as many women were employed than at the end of the first world war, and that their number at the end of the second world war had increased by another 2 million, to more than 10 million. This number is higher than the entire number of male and female workers in the armament industry at the end of the first world war. In spite of that there was a shortage of labor. This has been confirmed by the witness Rohland of co-defendant Speer in Document Speer-56, according to which co-defendant Speer also declared that foreign labor was needed under all circumstances.

The difficult part of the problem did not consist in the question of female labor, where by introducing additional home labor one went up to the limit, but in the procuring of specialists and men for hard and hardest labor. Among the 10 million German women who were at work, there were also the wives of officers at the front and others from the equivalent strata of society.

The opinion that in England the women were conscribed to work in a higher degree than in Germany is wrong. In Germany the women had to work till 45 years of age and later till their 50th year, and they actually worked in factories and did not have fake jobs of a social kind. Even the youth of school age was conscribed to work from the 10th year of age, and from the 16th they were switched into the regular work organization or occupied in other services. Families were spread apart. Schools and universities were closed, their pupils worked in the armament industry and even wounded men could not continue their studies. A grim fight was on for every person capable to work. Speer's reserve of workers did not exist. It is shown among others in inclosure 2 of the Wartburg Document (RF-810) what efforts were made in this sector.

Another point of view, illustrating the necessity of deploying additional labor, is the fact that the powers in possession of colonies fetched labor from their colonies, e.g., France (RF-22), for instance, brought about 50,000 workers from North Africa and Indo-China, which were under the leadership and direction of commissioned and noncommissioned officers. As Germany, because it had been refused colonies and on account of the blockade, could not fall back on these reserves, it had to have the possibility, in its fight for the existence of the state, to take labor there, where it is found to be inactive in occupied territories.

This outlines the basis with regard to international law for judging the regulated utilization of labor as a war crime. One may, with regard to certain points, have a different opinion and specially in international law we find that a common interpretation of law will be formed but with difficulty. The interests of the members of the community of international law play an important part and are not always identical; legal principles are often not recognized, because a state does not want to put itself officially in contradiction with its former actions, or because it would like to keep its hands free for the future.

DEFENSE

As counsel for the defense, I am in a position to present an interpretation of law without such inhibitions. The significance of my statement for the defense, apart from the objective side, lies in the fact that defendant Sauckel subjectively was entitled to believe in the lawfulness of a regulated utilization of labor and that for him his behavior did not appear in contradiction with international law. This was helped by the conviction which defendant Sauckel was obliged to gain from the permissibility of the well-ordered utilization of labor by the attitude of the superior offices. When Sauckel entered upon his office, foreign workers had already been enlisted in single actions and he could take it for granted that the State had proceeded legally. None of the highest offices had raised legal objections toward Sauckel. These offices, especially the competent Foreign Office as well as the highest civil and military offices in the occupied territories abroad, accepted his orders as a foregone conclusion and questions of doubt on international law were not raised.

For the opinion of the defendant Sauckel, the attitude of the foreign offices concerned must have been especially decisive, as above all the consent of the French as well as the Belgians who came to Berlin personally for discussions. From that followed the good co-operation with the local authorities in the occupied territories, as it was before the enemy propaganda intervened.

Whether the knowledge of breaking a law is necessary for committing a crime against international law may be left undecided; but to establish guilt, the knowledge of realization of all the criminal facts is necessary in order to pass a punitive sentence. Therefore it is necessary to realize that the action was carried out in violation of international law. The subjective part of facts and therewith a criminal guilt of the defendant Sauckel cannot be proved in regard to carrying out the regulated utilization of labor. A punishment of the defendant Sauckel also could not take place for another legal reason, even though the regulated utilization of manpower would really be a violation of international law. According to the Hague Convention on Land Warfare no individual responsibility exists. The Hague Convention on Land Warfare differentiates two kinds of war crimes, those which can be committed by an individual, such as murder and ill-treatment, and those which can only be committed by a belligerent. The regulated utilization of manpower is a proceeding which can only be initiated by the state. While the individual action is being punished according to the penal code of the individual states, so is a special regulation formulated, for the offense of the belligerent in article 3 in the introductory agreement to the Hague Convention on Land Warfare. According to that there is only an obligation for compensation agreed upon. This agreement of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare is still valid today, for by agreement of the Allies alone, this cannot be annulled. The Charter which orders the immediate criminal responsibility of the state organs or its executors is void as far as it is contradictory to the Hague Convention on Land Warfare. I do not have to refer to it, that Germany as one of the parties to the agreement would have had to agree to the suspension of article 3; there are other reasons which prove that this stipulation is still in force. An alteration of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare in the sense of the Charter could have been accomplished by prescriptive law or general custom, due to the change of legal conceptions. The presupposition to this assumption would be, however, that the contracting powers would have relinquished their sovereignty; as only then the punishment of the state organs would be possible. However such a renunciation of the rights of sovereignty, as far as it is known to me, has not taken place to such an extent, which generally would permit such a punishment. With regard to that, I refer to the general statements made by Professor Jahrreiss before the Tribunal.

The Utilization of Manpower as a Crime Against Humanity

If the regulated utilization of manpower (geordneter Arbeits-einsatz) appears permissible according to international law, the question remains of the method of its execution, namely, the question on how long this utilization of manpower can still be regarded as regulated and when it will go beyond permissible limit.

What is understood by humanity, the Charter does not say. The meaning for that—as far as international law is concerned—can only be seen by the practice of the nations. If one wants to find the limits for the actions permissible under international law, we must draw into comparison the bombing of large cities and the use of the atom bomb, as well as deportations and evacuations, as they are still in progress today. These are all incidents which have occurred before the eyes of the world and were regarded as permissible by the executing countries.

One runs again into the conception of necessity and finds that it is being interpreted very flexible. This should well be kept in mind, if one examines the utilization of labor as to its violation against humanity. Its aim is not the stroke-like killing of hundreds of thousands, however it naturally carries hardships and certainly also mistakes, which arise unintentionally or are due to the failure of individuals. One must answer the question whether the wanted killing does not always weigh heavier than the temporary causing of other sufferings. It is to be added that the Charter does not prescribe a punishment for each violation against humanity, but only then, when the inhuman treatment has been committed in the execution or the connection of a crime, for which the Tribunal is competent.

DEFENSE

However the Tribunal is competent only for crimes against peace and war crimes. What concerns the crimes against peace, the defense can be permitted therefore to use the same inhuman treatment, while it is punishable when committed by the aggressor. Or it must be considered a war crime. This is not the case when it deals with the wounding of subjects of its own nationality, for these are not protected by laws of warfare. A prosecution of an act against humanity directed against them can only happen when connected at the same time with a crime against peace.

From an objective point of view, the deployment of labor has furthered the waging of the war which has been stated by the Prosecution as a war of aggression or as a war violating treaties. If this is established and if it is proved moreover that the deployment of labor has been carried out in an inhuman way, then the facts stated by the Charter are implied and a crime against humanity has been committed, without regard to the fact whether the deployment of labor was, as a matter of principle, allowed or not by the rules of war, as it has been committed in connection with a crime against peace. But a punishment can be inflicted only if the culprit knows subjectively that an unlawful war is being waged and if he furthers it by his action. As the defendant Sauckel denies any such knowledge, it must be proved.

The other possibility of committing the acts at issue lies here in that the inhuman act serves the carrying out of a war crime or is connected with it. Of the examples given by the Charter for violation of the rules of war, the following are, above all others, to be quoted in connection with deployment of labor: "Murder, ill treatments and deportation * * * committed on the civilian population." As shown by this enumeration, these war crimes which have been mentioned are not, however serious they may be, crimes against humanity by themselves. Something aggravating which is necessary to give the act the character of inhumanity must be added. As shown by the example of "extermination" and "enslavement" as an inhuman act, the acts in question must be objectively of a particular scale or particularly cruel. Subjectively however, an inhuman disposition of the culprit and the knowledge of the inhumanity of the act, i.e., the knowledge of the scale or the measure of the cruelty of its execution, must be added. How far these presuppositions apply to the defendant Sauckel must be investigated later on. A "regulated labor conscription" (geordneter Arbeitseinsatz) allowed by international law never can be a crime against humanity in itself, but its execution can be carried out in such a way that it involves killings and ill treatments which, for their part, may be war crimes.

Such an ill treatment could be based on the regulation issued by the highest authority involved, which herewith takes responsibility. It can, however, be committed by subordinate offices acting on their own authority without knowledge or intention of the superior authorities. In this case the head of the office which acts autonomously bears the responsibility. Finally, there may be question of a purely individual act committed against the regulations in force. For such an act the acting individual is responsible.

It follows that the defendant Sauckel is responsible, to begin with, for such general orders and instructions only which he has given, but not, on the contrary, for autonomous acts of supreme authorities in the occupied territories or of supreme Reich authorities as Chief of SS and Police, which were not under his jurisdiction.

The orders and directions of the defendant Sauckel have been submitted and they must prove whether the deployment of labor ordered by him was in fact a regulated one or was tantamount to an "ill-treatment" of the population.

The deployment of labor took place, apart from the call for volunteers, on the basis of a service duty "Dienstverpflichtung" which, as a matter of principle, was legally ordered, according to Hitler's orders, by the territorial commanders. The authority to issue such laws transcended the powers of the defendant Sauckel, nor could he ask for the issue of any such laws. But he has approved of them and has made them the basis of his work.

The contents of those laws were consistent with the fundamental ideas of the German laws concerning compulsory labor service. Those laws were enforced by coercion. The use of coercive measures is not necessary as long as the legal authority of the occupying power is acknowledged by the population; they become necessary only when this authority gets lost. In this sense, the defendant Sauckel has repeatedly asked for the maintenance of the so-called executive by enterprises for the sweeping of territories held by partisans and for the overpowering of the resistance movement (R-124).

No legal objections can be raised against the fact for this purpose he demanded the use of the thereto appropriated state funds. He is wrongly incriminated only by the words "SS and Police" which has been connected by the Prosecution with the conception of crime. Such an incrimination would only be justified if the criminal character of the police had been proved and if the defendant Sauckel at that time had had cognizance of the criminal activity then taking place.

DEFENSE

That force may be used in case of resistance against orders of the occupation force, cannot be disputed. The question is where are the limits of force and whether or not there are legal and illegal, admissible and inadmissible measures of force.

If fundamental laws are not valid when a state of siege is declared within a state, then this thought is all the more applicable to an occupying power during a state of war. Anyone who refuses to carry out the orders of the occupation power knowingly participates in the fight to which he is not entitled and he has to accept the consequences. Obedience is duty towards the occupying power and where patriotism and obedience are conflicting, the law decides against patriotism. The punishments which are dealt out are as such not subject to any limitations and the threats of punishment by an occupation power are, for the effect of intimidation, usually out of all proportion in severity. The question is whether there exists a limit from the humane standpoint, which prohibits going unnecessarily beyond the purpose of the punishment and which, as beyond measure, appears to be unnecessary. Orders like the burning of houses which had been issued by subordinate offices independently in the carrying out of utilization of labor must be examined from this point of view.

This question is not easy to answer, if one considers the special circumstances and realizes that the thing involved here is an open battle between the occupying power and the population, with official support from the enemy. In case of uprisings and general resistance one cannot reject the idea of the applicability of the military laws of the combat troops. Necessity alone can be the decisive factor in this case. International law has put only one limit to coercive measures in forbidding in article 50 of the Hague Convention on Land Warfare collective punishment of an entire population for the deeds of individuals for which the population could not be held responsible. Presupposition hereby is that co-responsibility has been established through actual events and has not been construed through orders.

Wherein collective punishment may consist has not been stated. As limits must be considered the aforementioned: They must be the bounds of humanity; but in war this is a vague conception; necessity and suitableness of the means to the end must always have the preference.

Next to the way of recruiting labor the conditions of work can represent an ill treatment which can be looked upon as a war crime. On principle there can be no question of ill treatment, in case the foreign workers are treated generally the same way as the workers of the home-country. A different treatment is only permissible in case special circumstances justify it. Whereas this putting on the same basis was in general carried out, the so-called eastern workers (Ostarbeiter) were put on worse conditions.

The most striking item here was the limitation of freedom. If this were arbitrary, it would be sufficient reason for declaring it an ill-treatment. But the reasons for this limitation of freedom were not arbitrary but were the need of security of the state. During wartime the stay of an enemy alien in the state area always represents a danger and it is just for that reason that at first the bringing in of foreign workers had been renounced. It was when the needs demanded the deployment of foreign workers, that the needs of security had to be satisfied simultaneously. What measures are to be taken depends upon the danger, which is different according to the attitude of the alien. Whereas the measures of policing were imperceptible with regard to the French, the eastern workers were, in the beginning, kept locked in camps.

The natural interest of the state goes in the direction of attaining security by winning the aliens over inwardly because their collaboration is desired. By depriving them of their freedom, this is not to be achieved. As long as the attitude of the alien can not be clearly recognized, especially if he be—as the citizen of the Soviet Union is—schooled propagandistically, more severe control may be necessary. But it should not develop into a permanent captivity, and should at most correspond to a sort of quarantine; to deprive people without guilt of their liberty for an extended period is not admissible, because it would correspond to a forbidden collective punishment. The mere assumption of danger is not sufficient for the decreasing of such limitations; there must be besides, acts which show that these foreign workers appear dangerous also under normal working conditions. The keeping in custody of eastern workers behind barbed wire and without permission to go out for walks, as ordered by Himmler, is to be regarded as an ill-treatment, if it is permanent.

The defendant Sauckel, guided by the feeling that in this matter the limits of the permissible had been overstepped, immediately took steps against this and, in a tough fight against Himmler, demanded and obtained the withdrawal of barbed wires and the prohibition to go out for walks, to be seen from the following decrees. (Doc. Sauckel 10, Exhibit USA 206.)

DEFENSE

Where, in spite of the set regulations, the old methods were applied by the police, Sauckel always intervened when he heard of such occurrences. This has been confirmed repeatedly by witnesses. (Exhibit Sauckel 10, Witness Goetz.)

Another controversial point was the earmarking by the badge "OST" which was maintained until the year 1944 and was then replaced by a country insignia. This earmarking of the Eastern workers which could move freely among the population was necessary for police security measures. This cannot be considered an illtreatment. The rejection of this sign by the Eastern workers was based in the first place on the defamation of this badge by propaganda, and the defendant Sauckel has always tried to change this insignia and to replace it by a nationality insignia as the other workers wore it voluntarily. He finally prevailed here also against Himmler (Doc. RF-810).

There must on principle also be equality between own and foreign workers with regard to the rules concerning maintenance of discipline.

With all belligerent states the war has raised the same problem as how to deal with such workers who do not live up to their duty of work, that means slackers, shirkers, and saboteurs. The practice of discharge, common in peacetime, is ineffective during war; but deserters from work cannot be tolerated today by any belligerent. In cases amounting to sabotage, police and penal measures had therefore to be taken, the most important of which was the short transfer to a labor camp; in special extreme cases imprisonment in a concentration camp was inflicted.

The Document 1063-PS, RF-345, shows the similarity in the execution of the regulations towards Germans and foreigners.

Such police measures which are caused by the disloyal conduct of the worker are justified measures. The Wartburg Document RF-810 shows in the report of the reporting official, Dr. Sturm, that such measures were carried out in a very moderate manner, and that only 0.1 to 0.2 per thousand were thus punished.

Hence it follows that issuing of regulations concerning the maintenance of discipline is in itself not yet an "illtreatment" which could be the basis for a crime against humanity. Such an illtreatment however can consist of excesses which occurred outside the competence of the defendant Sauckel. He can only be held responsible for those if the subjective facts of the case are fulfilled and if he knew of such excesses and approved of them, although he could have prevented them.

In summing up one can say that the "regulated utilization of labor" is permissible in international law and that restrictions imposed on workers within the limits of necessities must be permitted for reasons of state security. On the other hand excesses in carrying out the regulations have to be regarded as illtreatment and could mean crimes against humanity. For those he is responsible who has instigated them or who, within the sphere of his competence, did not prevent them.

Should the extensive scale of the charges brought against defendant Sauckel proceed from the above stated legal considerations, it is necessary first of all to single out those fields in which the evidence reveals him to be absolutely clear of any responsibility. In the first place, it is not proved that defendant Sauckel can be connected with the biological extermination of the population. His whole interest in fact has proved to have been just the opposite, since his purpose was to obtain people as laborers. With the migration measures and methods used in this respect, he had nothing to do.

Work in concentration camps was just as far removed from defendant Sauckel's responsibility. Himmler's Posen speech in October 1943 (Doc. 1919-PS) reveals that the SS had erected gigantic armament plants of their own. We know that Himmler covered his extensive labor requirements by despotic, arbitrary arrest of persons in occupied territories. In Germany itself, he had workers engaged in regular employment arrested on insignificant pretexts and brought into concentration camps, fraudulently vis-a-vis the regular labor offices. This is clearly shown in Document 1063-E-PS by a letter dated 17 December 1942 as well as letters dated 25 June 1943, in which alone a requirement of 35,000 prisoners is signified. Moreover, any correspondence exchanged with reference to concentration camp labor never passed through Sauckel's services. As an example, I refer to Document 1584-PS containing some correspondence with Himmler's Department. Defendant Sauckel's name is never mentioned with reference to a conscription of prisoners, and the witnesses have unanimously stated that defendant Sauckel had no connection with these matters. This is also confirmed by the statement of the Director of the Ministry Armament's Labor Office, Schmelter, who received the required prisoners direct from Himmler.

Another subject which must be cleared is the conscription of Jews for labor. This labor conscription is a part of labor conscription of concentration camp prisoners; it was Himmler's own personal secret kingdom. This is revealed for instance by Document R-91 in which Himmler's service orders the arrest of 45,000

DEFENSE

Jews in the "Jewish Sector" as concentration camp prisoners. By the production of Document L-61, the Prosecution has attempted to convict Sauckel of a share of guilt in this department. This document is a letter dated 26 November 1942 from Sauckel's service to the President of the National Labor Office, to the effect that, in agreement with the Chief of the Security Police and Security Department, Jewish workers remaining in the plants must be withdrawn and evacuated to Poland. As a matter of fact, this letter actually confirms that Sauckel had nothing to do with Jewish labor in the concentration camps, since Jewish workers were actually withdrawn from his department under the false pretense of evacuation. The measure is indeed solely concerned with the purely technical purpose of releasing the Jewish laborers and replacing them by Poles, an operation which could not have been carried out without the participation of Sauckel's service.

This letter is the sequel to a correspondence which can be traced back to the period prior to Sauckel's assumption of office, and Document L-156 is subsequently concerned with the same technical operation. The unimportant character of the matter is attested by the fact that these letters were not composed at defendant Sauckel's headquarters in the "Thueringenhaus" but in an auxiliary office in the Saarlandstrasse. Defendant Sauckel disclaims knowledge of these operations and points out that the letters do not bear his original signature but were, according to the routine of his service, made out in his name precisely because they were of minor importance. The fact that the letters begin with the routine business term of "in agreement with" and not "in accordance with" (the orders of) the Chief of Police SP and SD does not mean that they refer to a connivance but merely to orders received from the authoritative headquarters.

Next, reference has been made to "Extermination by Labor". But Documents 682-PS and 654-PS dated September 1942 unmistakably show that a secret maneuver of Himmler and Goebbels in cooperation with Reich Minister of Justice Thierack is here involved. Defendant Sauckel is not concerned.

Neither was the conscription of workers in the framework of the Organization Todt under Sauckel's responsibility. The accusations proceeding from Document UK-58 in this respect, bearing upon labor conscription methods in the Channel Islands, do not therefore concern him. The documents do not show that defendant Sauckel was aware of these proceedings or that he could have prevented them.

This disconnection between defendant Sauckel's labor jurisdiction and the OT (Organization Todt) is confirmed in Document

L-191, i.e., the report of the International Labor Office in Montreal.

A special department is the apprehension of labor forces by civil and military departments. This was to a certain extent run as "brutal conscription" and kept secret from defendant Sauckel because he opposed it and wished to prevent it by every means. To a certain extent, his objections were dismissed by higher authority. Under this category comes the labor conscription by the SS, Railway, Air Force Building Battalions, Speer's Transport and Traffic Units, Fortification and Engineering staffs, and other services. The exclusion of these contingencies from the scale of accusations must especially exculpate Sauckel, since in these cases Sauckel's orders were not authoritative. Document 204-PS illustrates in this respect the circumstances in which "Transport assistants" were procured in White Russia. Document 334-PS shows the same with regard to the execution of an independent drive for "Air Force Assistants", which can cast no guilt upon Sauckel.

The commitment of adolescents, which is known as "Heuaktion" under Document 031-PS of 14 June 1944 as a point of the charge, lies outside of Sauckel's jurisdiction, as it is shown specifically by this document. The IXth Army, together with the East Ministry, were the originators.

A letter of the co-defendant Rosenberg to Reich Minister Lammers of 20 July 1944 (Doc. 345-PS) refers falsely to the "Consent" of the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment; it states, however, that the defendant Sauckel was not connected with an SS-Helper Action and that he refused cooperation in this affair. According to this, as stated by Document 1137-PS of 19 October 1944, an individual office in the Rosenberg Ministry takes care of the seizure youth and accomplishes the task with its own personnel. Excluding the defendant Sauckel's agency, labor is supplied directly here to the armament industry.

Circumventing defendant Sauckel's agency, measures also took place which Hitler induced directly by orders to the local offices of the Wehrmacht and of the Civil Administration; it was so, for the labor commitment ordered in the occupied territories for the fortification of the Crimea; this is shown by Document UK-68.

The seizure of labor in Holland, which was carried out by the Wehrmacht under protest of the labor service offices, is another one of these cases; this is shown in Document 3003-PS, in Lt. Haupt's report and the defendant Seyss-Inquart has confirmed it.

An important subject, which is beyond the defendant Sauckel's responsibility, refers to all the actions executed as punitive measures against partisans and resistance groups. These are independent measures of the police; I already spoke about their judicial evaluation. Whether they were admissible and could be approved, depends on the circumstances. For example, measures against the resistance movement in France as described in Document UK-78 (French Government Report) are excluded here. Therefore, a direct responsibility of defendant Sauckel ceases to exist.

DEFENSE

Therefore, the very incriminating events which are enumerated in count III, paragraph VIII, of the indictment under "deportation", the destinations of which were the concentration camps, are not within the responsibility of the defendant Sauckel.

Furthermore, the "deportations" for political and racial reasons which also end under VIII of the indictment as the deportation of Frenchmen into concentration camps are also not within the responsibility of the defendant Sauckel. Furthermore, the resettlements of Slovenes and Yugoslavs described under B (2) also must be excluded.

According to the indictment, under VIII, H 2, only a part of the additionally mentioned approximate 5 million Soviet citizens are mentioned as having been seized by labor commitment, the others were removed by other means to which the regulations of the defendant Sauckel did not apply. This separation is not of importance on account of the number of people, but because the presumed bad conditions could have taken place just in that sector, since greater danger of improper treatment existed there.

The prisoners of war also are exempted from the field of responsibility of the defendant Sauckel. These labor forces did not have to be conscripted, but were only directed. This was done by means of special labor offices, which were separated from the other procedure with the prisoner camps and collaborated exclusively with the armed forces. The task consisted only of using the prisoners of war there, where they were needed.

The defendant Sauckel could only request the transfer of the prisoners of war. Such a possibility is referred to by the Prosecution Document 1296-PS of 27 July 1943, which refers under III to the increase in the use of prisoners of war in collaboration with the Army High Command.

The assignment of prisoners of war to plants took place only under the supervision of the Wehrmacht; this latter controlled compliance with the Geneva Convention. Sauckel is not in any way connected with the death of hundreds of thousands of prisoners of war of the Soviet Union in 1941 of whom Himmler speaks in his Posen speech (1919-PS), and for whose replacement workers had to be brought in.

If, in spite of this, in Document USSR-415, i.e., the official Soviet report about the Lamsdorf Camp, the defendant Sauckel is brought into connection with the claimed ill-treatment of prisoners, then this is done only on the basis of the claim that the number of personnel in the camp was reported to him in a purely business-like manner. The charge cannot be maintained. The document at that does not contain a sufficient listing of time after the year 1941.

The defendant Sauckel, although he personally was not responsible, has intervened in excess of his official duties for the care of the prisoners of war, because he was interested in their willingness to work. He has issued general decrees. In this way Document Sauckel 36 shows that he demands sufficient subsistence, and Document 39, that he demands the same working hours as for German workers; he also points out here the prohibition of disciplinary punishment by the plants.

A further separation of the accusations raised must be made after the time of the incidents. The defendant Sauckel took over his office only on 21 March 1942. His measures, therefore, could have an effect only some time later. How conditions were previous to that can be seen from some documents from the year 1941. In Document 1206-PS, subsistence through horse and cat meat is suggested by leading authorities, and in Document USSR-177 the production of bread of a very inferior quality is suggested. Just a short time before the defendant Sauckel's taking office, Hitler in a sharp decree orders the confinement of the workers behind barbed wire. It can be said that a low point in the treatment of the foreign workers who at that time were in the Reich had been reached. The idea which one has of the simplicity and the efficiency of the Russians is tragic.

With the taking over of office of the defendant Sauckel, a fundamental change has taken place here, which led to a constantly increasing improvement of the situation. The credit for having established a change here falls, according to the following documents, solely to the defendant Sauckel. This is shown in particular by Document EC-318, which represents a record of 15 April 1942 about the first meeting of the defendant Sauckel with Reich Minister Seldte and his specialist staff on the occasion of his taking office. It has been recorded there that it was the defendant Sauckel who made the taking over of his office dependent on the condition that the subsistence of the foreigners must be the same as for the Germans and that the fulfillment of his demand was assured him by Hitler, Goering, the Food Minister Daree (sic) and his Secretary of State, Backe. It furthermore has been recorded there that the defendant Sauckel demanded the removal of the barbed wire and succeeded in this, and finally that he immediately took steps against the low wages of the Eastern workers.

DEFENSE

The execution of his fundamental demands was then also immediately employed by the defendant Sauckel and followed through with tenacity against the resistance of all authorities. The Program of the labor commitment of 20 April 1942 (Doc. 016-PS) accordingly takes immediate steps against cruelties and chicaneries and demands that foreign workers be humanely treated; the hope is even expressed that a propaganda effect must surely be achieved by the way in which the labor commitment was carried out. This thought was frequently reiterated later. An economical commitment of workers was required in order to counteract the waste which was occurring on the part of influential agencies.

A year later, on 20 April 1943, the defendant Sauckel again addressed a declaration of program to all persons concerned in labor commitment. This is the repeatedly mentioned "Manifesto of Labor Commitment", Sauckel Document No. 84, which was issued as a warning and a call to battle addressed to all agencies which opposed the serious responsibility of the defendant Sauckel. Goebbels opposed it under the pretences that the title was too assuming and the propaganda feature of the document essentially too weak. Other agencies just disregarded the copies sent to them and did not forward them, whereupon copies were sent directly to the industries concerned. How this message was handled by the reluctant agencies is shown by its description "notorious manifesto" which was unanimously adopted for it in a session of the Central Planning Board on 1 March 1944 (Doc. R-124).

Defendant Sauckel was reproached for having been "too good." I refer to a remark made by General Milch who was interrogated before the Tribunal, in which he refers to the Central Planning Board and criticizes the ostensibly too lenient treatment of loafers and declares that if anything was undertaken against them, agencies were immediately to be found in Germany which would protect the "poor man" and would intercede for the human rights of others. (Doc. R-124).

The attitude of defendant Sauckel was generally known and has been confirmed by various documents; thus agencies addressed him because of complaints and deficiencies, not in order to make the defendant Sauckel responsible for them but to solicit his help, because everybody knew how seriously and eagerly he advocated improvements.

Thus Document 084-PS that is Report of Dr. Gutkelch of the Central Agency for Eastern People of the Rosenberg Ministry, dated 30 September 1942, emphasizes in various parts the influence of defendant Sauckel and recommends getting into closer touch with him.

Co-defendant Rosenberg also is pointing at Sauckel's strenuous efforts in Document 194-PS, i.e., letter of 14 December 1942 to Koch, Reich Commissioner for the Ukraine.

Co-defendant Frank likewise on 21 November 1943 asked defendant Sauckel (Doc. 908-PS) for a basic change of the legal position of Poles inside the Reich.

To what extent do real events correspond with that which has been stated?

The first question to be dealt with is seizure, which is practically identical with deportation. It is connected with the examination of the treatment of workers which is designated by the word "slave labor."

The evidence has refuted the error, according to which defendant Sauckel on his own responsibility carried out the commitment and seizure of foreign workers through his own organization. It has been established that the supreme agencies of the occupied territories executed the laws regarding compulsory work, which they had received on Hitler's orders. All these agencies had their own administrative system and guarded their departments against the intrusion of others.

A communication of the Rosenberg Ministry of the East to Koch the Reich Commissioner for the Ukraine, dated 14 December 1942 (Doc. 194-PS), in which co-defendant Rosenberg particularly refers to the prevailing right of sovereignty questions of Labor commitment proves that this administrative system had not broken through. Those supreme agencies had their own labor offices, which were organized in detail from the Ministry down to the local office. (Document 3012-PS, Ordinance of the Supreme Command of the Army dealing with compulsory work in operational sector East of 6 February 1943; Document RF-15, Ordinance of 6 October 1942.)

Only with these agencies could defendant Sauckel place requests for the number of workers he was ordered to send to Germany and only with them give departmental instructions. These were his limitations and he never went beyond them. He took note of the right of execution, as opposed to the right of instruction. For this task a deputy was appointed for each territory, who in accordance with the ordinance of 30 September 1942 (USA 510) was directly subordinate to defendant Sauckel but did not belong to his agency, as he belonged to the territorial agencies. This was expressly confirmed by the witness Bail, who had been appointed by co-defendant Rosenberg, expressly for the most important deputy in the East, the Reich Councillor Peukert, who belonged to the Staff of the Ministry of the Ministry East.

DEFENSE

This Reich Councillor Peukert was at the same time consultant for the Economic Staff East of the rear Army Territory, which was close to the field of the civil administration; in addition to his duties he acted as deputy of the defendant Sauckel in the Personnel Union (Personal Union). This is proved by Document 3012-PS, i.e., a note on this document dealing with a conversation of 10 March 1943 concerning labor commitment, in which the position of Peukert is noted in the membership list. By this "Personal-Union", created in the interest of the territorial authorities, all unauthorized interference of defendant Sauckel was made impossible. When co-defendant Rosenberg complained about the methods of labor mobilization in the East as per Document 018-PS, that is in the letter to defendant Sauckel dated 21 December 1942, this is to be considered as the complaint of a Minister who does not consider himself in a position to be successful against his subordinate, and thus addresses the presumable source of the difficulties, which had been made for him.

It is true that these difficulties could be removed immediately when defendant Sauckel would desist from execution of his order. But execution was just his job, which according to the decree of appointment had to be executed under all circumstances, especially against just such opposition as occurred here on the part of co-defendant Rosenberg.

Defendant Sauckel had to fight against opposition arising from weakness and from departmental egotism, and had to see to it that local agencies would not fail to supply the required manpower due to need for rest, or that other offices would hold it back from selfish interests. "With all means" and "ruthless" are recurring expressions which are employed in the fight against these aspects.

General Falkenhausen, the Military Commander in Belgium and Northern France, during his hearing, mistakenly declared in Document RF-15 that defendant Sauckel forced him to execute the commitment of labor and accomplished it through his own organization. But he had to admit that this opinion was incorrect when the order signed by him about the introduction of compulsory labor service was put before him. This presentation is confirmed by the statements of the witnesses Timm and Stothfang.

In France seizure was made by the French administration. The German office above it was not the office of defendant Sauckel but of the Military Commander in France, where Sauckel had only a deputy. The negotiations which defendant Sauckel conducted in Paris and which were the subject of the evidence lie outside of this activity; they are negotiations of diplomatic nature between the German and French Governments in which Sauckel participated. They were held in the German Embassy. Circumstances in the other spheres were accordingly.

Also the Recruiting Commissions which corresponded to the labor commitment staffs in the rear army districts and in operational districts were by no means offices of the defendant Sauckel, as co-defendant Rosenberg assumes. These recruiting commissions stood nearer to defendant Sauckel only because they were composed of experts who came from the German labor offices, which belonged to Sauckel's Department. They received specialized directives only through their superior office in order to guarantee a uniform handling of all recruiting regulations. Regulation No. 4 in Sauckel Document No. 15 is authoritative on this point.

This stipulation already issued on 7 May 1942 namely before the nomination of the deputies on 30 September 1942 provides for the sole responsibility of the military and civil authorities of the occupied territories. The deputies mentioned there to whom were assigned the same functions are the deputies at the German missions in friendly foreign countries.

This was misunderstood by the prosecution and therefore wrong conclusions were arrived at to the disadvantage of the defendant Sauckel about the responsibility for recruiting and transport. Also the interpretation of the provision that "all technical and administrative procedures of the Labor Commitment were exclusively within the competence and responsibility" of defendant Sauckel is incorrect for the occupied territory.

This stipulation refers solely to the functions in the Reich and lays the basis for the competence of the General Plenipotentiary for labor commitment of the district labor offices and labor offices; this comes forth from Document 016-PS (last paragraph). The defendant Sauckel, therefore, is not directly responsible for the seizure. Indirectly, however, responsibility can be charged to him in that he was aware of these bad conditions and knew that they could not be stopped, but nevertheless demanded more workers.

To this the following must be said: In the defendant Rosenberg's letter of 21 December 1942 (Doc. 018-PS) the defendant Sauckel learned for the first time of the recruiting methods which were designated as mass deportation. At the meeting which followed this in the beginning of January 1943 the defendant Rosenberg declared that he was opposed to this and that he would not tolerate such procedures. This is also confirmed by his previous letter of 14 December 1942 to Koch, Reich Commissioner for the Ukraine (Doc. 194-PS), in which he clearly calls the latter's attention to his obligations to proceed legally.

DEFENSE

Koch's memorandum of 16 March (Doc. Ro-13), of which the defendant Sauckel did not learn until here at the trial, gives an explanation, according to which these incidents are said to be exaggerated individual cases, the justification of which is based on the need for measures to be carried out for the restoration of the authority of the occupation officials. It is expressly declared in this that the recruitment of workers is to proceed with legal means and that steps will be taken in the event of arbitrary measures. (Doc. R 13, page 11 and 120.)

It did not seem out of the question that it might have been a matter of propagandistic exaggerations and activities to which Koch particularly refers. In war such a possibility is likely, and the propagandistic style of the Molotov report (Doc. USSR-151) only emphasizes this.

The defendant Sauckel was also supported in this idea as the result of a "manhunt" investigation which was reported to him at Minsk by Field Marshal General Kluge; it had led to the explanation that it had involved the assembling of workers employed by a labor firm at the time of the retreat.

The Katyn case shows how difficult it is to clarify such events according to the truth when they are made use of propagandistically as combat measures.

As the witnesses from the defendant Sauckel's office have confirmed, no other incidents involving these abuses have become known. The cases which were reported are notoriously in part repetitions of the same happenings which were reported from different sides.

All these reports, however, do not show an endeavor to approve such things, but are a sort of house alarm for the purpose of remedying and improving them.

Can one believe defendant Sauckel when he declares that he did not know about the conditions alleged by the Prosecution?

What reached him through official channels cannot be considered as proof of cognizance, and the witnesses confirm that the so-called methods were unknown.

But we have here documents of the authorities of the occupied countries, from which it appears that the Reich Commissioner in the Ukraine ordered the burning down of houses as a measure of combat resistance against the administration, and there are orders foreseeing such measures. Reports made to the Ministry of the East regarding such events do not lead to penal prosecution, but to the suspension of the procedure, e.g., the Raab case (Doc. 254-PS) and the Mueller case (Doc. 290-PS).

In contradiction to this uncertainty the following must be stated: The measures employed were not accepted by the highest instances, but were secretly made use of by the lower instances. From the preliminary proceedings of the Raab and Mueller cases, it definitely appears that the existing regulations were unknown at the Ministry.

Defendant Sauckel has travelled through the Ukraine, but he was not told just that which might have gotten the local offices into trouble. The views of defendant Sauckel were known, and on the other hand there existed a violent quarrel between the offices of the Reich Commissioner Koch and the Reich Ministry Rosenberg. When the documents of both offices which have been submitted are read it can be seen from the file notes that in this battle both sides had collected arguments and that nobody wished to commit himself. Since the defendant Sauckel himself had no direct authority, it is understandable that the actual conditions remained unknown to him.

Another point of view has to be considered. Various documents mention that a certain pressure has to be applied in the procurement of workers, since the workers had to be obtained "under all circumstances". Does this give a free hand for all methods? One must see what was actually done in pursuance to these statements.

The OKH in one case then ordered the increased conscription of workers, and permitted collective seizures, but prohibited collective punishments in connection with this. See Document 3012-PS with telephone message of the Economy Staff East to General Staff of 11 March 1943. The best picture is shown here in the same Document 3012-PS by a remark in the files concerning a discussion of 10 March 1943. Here General Nagel requests clear guiding principles and State Councillor Peuckert wants "reasonable" recruitment methods established by the OKH as the authorized agency. Document 2280-PS is also relevant here, which is the only personal statement of the defendant Sauckel concerning this question and which was made in Riga on 3 May 1943. There he states that only "all permissible means" are allowed. Document 3010-PS is also to be quoted, Economy Inspection South, in which on 17 August 1943 the use of "all suitable means" is permitted.

Orders are issued which contain severe measures against non-compliance with the duty of compulsory labor deprivation of food and clothing cards. Imprisonment of relatives is threatened and the taking of hostages held out as a prospect. How about the admissibility of such measures?

DEFENSE

The deprivation of food cards has today become a generally used means of coercion which is based on the rationing system, and which has its cause in the conditions of time. It can be handled easily and does not require any special executive force; on the other hand, it is extremely effective.

Concerning the imprisonment of relatives severe inroads into individual responsibility can be recorded even today. The Hague Convention of Land Warfare protects only against the collective punishment of the population, but it does not protect the members of the family who may be considered as sharing the responsibility in the case of a refusal to work. The French law of 11 June 1943 which was presented as Document RF-80 also provides for such responsibility only in the case of deliberate cooperation.

There finally remains the "shooting of a prefect" which the defendant Sauckel demanded. Apart from the fact that this statement as such is irrelevant from the point of view of criminal law, because it was not actually carried out, its legal meaning is merely a demand to apply the existing French law. This law has been submitted by the Prosecution as Document RF-25; decree of 31 January 1943 by the military commander in France, article 2 of which provides for the death penalty.

Also misunderstood by the Prosecution is a statement uttered by the defendant Sauckel, according to which one must handcuff the workers in a polite way. (Doc. RF-816, discussion by Sauckel in Paris of 27 August 1943.) But as appears from the context, what is in question here is only a comparison of the clumsy appearance of the police with the obliging manner of the French, without handcuffing being especially praised as a method of seizure; Prussian, clean, correct on the one hand but at the same time obliging and polite on the other hand, that is how one should work.

I refer again to the case of the proposal for "shanghaiing" in Document R-124, page 1770, which is known to the Tribunal from the proceedings. The statement which the defendant Sauckel has made gives an understandable explanation; according to it, from a legal point it was a question of a preliminary recruitment which was supposed to make the workers inclined to agree to the real obligation later on in the official recruitment offices.

These various incidents, shooting of a prefect, handcuffing, and shanghaiing may be but one can reach a complete understanding of the subjective side only if one considers why these statements were made, and from what conditions they originated. The background of all these statements is the struggle against resistance and sabotage which in France took stronger and stronger forms. Therefore, it is not a question of remarks of brutality and cynicism, but statements which were intended to counteract the indecision of the authorities.

Another thought which has to be added here is whether the defendant Sauckel had not exhausted the manpower of the country by his measures to such an extent that more workers could only be obtained by inhuman methods and that the defendant Sauckel must have known this.

The important thing here is the figure of the "quotas". It has been established that they were high, but it has also been established that they were not laid down arbitrarily, but only after a careful study by the statistical department. Only a small percentage of the population was actually seized, and it was not the impossibility of performance that was decisive, but rather the will to resist.

In the occupied territories of the East there were large reserves of manpower, available especially among grown-up young people who were not appropriately utilized. The German troops, their ranks seriously thinned, saw the richly populated villages during their retreat, and felt the same forces shortly afterwards as a reinforcement to the enemy's fighting power.

In France there were likewise many forces which placed themselves under the protection of the Maquis or the protected plants. This is not only confirmed by French government report (RF-22), but it also appears from a remark which Kehrl, as witness for the co-defendant Speer, made in the Central Planning on 1 March 1944 (Doc. R-124, page 66). There this witness states that workers are available to an extensive degree in France. Especially conclusive here is also Document 1764-PS (page 6), i.e., the report of Ambassador Hemmen of 15 February 1944 which deals with the "Reconstruction Program" of Marshal Petain, and which refers to the population as untouched by the war which increased by 300,000 young men every year.

If the number of the seized workers is of importance in this connection, it must be compared with the total population figures, and, on the other hand, it must be taken into consideration that Germany did not demand anything what she did not ask of herself to an even higher degree.

The defendant Sauckel had to be convinced not that people were unable to perform, but that they did not want to perform. In order to influence this desire, the propaganda struggle and the competition of threats of punishment was created by both parties, and this first brought the population of the occupied territories into a state of moral conflict, which became the undoing of many.

The defendant Sauckel could with good reason refer to the consequences of the counter propaganda and the deteriorated war situation as cause for the necessity to use coercion; he could, however, on the basis of the evidence to which he had excess, not fail to be convinced that the exhaustion of the countries was so great that nothing more could be extracted from them without the use of inhuman methods.

DEFENSE

The defendant Sauckel believed he could obtain his object not by using violence but by creating special working conditions. As example, I refer to the promise which Sauckel himself gave on 3 May 1943 in Riga (Doc. 2228-PS).

Apart from this there is still another field of labor procurement which must be put in a different category. This is the liberation of prisoners of war in order to make labor forces available for Germany by "releve" or "transformation".

The French governmental report RF-22 declares both methods of recruiting labor forces as inadmissible. It is pointed out in the report that the exchange on the basis of "releve" is equal to the enslavement of about triple the number of French workers. Against this it must be stated that the replacement workers came at times only for half a year for voluntary work and in succession. After a year and a half all the workers were free; the prisoner was free immediately.

Coercion for the execution of the "releve" did not exist. The offer of release is not legally assailable. Captivity can be terminated any time. Release can also be made subject to a condition. The French report overdoes the moral indignation by quoting a phrase of the President of the News Agency of the United States; this phrase speaks of the "abominable choice" of either to work for the hereditary enemy or to rob a son of his country of the possibility of release from captivity.

To refute this, I refer to the healthy sentiment according to which in the older Russian literature such a change was praised as a patriotic and magnanimous deed on the occasion of the Northern War. Neither the King of Sweden nor Peter the Great have therefore considered the exchange as replacement by a substitute slave.

The "Erleichterte Statut" ("Transformation") is contained in Document Sauckel 101. It is the release of a Frenchman from captivity against the acceptance of other work, under the condition that a further French worker would come to Germany according to the "releve" regulations. No prisoner of war was forced to change his legal position, but whole camps volunteered for it. If a prisoner made use of the possibility offered, he forfeited thereby the juridical special labor protection of the Geneva Convention; but this was done in agreement with his government. This does not constitute a violation of international law.

The furlough home connected with the change-over was ruined by the fact that the people who were granted those furloughs did not return, already after the first convoys. The report RF-22 itself states on page 69, that of the 8,000 people of one leave convoy, 2,000 did not return. The report states that the "unfortunate people" were placed before the alternative, "either you return, or your brothers must die". This consideration, however, did not impress them. Their promise could also not prevent them from immediately joining the Maquis. The abolition of these furloughs home does not therefore constitute an arbitrary act in slave labor. The reading of the French report can only increase this impression.

It follows therefore that in this special field also, no seizure of workers which violates the laws of war or which were carried out in an inhuman manner has been effected by the defendant Sauckel.

I now come to the question, treatment of the workers. In order to facilitate a proper judgment, a separation of the fields of responsibility is also made here. The works manager was responsible for the general labor conditions in the works. The general conditions of life outside the works was the competence of the German Labor Front. These spheres of responsibility become conspicuous through the fact that two special representatives for them are mentioned in the indictment, namely Krupp and Dr. Ley.

The defendant Sauckel can be held responsible for the incidents in these spheres only insofar as they are due to his decrees, or as, contrary to his duty, he did not intervene by direct supervision. The defendant Sauckel was directly responsible for the wages. Already on entering office, he found a schedule of wages which he could not alter on his own responsibility; to do this he had to apply for the authorization of his superior office (i.e., the Four Year Plan) and for the consent of the competent Reich Minister. The legal regulations summed up in Chapter "Wages question" of my Document Book II show that the basic decrees are not issued by the defendant Sauckel, but by the Cabinet Council for the Defense of the Reich (see Doc. Sauckel 17, 50, and 58) or by the Reich Minister of Economics (Doc. 51) and the Reich Minister of Finance (Doc. Sauckel 52). The defendant Sauckel could schedule wages and fix piece wages only within this framework fixed for him, in so doing he had to consider the interests of the Ministries in question. So far as it was really possible for the defendant Sauckel to do so, he made amelioration possible; thus a series of his decrees show that he granted favors such as premiums, compensatory payments, and similar favors (compare Doc. Sauckel 54 and 58a).

DEFENSE

The defendant Sauckel's activity, however, aims on the whole at increasing wages by influencing the competent authorities. This is shown in Document 021-PS of 2 April 1943. Therein we find as appendix a treatise with statistical material to the proposition of a basic improvement of wages for Eastern workers. It thus results from a study of the wage sheets from different periods, that the average wages of Eastern workers have been raised several times during defendant Sauckel's term of office.

It was for the defendant Sauckel to regulate the working hours, but within the framework of the superior competence of the Reich Minister of Labor Seldte. This is shown by Document Sauckel 67, where Seldte regulates the working hours for Eastern workers in paragraph 3 of the decree of 25 January 1944. The working hours were on principle the same as for the German workers, corresponding to the tempo of the work in the factories. This is also admitted by the French government report UK-78-3; the cases enumerated there on page 580 of excessive working hours are contrary to the orders of the defendant Sauckel. Since they do not contain any dates of years, it cannot be recognized, if they deal only with temporary measures or with permanent conditions. The same lack of clarity exists in the French report RF-22, page 101; there the minimum working time has been listed as 72 hours, which was increased to 100 hours. This could deal with the work of concentration-camp inmates, which has been left abstruse.

The settlement of the working hours was then changed by Goebbels, who on the basis of his plenipotentiary powers for the waging of total war introduced the 10-hour day for Germans and foreigners, although in practice this could not have been carried out generally. An unreasonably high working time cannot be maintained and leads to setbacks.

Special attention has been paid by the Prosecution to the regulation of the working hours of female domestic workers from the East, of whom in the place of the 400,000-500,000 girls originally demanded by Hitler, only 13,000 came to Germany. The Prosecution has presented the memorandum for the employment of these female domestic workers as Document USSR-383. There it is stated under 9, that a demand for time-off does not exist. The purpose of the regulation was to leave the settlement of the time-off to the household according to its requirements. Another idea of the regulation is also hardly imaginable, because after all it was intended to accept these female domestic workers in particular into the families, and to give them the opportunity to remain in Germany. They had been selected as girls who were considered particularly dependable, who had reported voluntarily for domestic work. In accordance to the general practice the order was amended by a subsequent decree (Doc. Sauckel 26) simultaneously with the rescinding of all remaining limitations.

The regulation of the working-hours for children took place within the field of German Labor Security Legislation; in this case it deals with children who, contrary to the decrees of the defendant Sauckel, had come to Germany with their parents in an unregulated manner. Their work can deal with agricultural occupations only, as it is also practiced for German children. In this respect it is pointed out that during the war the school-children in Germany from their 10th year upward could be utilized for work, according to the decree of the Reich Youth Leader of 11 April 1942 (Doc. Sauckel 67a).

A summarizing discussion by Dr. Blumensaat in the complete Document Sauckel 89 gives the best information about the whole complex of wages and working hours, as it was finally regulated by law.

This immediate responsibility alone, however, cannot serve the defendant Sauckel as an excuse, if he knew and tolerated those things which, according to the Prosecution's assertion, branded the transportation and the life in the camps and factories. It is his duty to superintend, even there where he is not directly responsible. Such a sphere of activity, which consisted in the accommodation and feeding of the workers, was the responsibility of the works.

As regards the fitting up of the camps for foreigners, the same regulations as for the camps for German workers were applied, by virtue of decrees of the competent Reich Minister of Labor Seldte (Doc. Sauckel 42, 43, and 44). It is indisputable that the accommodation suffered from war exigencies, in particular from the effects of air warfare; the abuses, however, were eliminated as far as possible. The condition of the foreign workers was not different here from that of the German civil population. The food supply suffered from blockade and want of communications. The established rations, contrary to the notorious statements on the feeding of the Russians laid down according to the schedule of 24 November 1941 in Document USSR-177, amounted to 2540 calories for the Soviet prisoners of war. A further schedule has been submitted with the Affidavit of the witness Hahn as Exhibit Sauckel No. 11. According to this the ration in the Krupp works amounted to 2,156 calories for the Eastern normal worker, 2,615 calories for the heavy workers, and supervision insured their careful distribution.

DEFENSE

The Reich Food Ministry was responsible for the supply of food. Strong accusations have been brought in by the Prosecution with regard to both points. These, however, are only possible when the existing regulations have not been observed. It is quite likely that mistakes have been made in this large sphere of activity in the course of years, but the general picture is not only composed of mistakes, whereon a judgment cannot be based. The actual conditions have not been clarified in this procedure to the extent that one could say the abuses were so general and obvious that the defendant Sauckel must and did know them.

Contrary of the uncertain statements of the witness Dr. Jaeger is the affidavit of the witness Hahn (Exhibit 11) which refutes them to a large extent. The affidavits of the witnesses Dr. Scharrmann (Exhibit Sauckel 17) and Dr. Voss (Exhibit Sauckel 18) confirm that no serious abuses existed in their spheres of activity.

In addition to the obligation of the Works Managers, the German Labor Front had to care for the foreign workers (Doc. Sauckel 15). Its field of activity was among other things, transportation and the supervision of medical care, as well as general care. The extensive activity which this very large organization developed has not been described in these proceedings. The basic principles of the German Labor Front can be seen from Document Sauckel 27, i.e. regulations of the German Labor Front regarding the status of foreign workers in the plants. The aim is emphasized as follows: Maintenance of the willingness to work by observing conditions of contracts, absolutely fair treatment, and comprehensive care and control.

The German Labor Front was also responsible for the carrying out of the transportation according to Regulation 4 (Doc. Sauckel 15). Sauckel's instructions are contained therein. This task includes transportation to their place of work. The witnesses Timm and Stothfang and Hildebrandt have testified about this field of activity and not reported anything about bad conditions. The descriptions in the Molotov-Report (USSR-51) cannot refer to transportation, which was carried out under coordinated direction, but only to so-called "wild" convoys. The same applies to convoys, the destination of which according to the indictment were the concentration camps. The great extent to which the defendant Sauckel has occupied himself from the very beginning with transportation conditions is particularly shown by Document 2241-PS submitted by the Prosecution; it contains a decree where conscientious directives for the prevention of the utilization of unsuitable trains are given. Mistakes have occurred, especially the incident mentioned in Document 054-PS of the return transport of workers; these had been brought into the Reich before Sauckel's time in violation of his basic principles. This was a matter of a single incident, and the necessary orders were issued immediately. The return journey of sick persons in conditions which did not permit them to travel in convoys was prohibited, and Bad Frankenhausen was placed at their disposal. This was followed by the order regarding the accompanying of such transports by male and female assistants of the Red Cross (Doc. Sauckel 99).

The carefully and thoroughly organized apparatus of medical care, which worked under the collaboration of the Association of Panel Doctors, has not failed, in spite of the greatest difficulties, rather the great result has been established that no epidemics and serious diseases broke out. The cases presented by the Prosecution from individual camps of the 60 camps of the Krupp firm can only have arisen from the unusual chain of circumstances. They cannot prove generally bad conditions, of which these conditions could be typical. Another Document, RF-91, has also been presented, i.e., the medical report of Dr. Fevier of the French Delegation of the German Labor Front, which was composed after the beginning of the invasion on 15 June 1944. Besides faults which it is intended to correct, the report also points out good things; it speaks with particular acknowledgment of leaders of youth camps, of the systematic X-ray examinations, and of the support given by the district administrations, and similar things. A real overall picture of conditions could only be obtained by the study of the medical reports of the Health Offices of the German Labor Front existing everywhere.

For the defense of the defendant Sauckel, the circumstance is only of importance here in that a distant onlooker like himself could not have a clear picture of bad conditions. The sanctioning of such bad conditions would have stood in gross contrast to the actions and declarations of Sauckel. The defendant Sauckel did not acquiesce if a Gauleiter perhaps said, "if somebody has to freeze, then first of all the Russians"; he intervened here, and he stood out against it publicly in his official Handbook of the Commitment of Labor (Doc. Sauckel 19).

The defendant Sauckel also tried to improve the food outside of his competence; this has been confirmed by several witnesses, among others the witness Goetz (Exhibit Sauckel 10); it is also shown by the record of the Central Planning Board (Doc. R-124, p. 1783). The defendant Sauckel did not let matters go on anyhow, but he established his own personal staff, whose members traveled around the camps and corrected bad conditions on the spot. He also attempted to obtain clothing, and let factories work to a large extent for supplying the Eastern workers.

DEFENSE

All witnesses who have been heard regarding this problem have again and again unanimously confirmed the benevolent basic attitude of the defendant Sauckel. I refer to the announcements and speeches of the defendant Sauckel, which always advocate good treatment. I do not wish to enumerate the documents in detail, and only emphasize the "Manifesto of the Commitment of Labor", Document Sauckel 84, in which he refers to his binding basic principles, and demands that these be recalled constantly and with emphasis. I also refer to the speeches to the Presidents of the District Employment Offices (Gauarbeitsaemter) of 24 August 1943 (Doc. Sauckel 86) and of 17 January 1944 (Doc. Sauckel 88).

The defendant Sauckel finally obtained, that even Himmler, Goebbels and Bormann acknowledged his ideas as correct. This is shown by Document 205-PS of 5 May 1943. This is a memorandum regarding the general basic principles for the treatment of foreign workers. There the basic principles of a regulated commitment of labor are accepted.

How do the statements of the Prosecution on the ill-treatment of workers as if they were slaves compare with this? It will be necessary to examine closely whether the cases referred to involve real abuse affecting workers in the process of normal mobilization, or abuses involving the deportation of prisoners and prisoners' work. Then one should investigate exaggerations and delays which can be explained by human weakness and peculiarities. In my opinion no adequate clarification of incidents has so far been obtained. Press reports already began to appear, which are bound to strengthen doubts as to the traditional concept of how foreign workers live.

The plan submitted with Sauckel Exhibit 13 portrays the numerous offices for checking and inspection, relative to the question of laborers. They did not report to the offices of the defendant Sauckel conditions of particular abuse. Perhaps the fact that offices were so numerous point to a weakness; it is quite possible that each Governmental Department kept silent about whatever mistakes originated under its own jurisdiction, rather than permitted their coming to the attention of the defendant Sauckel, because as a rule the controlling agencies were of a higher standing than that of the defendant Sauckel.

This should particularly be considered with regard to relations between the most important agency, the Deutsche Arbeitsfront (German Labor Front) under the leadership of Reich Leader Dr. Ley, and Gauleiter Sauckel. On closer examination of the document submitted as 1913-PS, an agreement on the creation of "central inspection offices charged with the care and control of foreign labor" it appears to be a carefully set-up "screen" against the defendant Sauckel. The document was devised by Dr. Ley and signed on 2 June 1943, then submitted to the defendant Sauckel for signature. He did not approve and announce it until 20 September 1943. For that very reason it is quite likely that Dr. Ley did not wish to invite criticism. On the other hand there is also little likelihood that the abuses were general and manifested themselves openly. Otherwise it would obviously have become known to the defendant Sauckel through his own control agencies.

In addition to his own staff, the defendant Sauckel on 6 April 1942 appointed the Gauleiters as "Commissioners for the Mobilization of Labor" impressing upon them as their foremost duty the supervision needed for enforcement of his orders. This becomes apparent from Sauckel Document 9, figure 5; the same holds true for Document 633-PS of 14 March 1943. Several Gauleiters were examined by the Tribunal as witnesses, and they have confirmed that the supervision was carried out as ordered, and that Sauckel checked it through members of his staff. No abuses were reported.

After due consideration of things, whom should one believe? Are we concerned here with exaggerated laments or do findings of a contrary nature deserve credit? There is no testimony by the French who, according to Document UK-78/3 IIId study, Chapter Ib, were taken to the real slave centers. There is no testimony by the Russians who, according to Document USSR-51, were sold for 10 to 15 Reichsmark.

In any case one fact speaks in favor of the defendant Sauckel, namely the fact that workers were always willing and industrious—as always confirmed by competent witnesses—and that when the collapse came no rising occurred in which the workers would have given vent to their natural wrath against the slave owners.

I have summarized actual happenings and have appraised them juridically. All this however, must appear to be juridical trifles where a higher responsibility is concerned. It has been voiced here that it will not do to let the insignificant Works' Managers take the blame, but that the moral responsibility must go to the highest Reich Government offices; of their own volition they should have introduced corrections on a larger scale to cope with difficulties inherent in the circumstances of that time. This might be in order for offices which had to power and the means of alleviation. The defendant Sauckel and his small personal staff had merely been incorporated in a Ministry already in existence, and he did not have such means at his disposal. His authority consisted of a narrowly circumscribed power to give directives on the mobilization of labor, and he has used it untiringly.

DEFENSE

The Works Managers of the armament industry were formed into an independent administration, and outwardly separated from so-called bureaucrats. The duty of self-preservation corresponds to this administrative independence. Consequently, if the case arose that something should be done to improve the safety of foreign workers, of their situation in armaments works, it would have been the duty of such establishments and of the Armaments Ministry under whose supervision they operated to deal with the matter.

It was not the duty of the office of the defendant Sauckel to intervene in these matters, as they were under the Armaments Ministry. This is clearly evident from Document 4006-PS with decree of 22 June 1944; this is borne out by the most intimate personal relation between the Armaments Minister and Hitler which made the former the most influential man in the economic sphere.

If greater responsibility were to exist for mistakes made in the factories, such responsibility can be placed only where there is knowledge of such conditions and power to correct them.

There is still a question of law to be considered with regard to the indictment; namely whether the position of the General Commissioner for Labor Commitment is determined by Article 7 or Article 8, i.e., whether the defendant Sauckel was an independent government official or whether he had to carry out orders.

The recruitment of labor took place from time to time upon Hitler's special order, as part of the general program, and the subsequent distribution alone was left to Sauckel. This is also confirmed by the fact that defendant Sauckel always refers to Hitler's "Orders and Commands", as in the Manifest of the General Plenipotentiary for Labor Commitment (GBA) (Doc. Sauckel 84, fig. 7) and in the circular to the "Gauleiter" (Doc. Sauckel 83) and others. From this also derives the fact that defendant Sauckel from time to time specially reports execution of the orders, as well as the beginning and end of his official trips. (Doc. 556-PS of 10 January 44 and 28 July 43.)

It is an argument against independence, that according to the nomination decree, the defendant Sauckel was immediately subordinate to the Four Year Plan and incorporated into the Reich Ministry for Labor which had been preserved with its state secretaries. Only two departments were placed at his disposal.

If the kind of responsibility is to be determined, it can be only within the limits of Article 8 of the Charter.

Herewith I conclude my exposition regarding the special sphere of activity of labor commitment.

The defendant Sauckel is accused on all counts of the indictment over and beyond labor commitment. Particular isolated acts are however not charged against him as active agent. A closer characterization of the accusation has been effected in the course of the proceedings only in regard to the concentration camps. In this connection, however, it has been proved by a sworn affidavit of witness Walkenhorst (Exhibit 23) and a statement in lieu of oath of witness Dieter (Sauckel Exhibit 9) that no order for the evacuation of the Buchenwald camp upon the approach of American troops was given. Knowledge and approval of conditions at the camp cannot be deduced from two visits of the camp before 1939, as the excesses submitted by the Prosecution did not yet exist. Nor did the local proximity of the camp to the Gauleitung of the defendant Sauckel bring about any close connection with the SS staff, as it had its seat in Kassel and Magdeburg.

Finally must be added the inner human convictions of defendant Sauckel which resulted from his previous career, and which was irreconcilable with Himmler's point of view.

What part can defendant Sauckel have played in the conspiracy? He was Gauleiter in Thuringia and did not rise above the rest of the Gauleiters. His activities and his aims can be deduced from his fighting speeches, which have been submitted as Document Sauckel 95. These persistently show the fight for "Liberty and bread" and the desire for a real peace.

For an activity of many years in the Party, the party program was authoritative for defendant Sauckel; the wishes contained therein required neither war nor the extermination of the Jews. The practical realization of the program alone could disclose the reality. For the convinced Party member, however, the official explanation of the event was authoritative and it met with no doubts.

Up to his nomination as the Plenipotentiary General for Labor Commitment in March 1942, defendant Sauckel did not belong to the narrow circle of those who had access to Hitler's plans. He had to rely upon the press and the broadcasts like everybody else. He had no contact with the leading men. This is shown somewhat tragically by his action, so often laughed at, in boarding a submarine as an ordinary seaman for a raid into enemy waters. That is not the way to participate in conspiracies.

As a faithful follower of Hitler, defendant Sauckel remains alone in the circle of those in the know. It is understandable if the extreme men avoided him owing to his well known opinions.

DEFENSE

Also he was not initiated into the secret of people who at the same time wished to be both Hitler's friends and murderers and he was not advised by the group of people who were Hitler's enemies, but who kept their truisms secret with a novel kind of courage. Faithful to the end, defendant Sauckel cannot to this day understand what has happened. Must he, like a heretic, recant his error in order to find grace? He lacks the contact with reality which would make understanding possible.

Does the sentence depend on his having unknowingly served a good or a bad cause? Nothing is either good or bad, but thinking makes it so. One thing however is always and under any circumstances good, and that is GOOD INTENTIONS. This good intention was shown by the defendant Sauckel. Therefore, I ask that he be acquitted.

2. FINAL PLEA of Fritz Sauckel

The atrocities revealed in this trial have shaken me in my deepest soul. In our humility and reverence, I bow before the victims and those who died, members of all nations, and before the misery and the sorrow of my own people, according to which I myself will make a statement.

I originate from living conditions of a completely different nature than those of my co-defendants. In my attitude and in my nature I remained a sailor and a worker.

After the first world war, the course of my life was determined through my own experience of the sorrows and needs of my people struggling for their existence. Inner conflict forced me into politics, but I could not agree to the Communist manifesto. I was never antireligious or even Godless. Quite the contrary is true. I fought a hard struggle with myself before I turned to politics.

And so I finally devoted myself to social life and justice and to those whose only wealth was their labor and, at the same time, to the fate of my nation. Herein I saw the only possible connection between a Socialist attitude and a true love of country. This, my belief, determined my life and my actions.

In this way I saw nothing contrary to the laws of humanity. In leadership and in the faith of the followers I saw no arbitrary dictatorship or tyranny. The excesses of my feelings and my confidence, as well as my great veneration of Hitler might have been my mistake. I knew him only as a man representing the rights of life of the German people and saw his kindness towards workers, women, and children, and I knew him as a man who was interested in the life of Germany.

However, the Hitler of this trial I could not recognize. Perhaps a further mistake of mine might have been my loneliness and my submersion into my world of imagination.

I had no social contact with the occupants of high positions in the Reich; the little spare time I had belonged to my family. I was and am proud and happy that my wife is the daughter of a worker, a man who was and remained a Social Democrat.

In this, my last word, I solemnly assure you that all foreign political events and the beginning of all war activities completely surprised me. Under no circumstances would I have cooperated as a German worker—and for German workers—to help plan the madness of an aggressive war.

I only became a National Socialist because I condemned class struggle and civil war, and because I firmly believed in the peaceful way and in the understanding work of Adolf Hitler in rebuilding our country.

In my own sphere of activity I always did everything possible, because I was a worker, to prevent excesses, brutality, and wilful activities of any kind. I was sufficiently naive to carry through my manifest for the commitment of labor, and many other directives, which dictated to all offices a correct and humane treatment of foreign workers. I never would have been able to bear the knowledge of these terrible secrets and crimes without protest, nor, with such a knowledge, would I have been able to face my people or my ten innocent children.

I had no part in any conspiracy against the peace or against humanity, nor did I tolerate murders or mistreatment. During the war I had to do my duty. The task of Plenipotentiary General for Labor Commitment was received by me in a period of grave crisis, and this was a matter of complete surprise to me. I was bound to the then-existing labor laws and to the orders of the Fuehrer, as well as to the directives of the Ministerial Council for Reich Defense. I do not know why it was just I who received this order. In my own Gau I had gained the confidence of the workers particularly, of the peasants and artisans, and already prior to 1933, that is, before Hitler took over the power, with a large majority and in free parliamentary elections, I had been elected as the Chief of the County Government.

I believe that providence has fitted me with a good talent for organization and practical work, as well as with an ability for enthusiasm. That, perhaps, was the reason why I received my task. It was a heavy burden for me. The soil of Berlin was completely alien to me. Just because I am a worker, I never thought of making foreign human beings into slaves. My demand to deal economically with human beings does not in any event mean their inhuman exploitation, but rather their economical and decent use in work and for work.

DEFENSE

It was never my intention to commit crimes against international law, against the laws of war, or against the laws of humanity. Not for a single moment did I doubt the legality and admissibility of my task, for I thought it completely out of the question that the German Government would break international law.

If, however, you accuse me of the fact that, in spite of that, German labor laws could not be applied in the occupied territories, then may I reply that people in high positions, Frenchmen, Belgians, Poles, and even Russians, have told me that they were supporting Germany by labor in order to protect Europe against a threatening Communist system, and in order to prevent unemployment and mass suffering during the course of the war.

Not only did I work for the fulfillment of my task with every effort, but, at the same time, I tried with all my might to remove, with all means, the crisis in the organization for the care of foreign laborers, which occurred because of the winter catastrophe during the winter of 1941 and 1942. I tried to eliminate all shortcomings and abuses immediately when I assumed office.

I also believe, as my documents prove, that we could win the foreign workers over to our German cause when giving them correct treatment as I demanded it. Perhaps in the eyes of Himmler and Goebbels I was a believer in a Utopia and quite beyond redemption. They were my opponents, but I fought for equal rights and conditions for foreign workers; I fought for this honestly, so that the same conditions would apply as they applied for the Germans. This is proved by the numerous documents of my defense counsel, and this is confirmed by all the testimony of the witnesses before this Tribunal.

No one can regret it more deeply than I if my work was incomplete. Unfortunately, that was only partly in my power, as was proven by my counsel.

The taking of evidence has shown that many a thing has happened in the occupied territories where the organization of the civilian offices of labor commitment could exercise no influence whatsoever. However, the German offices complained to me; it was claimed that I was delivering too few workers; it was claimed that it was my fault if dangerous crises threatened in the war economy and the food situation. This heavy responsibility and this care dominated me in such a way that I had no time for other events, and I regret that fact.

So far as my decrees and directives and my officials are concerned, I accept the responsibility. I have never seen the records of the Central Planning Board before this trial; otherwise, I certainly would have corrected false or unclear passages, as, for instance, the passage with reference to the impossible figure of only two hundred thousand volunteer workers. This also applies to a number of other statements of mine which were taken down by a third party, quite wrongly and without my ever having made these statements.

Just because I am a worker, just because I served on foreign ships, I am grateful to the foreign workers who worked in Germany, for they worked well. This, perhaps, may be a proof of the fact that on the whole they were treated correctly and humanely. I myself visited them many times, for I was a working man; and because of the fact that I was a working man I spent the Christmas holidays of 1943 and 1944 among foreign workers in order to show my attitude towards them.

My own children worked in the factories in the midst of foreign workers, and they worked under the same working conditions. Could I, or German workers and the German people, consider that as slavery? This was a war necessity. The German people and the German workers would never have tolerated conditions comparable to slavery next to themselves.

My defense counsel, very ably and objectively, has submitted my case in complete truth. I thank him from my full heart for that. He was strict, and quite correct, in his presentation of my case. It was my wish and my conscience.

There are clear shortcomings, and the need which arose because of the war, the horrible conditions of the war, touch my heart.

I personally am ready for any fate which providence intends for me, and I am ready to meet that fate, as my son who died during the war did.

The Gauleiters whom I made Plenipotentiaries for Labor Commitment had only one task, to mete out correct treatment and care to the Germans and to the foreign workers.

God protect my beloved people, above all, and may the Lord bless the work of German workers, for whom I have lived and struggled, and may he give peace to the world.

DEFENSE

XVIII. ALFRED JODL

1. FINAL ARGUMENT by Dr. Franz Exner, Defense Counsel

Mr. President, may it please the Tribunal!

In this unique trial the finding out of the truth is faced by unique difficulties. At a time when the wounds of the war are still bleeding, when the excitement at the events of the last few years is still to be felt, at a time when the archives of one side are still shut, a just verdict is to be given with dispassionate neutrality. Material for the trial has been spread out before us which covers a quarter of a century of world history and events from the four quarters of the globe. And on the basis of this gigantic material we see 22 men being accused simultaneously. That makes it terribly difficult to keep one's eyes clear for the guilt and responsibility of each individual. For inhumanities of an almost unimaginable vastness have come to light here, and the danger exists that the deep shadow which falls on some of the defendants may also darken the others. Some of them, I fear, appear in a different light, owing to the company in which they are here, than if they were alone on the defendants' bench.

The prosecutors have increased this danger still more by repeatedly making communal accusations, mixing legal and moral reproaches. They said that all the defendants had enriched themselves from the occupied territories, that there was not one who did not shout "die Juda," etc. No attempt to prove this in the case of each individual was made but the statement alone already creates an inimical atmosphere to all of them.

One of the things that comes under these actions by the Prosecution which make the clearing up of the question of individual guilt more difficult is the fact that the defendants Keitel and Jodl are treated as inseparable twins, one common plea against them by the British prosecutor, one common trial brief by the French prosecution. And finally the Russian prosecution spoke very little about the individual defendants, but heaped reproach after reproach upon all the defendants. All this is clearly intended to shorten the trial, but hardly serves to clear up the question of individual responsibility.

